So the bill was passed.

[The announcement of the vote was received with prolonged clapping of hands and hissings, both in the House and galleries, and cries of "Order!" "Order!"]

The SPEAKER. Unless order is preserved, the Chair will order the galleries to be cleared.

Mr. STUART, of Michigan, (in his seat.) The trouble is not in the galleries.

Pending the vote,

Mr. BROOKS said: I desire to state, as a matter of courtesy, that my colleague, Mr. Aiken, many days ago, paired off with a gentleman who has been called home by sickness in his family, (referring to Mr. APPLETON.) But for that, had my colleague been here, he would have given the bill his warm and cordial support.

Mr. WENTWORTH, of Illinois, said: I am requested by my colleague, Mr. BISSELL, to state that sickness alone has detained him from being here to give his vote against the final passage of this bill in its present shape.

Mr. CARUTHERS said: The House will indulge me again in stating, that I have paired off with Mr. CHASE, who would have voted against this bill; and, but for that, I should have voted in favor of it.

Mr. MILLER, of Indiana, said: My colleague [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] is now detained from the House by sickness in his family. He proposed to me to pair off with him. I told him I would pair off with him on the final passage of the bill, if it should so happen that his vote would defeat the bill. But from the votes which have been taken, I became satisfied that the bill would pass; and I have accordingly availed myself of the privilege of putting myself upon the record.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed, and to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I demand the yeas and nays upon that motion.

[Cries of "Oh, no!" "No!" all over the Hall.]

Mr. HIESTER. I call for tellers upon the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. TAYLOR, of Tennessee, and DAVIS, of Indiana, were appointed.

The House was then divided upon the demand for the yeas and nays; and the tellers reported—ayes thirty-seven, (not a sufficient number.)

So the yeas and nays were not ordered.

The question was then put upon the motion to lay the motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed upon the table; and it was decided in the affirmative.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs upon the title of the bill.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I demand the previous question upon agreeing to the title of the bill.

Mr. FENTON. I ask the gentleman from Illinois to withdraw that motion for a moment. [Cries of "No!" "No!"]

Mr. RICHARDSON. I decline to withdraw it. The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be now put.

The title was then reported, as follows:

A bill to organize the Territories of Nebraska and Kansas.

The question was taken; and the title was agreed to.

Mr. SAGE. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. LETCHER. I rise to a privileged motion.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I move that the vote last taken, by which the title of the bill was agreed to, be reconsidered, and that the motion to reconsider do lie upon the table.

Mr. LETCHER. I think I have the floor upon a privileged motion. I move that when this House adjourns, it adjourn to meet on Wednesday next.

Mr. HAVEN. I rise to a question of order. I submit that the House has decided otherwise.

The SPEAKER. Under the decision of the House in a former part of the day the Chair decides the motion out of order.

Mr. LETCHER. With all respect for the Chair, I must take an appeal from that decision.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I ask for the yeas and nays upon the appeal.

Mr. ORR. I rise to a privileged question. I move to reconsider the vote by which the title of the bill was adopted, and lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina will remember that the motion to adjourn must take precedence of his motion.

Mr. ORR. But the question is not upon the motion to adjourn.

The SPEAKER. That is the motion.

Mr. ORR. I thought it was upon the appeal from the decision of the Chair taken by the gentleman from Virginia.

The SPEAKER. That is true; but the appeal of the gentleman from Virginia is connected with, and directly affects, that motion. The Chair therefore decides that the motion of the gentleman will take precedence of that of the gentleman from South Carolina.

A MEMBER. Will the Chair state precisely what is the question?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. SAGE] moved that the House do now adjourn. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. LETCHER] moved that when the House adjourns, it adjourn to meet on Wednesday next. The Chair decided that motion to be out of order under the instructions of the House. From that decision the gentleman from Virginia takes an appeal; and the question is, "Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the House?"

Mr. PHELPS. I move to lay the appeal upon the table.

Mr. SAGE. Upon that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. PHELPS. I withdraw the motion that the appeal do lie upon the table.

The question was then taken; "Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the House?" and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 99, nays 80; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abercrombie, James C. Allen, Willis Allen, Ashe, David J. Bailey, Thomas H. Bayly, Barksdale, Barry, Bocock, Boyce, Breckinridge, Bridges, Brooks, Caskey, Chastain, Chrisman, Churchwell, Clark, Clingman, Cobb, Colquitt, Cox, Craige, Cumming, John G. Davis, Dawson, Dowdell, Dunbar, Eddy, Edmundson, John M. Elliott, Faulkner, Florence, Goode, Green, Greenwood, Grey, Hamilton, Sampson W. Harris, Hendricks, Henn, Hibbard, Hill, Hillyer, Houston, Ingersoll, J. Glancy Jones, Roland Jones, Keitt, Kerr, Kidwell, Kurtz, Lamb, Latham, Lilly, Lindley, Macdonald, McDougall, Maxwell, May, John G. Miller, Smith Miller, Noble, Mordecai Oliver, Orr, Packer, John Perkins, Phelps, Phillips, Powell, Pratt, Preston, Richardson, Riddle, Robbins, Rowe, Ruffin, Shannon, Shaw, Shower, Singleton, Samuel A. Smith, William Smith, George W. Smyth, Frederick P. Stanton, Alexander H. Stephens, Straub, David Stuart, John J. Taylor, Tweed, Vail, Vansant, Walbridge, Walker, Walsh, Westbrook, Witte, Hendrick B. Wright, and Zollicoffer—99.

NAYS—Messrs. Ball, Banks, Bennett, Benson, Campbell, Carpenter, Chandler, Crocker, Cullom, Cutting, Thomas Davis, Dean, De Witt, Dick, Dickinson, Drum, Eastman, Edgerton, Edmonds, Thomas D. Eliot, Ellison, Etheridge, Everhart, Farley, Fenton, Flagler, Gamble, Goodrich, Grow, Aaron Harlan, Andrew J. Harlan, Wiley P. Harris, Hastings, Haven, Hiestler, Howe, Hughes, Hunt, Daniel T. Jones, Kittredge, Knox, Letcher, Lindsey, McCulloch, Matteson, Mayall, Meacham, Middleswarth, Millson, Morgan, Murray, Nichols, Norton, Parker, Pennington, Pringle, Puryear, Rogers, Russell, Sabiu, Sage, Sapp, Seymour, Simmons, Skelton, Andrew Stuart, John L. Taylor, Nathaniel G. Taylor, Thurston, Tracy, Trout, Upham, Walley, Elihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, Wells, Tappan Wentworth, Wheeler, Daniel B. Wright, and Yates—80.

So the decision of the Chair was sustained.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs on the motion that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. HAMILTON. Let us first dispose of the motion to reconsider the vote by which the title was adopted.

The SPEAKER. There is no motion pending except that to adjourn.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I appeal to my colleague [Mr. WASHBURN] to withdraw his motion to adjourn, so that we may move to reconsider the vote by which the title was adopted, and that that motion do lie upon the table.

Mr. SAGE. I do not think that the bill will spoil if left until to-morrow.

Mr. MORGAN. I demand the yeas and nays on the motion to adjourn.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The question was taken; and the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I move that the vote by which the title of the bill was adopted be reconsidered, and that that motion be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. WALBRIDGE. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken; and the motion was agreed to.

Thereupon the House adjourned (at half past eleven o'clock, p. m.) until to-morrow at twelve m.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, May 22, 1854.

Prayer by Rev. WILLIAM H. MILBURN.

The Journal of Friday was read and approved.

RESIGNATION OF MR. EVERETT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a letter from the Hon. EDWARD EVERETT, informing the Senate that he had resigned his seat in the Senate, to take effect the 1st of June next; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of War, made in compliance with a resolution of the Senate, on the expediency of promptly completing the fortifications at the Tortugas and Key West; which was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Mr. WADE submitted additional documents in support of the claim of the heirs of Joshua Chamberlain; which were referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Mr. SMITH presented a petition of inhabitants of the town of Guilford, Connecticut, praying a reduction of the rates of ocean postage; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. BELL. I present the memorial of Mary Reeside, widow and executrix of James Reeside, praying the payment of a judgment in his favor in a suit instituted against him by the United States. The memorialist sets forth that ten or twelve years ago a suit was instituted by the United States against her husband in his lifetime, for alleged balances existing against him due on his accounts with the Post Office Department, he being an extensive mail contractor in the State of Pennsylvania and other States. Owing to the loss of some of the records of the Department, an uncertainty prevailed as to the real state of the accounts; and with his own consent, as well as in accordance with the views of the chief of the Department, a suit was instituted against him to try the fact in the usual form. It was instituted in the circuit court of the United States for the eastern district of Pennsylvania; and after a very laborious and careful examination—extending, it is alleged, I believe, through six weeks, or two months perhaps—the cause was decided. The jury gave a verdict of over $180,000 in favor of the defendant, and against the United States. A writ of error was taken to the Supreme Court of the United States by direction of the Government. That was dismissed. More than five years have now elapsed since the judgment became final, and no part of it has yet been paid. I am not sure what committee I should move to refer this to, but it strikes me that the Committee on the Judiciary is the proper one. The question involved is one of law—as to whether or not the party should be paid by the Government. I move its reference to that committee.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. COOPER presented the memorial of the Union Canal Company, of Pennsylvania, praying a grant of public land to aid in the completion of their canal; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. FOOT presented a petition of citizens of Hinesburg, Vermont, praying a reduction of the rates of ocean postage; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. HAMLIN presented the petition of the heirs of Daniel Gookin, praying to be allowed the commutation due him as a lieutenant in the revolutionary army; which was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Also, the petition of the heirs of Joseph Boynton, praying to be allowed the commutation due him as a lieutenant in the revolutionary army; which was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Also, a resolution of the Legislature of Maine, in relation to the claims of the State against the United States, for lands taken and required to satisfy claimants under the treaty of Washington; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

Also, resolutions of the Legislature of Maine, in relation to certain proposed modifications of the navigation laws of the United States, allowances of fishing bounties, and reciprocal trade with the British North American colonies; which were ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

Also, resolutions of the Legislature of Maine, in relation to French spoliations; which were ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

Also, resolutions of the Legislature of Maine, in relation to the revenue laws of the United States; which were ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

Also, resolutions of the Legislature of Maine, in favor of abolishing the spirit ration in the Navy, and substituting an allowance of money in lieu thereof; which were referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Also, resolutions of the Legislature of Maine, in favor of cheap ocean postage; which were referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. TOUCEY presented two petitions of inhabitants of the State of Connecticut, praying the reduction of the rates of ocean postage; which were referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. BRODHEAD presented a petition of citizens of the United States, professing the Jewish religion, praying that measures may be taken to secure to American citizens of every religious creed, while traveling in foreign countries, the rights of religious worship; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. MALLORY presented the petition of James A. Peden and other members of the Florida bar, asking for an additional regular term of the district court for the northern district of Florida, and the passage of a law providing for appeals from the decisions of the district court in admiralty; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BRODHEAD presented a petition of inhabitants of Coneautville, Pennsylvania, praying a reduction of the rates of ocean postage; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. SUMNER presented a petition of the Ladies' anti-Slavery Society of York county, Maine, remonstrating against the repeal of the Missouri compromise; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. JONES, of Iowa, presented the proceedings of a meeting of citizens of Washington county, Iowa, in favor of a grant of public lands to aid in the construction of the Philadelphia, Fort Wayne, and Platte river air-line railroad; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. CHASE presented a petition of inhabitants of Mansfield, Ohio, praying a reduction of the rates of ocean postage; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. SHIELDS presented the petition of Rachel McMillan, widow of Robert McMillan, late a surgeon in the United States Army, praying a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CLAY presented a memorial of William Wells and others, members of Captain Gee's company of Alabama mounted volunteers, praying the reimbursement of losses sustained in consequence of the sale, by the Government, at reduced prices, of their horses and furniture, for which transportation to the United States was refused after their service in Mexico; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

REPORTS FROM STANDING COMMITTEES.

Mr. ALLEN, from the Committee on Agriculture, to whom was referred a petition of citizens of Shenandoah county, Virginia, in relation to the cultivation of the Irish potato, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. PETTIT, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to whom was referred the bill for the relief of John Boyd, reported it back without amendment, and submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill for the relief of Margaret A. Copley, of the State of Louisiana, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill to authorize T. H. McManus to enter, by preëmotion, certain lands in the Greensburg land district, Louisiana, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. SEBASTIAN, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom were referred a letter of O. M. Wozencraft, late Indian agent, in reply to certain charges against him, and documents in relation to the claim of J. C. Edwards for the payment of a draft drawn by G. W. Barbour, Indian agent in California, asked to be discharged from the further consideration thereof; which was agreed to.

MARINE HOSPITAL.

Mr. CHASE submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing a marine hospital at Cincinnati, in the State of Ohio.

COAST-SURVEY SERVICE.

Mr. STUART submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the necessity of an appropriation for constructing a new steam vessel for the coast-survey service in the upper lakes.

RAMSAY INVESTIGATION.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. I am instructed by the Committee on Indian Affairs, to offer, and ask for the present consideration of, the following resolution:

Resolved, That, in addition to the documents in the case of Alexander Ramsay, late Governor of the Territory of Minnesota, ordered to be printed on the 8th instant, all the papers on file, as well as the correspondence between the commissioners and the First Comptroller, be printed with Executive Document No. 61 of the present session.

Mr. STUART. I wish to know whether the resolution embraces the reply of Governor Ramsay himself to the report of the commissioners?

Mr. SEBASTIAN. It is intended to embrace the testimony taken before the committee of the Senate, previous to the reference of the question to commissioners; and also the correspondence between the commissioners and the Comptroller, relative to the construction of the sub-treasury law.

Mr. HUNTER. As the resolution is leading to debate, I hope it will be laid over.

The PRESIDENT. Objection being made, the resolution cannot now be considered.

NOTICE OF A BILL.

Mr. CHASE gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce a bill to abolish the franking privilege, and to provide for the distribution of public documents.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill from the House of Representatives to authorize a register to be issued to the steamer El Paraguay by a new name, was read a first and second time by its title; and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

RESOLUTIONS OF CONNECTICUT.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, a series of resolutions have been transmitted to me, which have been passed by the General Assembly of my State, on the subject of the measure now pending before Congress, proposing to repeal the Missouri compromise, with a request that I should lay the resolutions before the Senate. I ask that they may be read.

The resolutions were read.

They set forth that the form of the prohibition of slavery in the act of 1820, as well as its incorporation in an act designed to be irrevocable, pledged the public faith to the whole extent of the power of Congress against any repeal of the prohibition thus enacted; and that the people of Connecticut have relied upon the perpetuity of that enactment. They protest against the proposed repeal of the prohibition of slavery in the act of 1820, as a violation of national faith, as destructive of mutual confidence between the States of the Union, as exposing the Union itself to imminent peril, and as inconsistent with the fundamental principles of national justice. They declare their fixed purpose never to consent to the legal or actual admission of slavery into the Territory from which it was excluded by the act of 1820, or of the admission of slaveholding States from any portion of that Territory.

Mr. CASS. I hope that those resolutions, when put into plain English, do not mean another Hartford Convention.

Mr. WELLER. They come pretty near it, I think.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I apprehend there is nothing in the resolutions that calls for the remark which the honorable Senator from Michigan has seen fit to make to the Senate. But whether the resolutions mean another Hartford Convention or not, one thing is certain, and the honorable Senator may rely upon it, that these resolutions express the sentiments of the people of the State of Connecticut by an overwhelming majority; and I tell the honorable Senator further, that they express the sentiments of a large majority of the Democratic party of the State of Connecticut. They passed the Senate of our State with only one vote in the negative, and there were, I believe, only some forty or fifty negative votes in the other House.

The honorable Senator may, if he pleases, stigmatize the sentiments contained in these resolutions, as sentiments emanating from a Hartford Convention. They are the sentiments of the free-men of Connecticut, and I believe they will turn out to be the sentiments of an overwhelming majority of the people of Michigan.

I make the usual motion, that these resolutions lie on the table, and be printed for the use of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT. They will be printed as a matter of course, under the rule.

Mr. CASS. Mr. President, I heard all this kind of denunciation forty years ago, and with as much violence and emphasis as can be used here, and I heard the Hartford Convention defended as a rightful act. That to which I wished to call attention was a declaration in these resolutions that they would not submit to the law of the land when passed; and thinking I perceived something of that sort in the resolutions, I was impelled to ask whether there was to be a new Hartford Convention. As to what the honorable Senator from Connecticut says in respect to the feelings of a majority of the people of the State of Connecticut, I know nothing about it. I have no right to contradict him; but I know and I trust my co-associates in the Senate know that if a law be passed under this Government, which is constitutional—and I trust we assume to pass no other—the people of the State of Connecticut will submit to it. I look to no other state of things.

With respect to the opinion of the people of my own State, I thank the honorable Senator for being sentinel there; but I believe I know their opinion as well as he does. I believe the people of the State of Michigan will sustain their representatives, when those representatives carry through a great constitutional principle, which secures to American citizens wherever they are the right of self-government. Allow me here to mention a single circumstance. This principle of self-government has been reproached, and I do not know but that the reproach has been cast on me for using the term, "squatter sovereignty" as applied to it. That was no term of mine, although the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] supposed it was. It was the term used by his eminent and deceased colleague [Mr. Calhoun] as a term of reproach, cast upon those who put forward the doctrine that you should bring California into the Union upon the principle of the right of men to govern themselves. That was the ground which I took, and which others took.

I maintained, also, that not having provided a government for the people of California for two years, they were entitled, by all the laws of God and man, to govern themselves. That we called the right of self-government, and there was the origin of the phrase. Of course I mean self-government within the principles of the Constitution. That was all we maintained; that is what we maintain now. I believe the American people will forever stand up for that principle which carried their fathers through the Revolution, and has given them the most blessed government on the face of the globe.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I leave the Senate to decide who it is that has commenced denunciation on this subject. Did not the honorable Senator from Michigan rise in his place and stigmatize these resolutions as emanating from a spirit which he supposes to have been an unpatriotic and an odious spirit, the spirit of the Hartford Convention? Sir, whether right or wrong, I do not hesitate to say that these resolutions contain the opinions and sentiments of an overwhelming majority of the people of the State of Connecticut of all parties. I should do injustice to the Democratic party of that State, if I did not say that they are utterly opposed to a repeal of the Missouri compromise; and in this particular they have been most faithfully and ably represented in the other wing of this Capitol, the whole delegation being Democratic, and three of the members from the State voting in opposition to this measure, and but one in its favor. It ill became that Senator, then, to rise in his place and stigmatize his own political friends in Connecticut as being actuated by views, and entertaining sentiments corresponding with those which are supposed to have been entertained by the members of the Hartford Convention.

But I should like to ask the honorable Senator whether he has at all times maintained the ground which he now assumes on this subject, and which he has endeavored to maintain, I admit, with a great deal of ability? It so happened that I traveled with the honorable Senator in the railroad cars at the close of the session of 1846, after the Wilmot proviso, as it is called, had been introduced into the House of Representatives, and with my own ears I heard the honorable Senator say, that if it had not been for John Davis he would have voted for the Wilmot proviso. He not only said so, but he proclaimed it again and again. Was that an emanation of the spirit of the Hartford Convention, when the honorable Senator said publicly, throughout the North, that if it had not been for John Davis, every Senator from the free States would have voted for the Wilmot proviso? It is notorious that the honorable Senator, in the northern country, avowed himself in favor of that proposition; but, for some reason or other, he saw fit to change his views upon the subject. I am not about to reproach him with inconsistency; but when I introduce respectful resolutions, which have been passed by the Legislature of my State, sustained by all parties, and adopted by a very large and overpowering vote, I will not sit here quietly and hear the honorable Senator stigmatize the people of my State, when it is well known that he himself was for the Wilmot proviso originally, and would have voted for it, if he had had an opportunity to do so when it was first introduced to the consideration of the Senate. I know very well the ground which the honorable Senator has since taken, and I know very well that he has changed his views. This is a free country, and he has a right to change his opinions; but he must pardon the people of Connecticut if they have a little more stability on this and other questions than the honorable Senator himself has. He must pardon them if they have not whiffled quite as much—if they have not been sometimes for, and sometimes against, the Wilmot proviso. Sir, they are a people who are in the habit of adhering with firmness to their opinions when once formed and once expressed.

I did not expect to be drawn into a controversy on this or any other subject. I presented those resolutions. They are drawn up in respectful language. They do not assail the motives of honorable Senators. They make no attack upon the motives of the honorable Senator from Michigan, although he was one day for the Wilmot proviso, and the next day against it. I do not call in question the patriotism or rectitude of the honorable Senator, but I will not stand here in silence, and hear the motives of the Legislature of my State, or of the people of that State, impeached. I came back here to occupy my seat for three brief days, and I expected to be permitted to occupy it without being drawn into a controversy on this or any other subject; but I will say to the Senator from Michigan, that I am ready for a controversy with him, if he chooses to raise one with me, in regard to this or any other matter.

The sentiments advanced in these resolutions are the honest opinions of the people of my State. They are my honest opinions, and I will maintain them with proper respect for the Senator and for the majority of this body. I will maintain them as long as God suffers me to live.

Mr. CASS. I hope, Mr. President, I may be allowed to express the hope that the honorable Senator will be enabled to employ the rest of his three days more profitably. [Laughter.]

My position with respect to the Wilmot proviso I have declared over and over again to the Senate. It is not a new matter; but the honorable Senator thinks he has given me a "poke," as it is called. I poked myself; I have explained the whole matter long ago. I have stated that, when the Wilmot proviso was first started, if I had voted, I should have voted in favor of it. But then the subject had not been considered or discussed. No man had looked into it. It seemed to be a question of liberty or slavery alone. But when the subject came to be discussed, and the very first time it was discussed, and when I gave a vote upon it, the first vote was against it, and it was a vote by which I hazarded my political station at home, and tendered my resignation by it. Sir, it does not always do to seek in our own breasts for the motives of action of others. We frequently do others great injustice by doing so.

The position of the honorable Senator is very extraordinary; I do not understand it at all. He says I at one time would favor the Wilmot proviso, and that I am now denouncing the people of his State for pursuing the same course. Not at all. I have not said one word to-day in favor of, or against the Wilmot proviso. I do not denounce anybody for being in favor of it. It is a vision of his own imagination. But I object to such threats as are contained in this paper, for, talk of it, and explain it, and expound it as you please, there is a threat in that paper. That is what I was talking of. It is a threat that they will not submit to the law of the land, not that they are to give up their opinions, not that they are satisfied with their representatives voting against it, but that, if the measure alluded to be passed and become the law of the land, they do not mean to submit to it. That was the point of my objection.

I have no objection to the vote of the honorable Senator for or against the Wilmot proviso. I have no objection to the opinions of his people for or against it. But I do object to the presentation of such a paper as this before the American Senate, and thus, before the American people, denouncing an act of this Congress, or a presumed act, and saying in effect "we do not mean to submit to it." Then I drew a parallel between that and another act, which was denounced—an act of war. During the progress of the war it was denounced. I do not wish to go into that matter, but we know that a convention was held during that war. The circumstances are known to the whole country, and I need not repeat them. I will only say that I trust the same spirit will never again appear in the United States.

Mr. SMITH. I deny that there is any threat in these resolutions.

Mr. BRODHEAD. Read the third resolution.

Mr. CASS. Let anybody judge of that who pleases from reading the resolutions.

Mr. SMITH. The resolutions have been read already.

Mr. PETTIT. Let the third resolution be read again.

Mr. SMITH. I have no objection.

The Secretary read the resolutions, as follows:

STATE OF CONNECTICUT,
GENERAL ASSEMBLY, May Session, 1854. }

Whereas, a bill is now pending in the Congress of the United States for the organization of the Territories of Kansas and Nebraska, by which the eighth section of the act preparatory to the admission of Missouri, approved March 6, 1820, is declared inoperative and void:

Resolved by this General Assembly, That the form of the prohibition of slavery, in the act of 1820, as well as its incorporation in an act designed to be irrevocable, pledged the public faith, to the whole extent of the power of Congress so to do, against any repeal of the prohibition so enacted, and that the people of Connecticut have therefore relied upon the perpetuity of that enactment, with full confidence in the integrity and honor, both of the National Government, and of those States which sustain the institution of slavery within their own jurisdiction.

Resolved, That in the name and in behalf of the people of this State, we protest against the proposed repeal of the prohibition of slavery in the act preparatory to the admission of Missouri, as a violation of the national faith, as destructive of mutual confidence between the States of this Union, as exposing the Union itself to imminent peril, and as inconsistent with the fundamental principles of national justice.

Resolved, That we declare our fixed purpose never to consent to the legal or actual admission of slavery into the Territory from which it was excluded by the act of 1820, or to the admission of slaveholding States from any portion of the same.

Resolved, That the attempt to extend slavery over a vast region from which it has been by law excluded, with the consent of the slaveholding States, ought to awaken the people of Connecticut to the aggressive character of slavery as a political power, and to unite them in determined hostility to its extension, and to its existence wherever it comes constitutionally within the reach of Federal legislation.

Resolved, That this General Assembly hereby declares itself ready to cooperate with other States, in any legal and constitutional measures, which the existing crisis or its consequences shall demand, for the preservation of our rights, and in defense of liberty.

Resolved, That our Senators in Congress be instructed, and that our Representatives be earnestly requested to oppose, by all lawful means, and to the last extremity, the bill under consideration, with the clause abrogating the prohibition of slavery known as the Missouri compromise.

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be transmitted to the Senators and Representatives of this State in the Congress of the United States, to be by them laid before that body and to the Executives of the several States of this Union.

O. H. PERRY, Secretary of State.

Mr. SMITH. I deny that there is any threat in these resolutions, or anything in the shape of a threat.

Mr. CASS. A threat that they will not obey the law of the land.

Mr. SMITH. They say they will not consent to it. I will not consent to it; and I say to the honorable Senator that a very large majority of the people of the Union, in the northern States, are opposed to it; but is that saying that we are going to involve this country in a civil war; that we are about to take up arms against Congress and against the Government? Not at all, sir. They will oppose it politically; they will oppose it constitutionally; they will oppose it through the efforts of their representatives in the two Houses of Congress. That is all that there is in the resolution. There is nothing in it in the shape of a threat.

The resolutions were ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

IMPROVEMENT OF THE NAVY.

Mr. MALLORY. I desire to say to the Senate that I design at the very earliest moment to call up the bill which was reported by me from the Committee on Naval Affairs, a few days since, for the improvement of the condition of the Navy. I have not had that bill set apart as a special order, for the reason of its importance, and in order that the committee may be able to call it up at an early day.

JOHN FRAZER.

Mr. HAMLIN. While I was absent from the Senate some days ago, a private bill was indefinitely postponed, which I think would not have been done if a single word had been said to the Senate in explanation. It is a bill for the relief of John Frazer. It will require unanimous consent to make a motion to reconsider. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. CLAY] voted in favor of its postponement; and if he will consent to make the motion, I hope there will be no objection to it.

Mr. CLAY. I voted for the postponement; and, at the request of the Senator from Maine, I make the motion to reconsider.

The PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, the motion will be entered.

There was no objection.

WEST INDIA SLAVE TRADE.

Mr. CLAYTON. I present to the Senate the following resolution; and, as it is one of inquiry, I ask for its consideration now:

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Relations be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing, by law, for such restrictions on the power of American consuls residing in the Spanish West India Islands, to issue sea-letters on the transfer of American vessels in those islands, as will prevent the abuse of the American flag in protecting persons engaged in the African slave-trade.

The PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. CLAYTON. I desire to ask the attention of the Senate while I submit a few remarks upon the subject of this resolution. Since the year 1852 the slave trade has fearfully increased in the island of Cuba. Thousands of African negroes have been brought from the coast of Africa during the last sixteen months and smuggled into this island, and the fact has attracted the attention of good men throughout the civilized world. No portion of this Union is believed to be more decidedly opposed to this inhuman traffic than the southern portion of it, where, although men are deeply interested in the preservation of their own peculiar institution, the abhorrence of these outrages on humanity by the African slave trade, exists as strongly as it does in any other portion of the world, and I think I am fully justified in saying that the men of the South will go as far in putting down this inhuman traffic in human flesh as any others. Southern honor stands pledged to that effect, and the brightest jewel in the chaplet of the South is her honor. We are all, then, equally interested to inquire what has been the cause of the recent extraordinary success of the slave trade in the Island of Cuba? It is with regret that I am compelled to admit the fact that a great majority of these slaves have been imported from the coasts of Africa in vessels of American build, and that these vessels, navigated by crews of American sailors, and commanded by American captains, have participated in that trade to an alarming extent, and in a manner which I will now proceed to explain.

The owner of an American ship desiring to sell her for a slaver, sends her with a cargo to Havana. She arrives there with the understanding that she is to be sold and employed in the slave trade. Some wealthy individual or joint stock company, tempted by the prospect of enormous profits, advances money enough to purchase the vessel, and fit her out for an adventure to the coast of Africa. By the laws of the United States, it is necessary for her new owner to procure for her a new register upon her return to this country, and within three days after she has arrived at a port here. She is generally purchased in the name of the captain who sails with her to Havana, and who undertakes with his employers to navigate her under the American flag, and with an American crew, to some port on the African coast at or south of Elephant Bay, for enormous profits, proportioned to the risk he incurs, but seldom falling short of five or six thousand dollars. It was not the original intention that she should return to the United States; but her commander, on his arrival at Havana, deposits her papers with the American consul, and obtains, in lieu of them, for the vessel, a consular certificate, called a consular sea letter. With such a certificate, or, as it is said, sometimes with the original sea letter with which he sailed from the United States, the captain embarks with the very crew with which he sailed from the United States, under the American flag, bound for Galinas, or Cabinda, or some other port on the coast of Africa where slaves can be best procured. He takes with him another captain and another crew as passengers, to cover his design, composed generally of Portuguese or Spaniards, with the addition perhaps of a few American or English desperadoes; and his cargo is generally composed of farina, beans, casks of water, and agua dente, sweetmeats, and boards seemingly cast without care on the top of the water casks, but in reality all fitted and prepared, to make a slave deck to stow away the slaves on their return from Africa to the Island of Cuba, for which purpose this slave deck, it is said, can be constructed by the crew in less than an hour.

On the voyage from Havana to the coast of Africa, if overhauled by an English cruiser, he points to his American flag, and shows his American papers; and when he arrives at his port of destination, in pursuance of a previous arrangement between those concerned in the trade in Cuba, and their agents on the coast of Africa, the American colors are lowered, the American captain and the American crew leave the vessel and go on shore, or on board another vessel waiting there to bring them back to Cuba, and the new captain and crew, who sailed in the slaver as passengers, then take charge of the vessel. If an English or American cruiser be in sight, they receive timely information by signals from the land, and thus avoiding capture, the vessel lays to within sight of the barracoons, or slave pens, without taking in sail, but merely lowering her topsails, until her human freight is, by the immense barges or boats prepared for the purpose on shore, put on board the vessel. Thus, frequently, nine hundred or a thousand slaves are shipped aboard a vessel, and she is off on her return voyage to Cuba, eluding all pursuit in less than one hour after she entered the port. Such an adventure is commonly achieved in the night, but it is also sometimes performed in broad daylight. I remember that while engaged professionally in the trial of an indictment in the circuit court of the United States, for such a violation of the acts of Congress, a sailor, and a very intelligent witness, swore that he had frequently seen a vessel run into the harbor of Cabinda, send down her topsails on the caps, and clear out with nine hundred slaves on board in half an hour.

A consular passport or sea letter, as it is called, is required by our treaty with Spain, in which its character and purposes are described. Without it a voyage from Havana to the coast of Africa could not be performed, as the vessel could not clear without it. Whatever may be its form, it is considered indispensable. It is a protection against English as well as Spanish cruisers. The English understand that we deny the right of search, and when the sea letter is produced, and appears to be regular, they permit the slaver to proceed on her voyage without being searched, but when our own cruisers overhaul a slaver they proceed to search, and when they find such a cargo as I have described on board, they seize the vessel as a prize, and send her home for a trial. As none but our own cruisers can capture her while she is in possession of this sea letter, she may make nine voyages out of ten to the coast of Africa in safety, and if she be then captured, she has made a fortune for her owners. No very long period has elapsed since the Lady Suffolk, the General De Kalb, the Silenas, and the Jasper, with many other American vessels, have been employed in this infernal traffic in the way I have described.

Sir, it is the duty of this Government to arrest this evil. Every Senator will concur with me in that. But the question is, how can we do it without interfering with the interests of our ship-owners? The right to sell an American ship in a foreign market is a very important right to us. If upon the sale of a vessel in Cuba, a sea letter be refused to the purchaser, the vessel must return home for a new register before she can proceed on a foreign voyage. To deprive her of the sea letter when engaged in legitimate commerce, would be felt as a great evil. But we must either tolerate the slave trade with Cuba, and, in fact, Africanize Cuba ourselves, or we must restrict the issuing of these passports by some means which will effectually prevent the American flag from being abused for the protection of persons engaged in the slave trade.

I see that Mr. Schenck, our late Minister to Brazil, in one of his dispatches to the State Department, proposed to prohibit the issuing of sea letters for any purpose; but it has occurred to me that if an act of Congress were passed, directing the purchaser of an American vessel in Cuba to give bond with sureties in a sufficient sum that the vessel should not before her return to the United States for a register be employed in the slave trade, and should further provide that a large portion, say one half the sum to be exacted for a violation of the condition of the bond, should be given to an informer who should prosecute the slaver to conviction, it would perhaps as effectually stop the traffic as an utter prohibition of the passport, while an honest trader might find it more advantageous to give such a bond to enable him to proceed on a foreign voyage before he returned home for a new register. Other plans for arresting the slave trade have also been suggested, such as the prohibition of all direct trade in the vessels of the United States between Cuba and the coast of Africa, or prohibiting the exportation from Cuba in United States vessels of certain classes or specified articles of merchandise suited only or principally to be used in the traffic for slaves, the employment of small war-steamer of the class called propellers, constantly on the coast of Cuba, and the establishment of consulates on the coast of Africa. Without the adoption of some method for the suppression of the slave trade, it will not be believed abroad that we are sincere when we denounce it as piracy. All these views are proper for the consideration of the Committee on Foreign Relations, but I am not disposed to go into the discussion of them now.

Before I leave the subject of the resolution, it may be well to remark that American ships are always sought for in Havana for the slave trade, and command a higher price when purchased or chartered to be used as slavers than the vessels of any other nation. Hence it is that our countrymen are more deeply implicated as participating in this traffic than either Englishmen or Frenchmen. We have acquired a degree of skill in the construction of ships unequaled by any other nation. The ship-builder has enjoyed ever since the first of January, 1850, when the act of Parliament repealing the British navigation laws went into operation, the British market for the sale of American vessels with the entire monopoly of the American market. The British act of June, 1849, changed the definition of a British ship, not requiring her to be of British build. We have declined to change our navigation laws in this regard, and still require that an American vessel shall be of American build. This is a species of manufacture which has always been protected against foreign competition, not merely by protecting and discriminating duties but by utter prohibition, and yet I believe that the American navigating and commercial interest has generally opposed the tariff for the protection of American manufactures.

But it is not merely the superiority of the American vessel, but the superior character of the American captains for skill, intrepidity, and daring in these hazardous enterprises, that causes them to be employed at higher prices than could be obtained by others. The absence of an effective American naval force at Havana to arrest an American slaver, is also to be considered in connection with the fact that an English cruiser of some description is almost always ready to seize a slaver proceeding under English colors.

In connection with this subject, I desire to make some remarks in regard to an opinion which has been intimated by my honorable friends from Louisiana and Florida, [Mr. SLIDELL and Mr. MALLOTT.] They have both expressed the opinion, and it has gone out to the country, that Spain has it in view, at this time, to Africanize Cuba. When I heard the speech of the honorable Senator from Louisiana I confess that, though differing from him in his conclusions, I was strongly impressed by the statements he made. I was inclined to believe that when facts were set forth so carefully and circumstantially to prove it, there was a disposition manifested at this time on the part of Spain to emancipate the slaves in Cuba. I was disposed also to defer to the superior means of information of the honorable Senator from Louisiana, as well as that of the Senator from Florida; but I beg leave to say to those gentlemen, who are now present, that, after some examination of the subject, I doubt the justice of the conclusions at which they have arrived, and I will venture to give some reasons why I entertain these doubts. I shall be very happy to be converted by them, if in error; but, for the present, from the information before me, the only proof that exists for an American statesman to rely upon, shows that if Cuba is about to become Africanized, it will be by our own vessels and our own crews importing slaves from the coast of Africa, and not by the efforts of Spain or of the Captain General of Cuba.

I have seen, and I presume the honorable Senators to whom I have referred have seen, the Diario de la Marina, published at Havana, of the 4th and 10th instant, and of the 12th instant. Those of the 4th and 10th contain decrees of the Captain General, the Marquis de Pezuela, which order a registration of all the slaves in the island, and at the same time authorize the local authorities, or police officers of the island, to visit plantations where slave labor is employed, for the purpose of ascertaining whether slaves have been imported into the island in violation of the treaties and laws of Spain. The object, sir, proclaimed on the face of these decrees, made under the authority of the Queen, was to stop the slave trade, to arrest the very evil which was brought upon Cuba by our countrymen, as I have already stated. Well, sir, upon visiting those estates the police officers, with the registry in hand of every slave on the plantation, ascertained that a great many additions had been made to the number of negroes, and satisfied themselves that the new comers were blacks imported from Africa, and they were accordingly declared not to be slaves. Then, sir, what was the duty of the Spanish authorities under these circumstances? What was the duty of the man who controlled the government of the island—his duty to God and man? The negroes were free; they never had been slaves; they had been kidnapped, and brought to Cuba by the pirates. They were ignorant, destitute, and utterly incapable of maintaining themselves. They did not know how to work on plantations; they could talk no word of English or Spanish; they could not be understood; and in that wretched condition the Spanish Government in Cuba treated them as free, but for their own preservation it bound them as apprentices for one year, and I think this accounts for the statement to which one of the honorable Senators referred, that the Captain General himself took one of these apprentices. Surely, it was his duty to do so, if—

Mr. SLIDELL. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. CLAYTON. Certainly.

Mr. SLIDELL. In the remarks which I made I did not deal with the attempts of the Captain General to give liberty to persons thus recently introduced into the island. I made no comment on the subject of the apprenticeship of these negroes.

But I did endeavor to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that Spain is now encouraging the importation of barbarian Africans, not as slaves, but as apprentices, and adopting the system of colonization, which, if carried out, will exceed in its horrors anything which has occurred in the annals of the slave trade in former years. I showed, I think, by reference to the instructions on the subject of colonization and immigration, that they were allowed to carry four persons to the ton, somewhat in the proportion of ten to one of those allowed by our law. But I never objected; I made no reference in the way of criticism, or commentary, or disapprobation to the attempt of the Captain General to put an end to the slave trade in the Island of Cuba; but I have denounced the attempt to establish in another form, and under another name, a trade which I thought infinitely more dangerous to us, and quite as cruel to the poor Africans themselves, as the slave trade which existed in former years. I believe the Senator from Florida [Mr. MALLORY] made some allusion to the fact to which the Senator from Delaware referred.

Mr. CLAYTON. I will reply to the point made by the honorable Senator directly; but I wish first to close my remarks in regard to this order of registration, authorizing the police to ascertain whether slaves had been imported into Cuba. The honorable Senator admits there is nothing wrong in that. I am happy to hear it. The Spanish authority has done nothing that it ought not to have done on that score. They have obeyed the dictates of humanity in regard to that registration, and the order for apprenticing the victims of the slave trade.

Then, sir, the honorable Senator tells us that the order has been issued for the colonization of Cuba, and he thinks with African negroes. There, sir, is the point upon which the honorable Senator is mistaken. I have this day seen the order itself, the decree in the Diario de la Marina of the 12th instant; it does not propose to introduce African laborers into Cuba, but free laborers, Spaniards, Chinese, Coolies, and Yucatan Indians. I am assured, and I do verily believe, that nothing is further from the intention of the Spanish Government, at this very time, than to pursue a policy so suicidal, so destructive to her own interests, so injurious to us, and so infamous, as that of attempting to Africanize Cuba by means of the emancipation of the slaves.

The order, or decree, published by the Captain General, I say again, sir, confines the introduction of the free laborers into Cuba, contemplated by it, to Spaniards, Chinese, Coolies, and Yucatan Indians. Why, sir, reflect for a moment—amidst the din that has been raised on this subject—upon what is the interest of Spain. She is not utterly insensible to her own interests. We have offered her one hundred million of dollars for Cuba. She owes eighty millions to England, or rather to British capitalists. She must have become more philanthropic than I have ever heard she was before, and more willing to sacrifice for her philanthropy, if she is willing now to try this experiment. If it is to be done for the purpose of spiting us, it will be the most expensive indulgence of malice I ever heard of. Sir, the Government of Spain is poor; she cannot afford to throw away a hundred millions of dollars. Cuba is not only important to Spain on account of the revenues accruing from it; but because it furnishes the Spaniards of Old Spain the best market in the world for their wheat. It is for that reason, among others, that you can never make an impression on the Spanish Cortes when you offer to purchase the Island of Cuba. It is a greater obstruction in your way, when you attempt to buy Cuba, that that market for wheat exists there, than the whole revenue derived from the island by the Queen and the Government.

A discriminating duty, every one knows, amounting to ten dollars a barrel, is made in the Island of Cuba in favor of Spanish flour, and not only against us, but everybody else. It is for the gratification of the Spanish agriculturists that such an enormous discrimination is made. Do you believe, sir, considering the deep interest which these agriculturists have in the island, in consequence of the fact which I have stated, and the power which they exercise in old Spain, sufficient to crush any administration there, that Spain intends, merely for the purpose of gratifying her malice towards us, to turn loose half a million of brigands in the island, to slaughter, to burn, and to destroy everything before them, and to renew all the horrors of San Domingo? I, for my part, cannot believe it. If my honorable friends who have ventured this opinion cannot bring forward something stronger than anything which I have yet seen introduced, I must take leave to express my dissent, and to say that I believe, at this moment, nothing is further from the intentions of the Spanish Government than to emancipate the slaves in Cuba, which would be attended with the inevitable destruction of their island.

Mr. President, these impressions, honestly entertained, have been now candidly and openly expressed to honorable Senators here. I hold myself, notwithstanding this expression of opinion, open to conviction, if gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber will produce facts to satisfy me that such a thing is contemplated by the Spanish Government at this time, as the utter ruin of that island. I am anxious to get all the information that can be had on the subject, and shall be thankful to any one who will correct any error into which I may have fallen.

Mr. WELLER. I should undoubtedly have objected to the introduction of this resolution this morning, if I had anticipated that the honorable Senator from Delaware contemplated making a speech. The subject, into the discussion of which the honorable Senator from Delaware has deemed it proper to go this morning, has been referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations. That Senator is a member of the committee; and he is aware of the fact that a meeting has been called for to-morrow for the express purpose of passing upon the very subject that he has been debating. I conceive, therefore, that it would have been much more proper for that Senator to have waited until the committee, of which he is a member, had had an opportunity of investigating the facts, and making a report to this body. Upon the resolution being submitted by my friend from Louisiana [Mr. SLIDELL] the other day, the Senator from Ohio [Mr. CHASE] intimated a desire to discuss the question, but he was prevailed upon to withhold the discussion until the subject could be properly brought before us on the report of the Committee on Foreign Relations. The example, however, has this morning been set by one of the oldest members of that committee, of discussing a question which he proposes shall be investigated by the committee in order to get at the facts. Does not every Senator discover that the right way would have been to have the committee first investigate the questions upon which he and the Senator from Louisiana differ? And when the committee shall have submitted the facts, we shall be enabled to enter upon the discussion with an understanding of its merits. But the other course has been adopted. I know it has been the practice in the Senate to introduce a resolution of inquiry merely for the purpose of hanging a speech upon it. That has been the practice; but I give notice now that I shall object to that course hereafter. It is, in my judgment, a practice that would be more honored in the breach than the observance when we have practical questions to dispose of. It would be much better to proceed to the disposition of the public business instead of discussing in advance a question that must be investigated by a standing committee. I appeal, therefore, to the Senate to suffer this whole question to go to the Committee on Foreign Relations; and after they shall have made a report, we can have a full and free interchange of opinions here. But to the Senator from Delaware I must be allowed to say that I think it would have been much more respectful to the members of the committee to which he belongs, if he had abstained from the discussion of this question until we could have met to-morrow, and interchanged opinions amongst ourselves.

Mr. MALLORY. Mr. President, I have been referred to by the honorable Senator from Delaware; and without any desire to engage in the discussion of the subject to which he has alluded at this time, I think it will be proper for me to make a remark or two explanatory, as I conceive, of the points which he has made.

The expediency of restricting the power of our consuls in granting "sea letters" to American vessels, upon their sale to American citizens in foreign countries, upon which the Senator from Delaware has commented, must be evident to every man acquainted with our commercial transactions abroad; and in connection with such transfers, I will remind the honorable Senator, of what he is well aware, that American citizens abroad may purchase foreign vessels, and obtain in addition to the bill of sale or instrument, a transfer, a notarial certificate of property, and that such certificate, though it does not confer upon the vessel thus acquired an American character, makes her American property, and, as such, entitled to all the protection of the flag. Such vessels may engage in the slave trade. Indeed, vessels thus sailed may, under existing laws, engage in our coastwise trade, subject only to the payment of foreign tonnage upon every entrance at our custom-houses.

This question should, I think, go to the Committee on Foreign Relations, in connection with that of sea letters, to which the Senator from Delaware has referred.

Mr. CLAYTON. Certainly.

Mr. MALLORY. Now, sir, I proposed, when I introduced a resolution of inquiry a few days ago, and had it referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, to defer discussion (for I conceive it to be one of the most important which can come before us) until the question shall come up from that committee; but the honorable Senator's remarks may, perhaps, mislead some of us who have not given special attention to this subject. He asks very pertinently what interest has Spain in Africanizing Cuba? Certainly such a course would be suicidal; and it is apparent to all, that so long as she can maintain her possession of the island, her clear and unquestionable interest precludes the consideration of such a course. The violations of private rights alone, apart from all other views, would forever induce an honorable nation to avoid such a calamity. Cuba, the "ever faithful Cuba," is her principal colony, for the Philippines and Porto Rico add but little to the revenues of the Crown. Cuba takes Spain's surplus flour, her oils, wines, and cotton fabrics, and many other articles of her produce and manufacture, and receives in return Cuba's sugar, tobacco, coffee, cigars, &c., giving to Spain profitable employment for outward and homeward voyagers of her shipping, building up her merchant marine, and fostering a valuable school for seamen. This most valuable trade we have, by our unwise attempts at retaliation, aided to build up.

Spain, without seamen or shipping, saw the necessity of discriminating in favor of her own tonnage against that of all other nations, and did so by the imposition of heavier duties upon foreign vessels and their cargoes than upon her own. We, to coerce her into the abandonment of this policy, retaliated by corresponding enactments; enactments which have sent Spanish purchasers to the markets of England, France, and Russia, where no such restrictions upon her tonnage exists; and the result is, that while the Spanish flag is scarcely ever seen in our ports, Cuba imports from Great Britain alone about four millions of her products and manufactures annually in Spanish bottoms.

Such are some of the prominent interests and considerations which must induce Spain to make almost any sacrifice to retain this colony; and unless we can find in her policy, as manifested by her acts and declarations, strong presumptions of a design to Africanize it, it would be as illogical as it would be unjust to her, to entertain the supposition; for to Africanize Cuba, sir, is to arm the beastly and brutal African, fresh from his jungle, thirsting for blood, knowing no law, ignorant of all restraints, and to hurry him on to the slaughter of the white race and the desolation of the island! To Africanize, sir, is to sum up, in one word, those horrors of which the civilized world was ignorant until St. Domingo's fiends, in liberty's name, devised them! I think, sir, a fair review of Spain's policy and present position, with reference to Cuba, will justify our reasonable apprehensions of such a result; and it becomes us to determine whether we shall await its consummation, or by timely and judicious action avert it. Such a review, sir, a calm and dispassionate review, I trust this subject will receive at the hands of the committee.

Sir, I concur in much that the honorable Senator from Delaware has said with reference to American vessels in the slave trade. I deplore it, sir, as much as he does, and would, at almost any cost, desire to see it annihilated. The only two slavers of which I have had any knowledge, were American vessels. One of these, the Jasper, to which the Senator has alluded, came directly from Havana to the coast of Florida, and subsequently, as I learn, delivered a cargo of slaves in Cuba; and, sir, following a suggestion which has been urged with much force in Great Britain with reference to her fleet on the African coast, I cannot doubt that our ships would be more efficiently as well as more economically and safely employed upon the coast of Cuba than upon the coast of Africa, in suppressing this trade.

But, sir, what can the ships of Great Britain and the United States do against the open and unequivocal encouragement and protection extended to the slave trade by the Cuban authorities? Think you, sir, a slaver could land her cargo upon the shores of Cuba, were the authorities, in good faith, using the means at their command to prevent it? No, sir, not one in ten thousand could escape detection. A large portion of Spain's effective Navy patrols the shores of Cuba, while an army of sixteen thousand regular troops form its garrison. Its detectives and spies have proved to be as active and adroit as the days of Fouché ever exhibited, and the Captain General has the means of knowing the character and condition of every negro landed upon the island.

And yet, sir, what are the facts? Why, we well know that Spain, in 1817, solemnly engaged to abolish and prohibit the slave trade, and received from Great Britain as an inducement to do so, and as an equivalent for losses to be incurred by its suppression, four hundred thousand pounds.

This, sir, was thirty-seven years ago; and as, according to the most reliable Cuban statistics, five per cent. of her slaves die annually, notwithstanding all increase by births, it follows that slavery would have been extinct in Cuba seventeen years ago, had Spain redeemed her plighted faith.

It must be remembered that the number of males imported from Africa, greatly exceeds that of the females, and births among them are not in the usual proportion to population.

Now, sir, here we have the startling fact that, in the face of Spain's pledge to abolish the slave trade, it has been carried on steadily throughout this entire period of thirty-seven years, and that the number now on the island is nearly five hundred thousand.

Nor, sir, has there been much concealment about it. The commercial houses engaged in it, and their vessels, have, in years gone by, been as well known in Havana as is the Captain General's palace; and the poll tax upon the slaves, fluctuating with the avarice of succeeding Captains General, is known to have varied from three to five ounces. It has, in fact, been a source of vast revenue to them.

These proceedings have not been unknown to Great Britain. She has publicly and indignantly denounced them, and has obtained, from time to time, the promises, the decrees, and the action of the colonial authorities, apparently conceived in good faith, to remedy the evil. Yet, sir, there it stands—a monument of Spain's treaty pledges!

What, sir, can we do to suppress this trade, so long as this state of things exists in Cuba?

Now, sir, let us not lose sight of the fact that the Creoles of Cuba have no part, no station, voice, or responsibility in its government; that its laws, their exponents, and their executive officers, come from Spain; and that these authorities are responsible alone for the slave trade. The Creoles have, by every means, every remonstrance and argument in their power, pointed out its evils; and they have contemplated with horror its blighting effects upon themselves, and their country, and their posterity.

But, sir, their appeals have never produced the slightest modification of Spain's consistent and determined policy to equalize, numerically, the slaves and the freemen; and if the slave trade has sometimes fluctuated, these fluctuations have ever been produced by this hellish policy alone. Spain well knows that the "ever faithful" Cuba could not be subjected by her standing army, large as it is. And in the language of one of her chosen and most enlightened statesmen, she regards her power of arming the African slaves as equal to an army of a hundred thousand men.

Thus, sir, has Spain encouraged, nursed, and protected the African slave trade, not with the view of Africanizing, but as a means of controlling the island, well knowing that this deadly, blighting policy tends, beyond any other means in her power, to crush her dawning hopes of freedom; and the Cubans, isolated, alone, and unaided, their words, acts, lives, and liberties constrained, fearfully contemplate and ponder upon a struggle whose termination may be the knell of the white race in their lovely land.

But, sir, the honorable Senator from Delaware has referred us to the recent decree of the Cuban authorities for the registration of the slaves as an evidence of their intention faithfully to suppress the trade. It may be so, sir; but, with their consistent encouragement of it heretofore in the face of their treaty, their promises, their mixed commission, and their decrees and apprenticeship system, we may be excused the indulgence of a doubt of their designs now.

I regard this decree, sir, as nothing more than a proof that Great Britain has, with more than her former firmness, demanded action at the hands of the Cuban authorities. Observe the British papers, sir, and you will find a tone upon this subject as unlooked for as it must be startling to Spain. A recent number of the Liverpool Times, in commenting upon Spanish affairs, says:

"In the present state of feeling in England, no great regret would be felt if the Americans were to get possession of Cuba in the scramble. On its present hands, that beautiful island is a source to us of more annoyance than any other place on the globe, Russia not excepted."

Such opinions from the British press have aroused Spain to action, and to them is, in my judgment, to be ascribed her new-born zeal. When we reflect, however, that a similar system, promises and decrees, have been heretofore made and disregarded, we can have but little faith in those of to-day. The emancipados were formerly hired out for seven years; and under the present decree this term is reduced to one year. And, sir, looking at the past, may we not anticipate that the slave trade will progress as it ever has in Cuba since 1817; and that whether Spain shall call the brutal and savage African a slave or an emancipado, she will import him, and maintain him in terror over the Cubans as a means of retaining her ascendancy? It is a means, and perhaps a means as effectual as terrible.

Should Cuba, by her policy, become a second St. Domingo, she would reasonably hope to possess peculiar privileges and commercial relations with it; but, sir, are we to fold our arms and await the operation of causes which are calculated, if not designed, to produce such results? Or are we at once to mark out and adopt a Cuban policy, based upon what we all believe, that the island will ultimately be a flourishing and integral portion of our Union?

Let us discard, for the present at least, the idea of purchasing Cuba. Depend upon it, sir, it is not for sale, nor will it be as long as the Cortes or the people of Catalonia exist. In times of revolution, with some favorite, some "Prince of Peace" at the head of the Government, its peaceful purchase might be effected; but so long as Spain has a stable Government, a proposition to sell Cuba would hurl any ministry, ay, sir, any dynasty, from power.

The individual Spaniard of to-day has all the honor, pride, and character of his glorious ancestors, when Spanish captains and discoverers gave a new continent to Christendom; when her fleets covered the ocean, and when Castilian honor was a conspicuous, a brilliant example. In spite of the examples and the degradations of a court, the most corrupt in Europe—in spite of ages of misgovernment, the Spaniard retains his heroism and his virtue. Such a people will not sacrifice their pride for money.

But, Mr. President, I expect to go into this discussion, and produce some facts on which a dispassionate judgment may be founded, when the Committee on Foreign Relations shall report. I expressed the other day a confident conviction in my own mind that Spain had deliberately entered on the policy of retaining possession of Cuba herself, of course in the first instance, and to Africanize it if she cannot do that; and every enlightened Spaniard on the continent knows and feels that her hold upon it is daily becoming weaker. The prediction of Mr. Adams must come true. In 1823 he said that, just as certainly as an apple parted from the parent limb gravitated to the earth, just so certainly would Cuba come to the United States if separated from the mother country.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. President, the topic which has just been partially discussed was not introduced here originally by me. It was brought here in the first instance by the honorable Senator from Louisiana, [Mr. SLIDELL.] He offered a resolution, and moved to refer it to the Committee on Foreign Relations, as I have now offered this resolution, and moved to refer it to the same committee. He accompanied his resolution with an elaborate speech, and a very able one, in which he gave us much valuable information. He was afterwards followed by the honorable Senator from Florida, [Mr. MALLORY,] who offered another resolution of inquiry, which, on his motion also went to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and he also thought proper to accompany his resolution with suitable remarks, stating after he had done with them, that he would discuss the subject more fully hereafter.

Now, sir, I submit to the honorable Senator from California that I followed good examples. Nothing has ever been more customary on this floor, than for gentlemen to offer resolutions of inquiry with the very view of eliciting such information as they can get from Senators here, before the resolution is sent to a committee. I had the example of a distinguished member of the Committee on Foreign Relations, [Mr. SLIDELL,] of which committee the Senator from California is also a member, for the course which I pursued. The opinions of these distinguished gentlemen to whom I have referred, went to the country; their remarks were published and republished in the newspapers throughout the country. The impression was made deep on the American mind that it was a deliberate purpose of the Spanish Government to emancipate the slaves in Cuba, and thereby Africanize the island. We all agree in deprecating such a result. Well then, sir, was it not a legitimate subject of inquiry with me, and might I not be pardoned. I submit to the honorable Senator from California, when I offered a resolution for the very purpose of enabling me to make such remarks as I thought proper in reference to this subject, and also for the purpose of eliciting from those gentlemen who commenced the debate, such further information as they were able to give us. But the honorable Senator says the committee is to sit to-morrow. Then I should have been exceedingly glad to hear, before the session of the committee, all the remarks of the honorable Senator from Florida, which he promises he will deliver hereafter. I want light. We are perhaps to be called upon to decide to-morrow. Then I want all the information that can be given me from every quarter. The honorable Senator doubtless is better acquainted with the subject than I am, and to him this information may not be necessary, but to me I assure him it is.

Mr. President, in reference to the remarks of the honorable Senator from Florida, let me say that I do not at all deny that the Government of Spain has been in times gone by engaged in violating her own treaty stipulations in regard to the slave trade, and I believe that sometimes her authorities, some of her Captains General have encouraged the introduction of slaves from Africa into that island. But, sir, I will condemn no man without some evidence; and I must say that I have seen no evidence to satisfy my mind, or that of any other reasonable man, that the Marquis Pezuela, the present Captain General of the island, has in any way encouraged this violation of the laws of Spain and the laws of God. On the contrary, I have his solemn assurance in a published proclamation, that the Spanish Government utterly denies the whole accusation. He denies it, appeals solemnly to the whole world, and asks to be credited when he states that nothing is further from the intention of the Spanish Government than this design which is charged against it. Where then is the proof? Does the honorable Senator from Florida produce any? Is the fact that slaves have been introduced into the island proof that they are about to emancipate all the slaves? Have they emancipated slaves? No, sir.

But the honorable Senator says that they have introduced so many slaves, and have so many there now, that it is a serious obstruction to our taking the island. He states that threats have been made, that some one has said that the emancipating of the great number of slaves is a better protection to them than one hundred thousand armed men. It may be so; but that is not pertinent to the matter of our inquiry. The question I discussed, was not whether Spain would be justifiable in emancipating these slaves to prevent our taking the island. I have never been the apologist of Spain. I agree with the honorable Senator that the Government of Spain has been both corrupt and oppressive. I believe that in years gone by the Spanish authorities in Cuba themselves have either been concerned in the business of introducing slaves, or have winked at the introduction of them there. Whether it be calumny or not, it has been published that some of the Captains General of former days actually received doubloons by the head for slaves that were legally imported into Cuba. But that is not the question. It is whether there is any evidence that Spain intends to emancipate these slaves for the purpose of destroying the island now? Is there any evidence of that kind? I submit that if there be any, it has not been adduced.

Mr. President, I believe the day will come when Cuba will be annexed to the United States. At what time this will occur is a question which I am not able to solve. I see no prospect of it now. I see no reason at this time for this Government's interference for the purpose of obtaining it by war or violence of any kind, or by the repeal of our laws of neutrality. I think it a dangerous period to make an effort of that description. There is great excitement at this time in the public mind throughout the United States in reference to the subject of slavery. The day may come—I have thought, in consequence of the proximity of the island to the coast of the United States, that the day must come—when it will be ceded to the United States, if not by Spain, by some friendly nation which shall cede it to us as Louisiana was ceded by France.

As to the fact which has been mentioned by the honorable Senator, that Spain has threatened us with emancipating her slaves if we should seize the island from her by violence, there is no doubt of it. I heard that threat from the lips of the former Spanish Minister here. He boldly and openly avowed the intention to emancipate the slaves, rather than permit us to take the island by violence; but he did not deny that the day would come when this island would be ours.

In conclusion, sir, we must have justifiable grounds before we can seize Cuba, and if there be such, the one now as signed is not among them. Sir, I ask for the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. WELLER. I was not complaining of the Senator from Delaware for having set a bad example. I was complaining that he was following precedents which had been established, to the serious detriment of the public business. I was complaining of that Senator, as a member of the Committee on Foreign Relations, for entering to-day into the discussion of a question which is to be submitted to the investigation of that committee to-morrow.

The Senator says, and I suppose he intends it for irony, of course, that I have paid some attention to this subject, and therefore may not require the information of other Senators. I am sure he meant that as irony.

Mr. CLAYTON. No, sir; not at all.

Mr. WELLER. I have paid no attention to this subject, but I propose first to investigate it, and then to discuss it; and it strikes me that older Senators might profit by following this example, though set by a young man. All that I desire is, that the time of the Senate shall not be unnecessarily consumed in the discussion of a question, when the subject must again come up for a full discussion. When I meet that Senator to-morrow in the Committee on Foreign Relations, I shall be prepared to receive all the information which he may have accumulated on that subject, and I trust each of the other members of that committee will contribute whatever information he may have derived from any source whatever. Then I shall be prepared to pass upon it, and after it is submitted to the Senate, I shall be prepared to enter into the discussion of this question which has been sprung upon us to-day; but I will not consume the time of the Senate now.

Mr. SLIDELL. I have no disposition to enter into the discussion of this question now, as it is evidently the sense of the Senate that this is not the proper time for its discussion. I wish to say, however, that it strikes me, the reference proposed by the honorable Senator from Delaware, is altogether inappropriate. I cannot see what jurisdiction the Committee on Foreign Relations have over the manner of issuing sea-registers to American vessels. The appropriate committee, it seems to me, with all due respect to the Senator from Delaware, for an inquiry into that subject, is the Committee on Commerce. I therefore move to amend the resolution by striking out "Foreign Relations" and inserting "Commerce."

Mr. WELLER. I think the resolution should go to the Committee on Foreign Relations. The subject embraced in the resolution is already before that committee. It is true the whole of our consular system is in the hands of the Committee on Commerce; but the question on which the Senator from Delaware asks the interposition of the Government, is a question which properly belongs to the Committee on Foreign Relations; and, as the subject has already been referred to that committee, I hope the reference proposed by the Senator from Delaware will not be changed.

Mr. CLAYTON. It is not merely a question of commerce; it is a question which belongs to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. SLIDELL. Let the resolution be read again, that I may see whether my amendment be proper or not.

The SECRETARY read the resolution.

Mr. SLIDELL. I withdraw my amendment. The resolution was adopted.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

On the motion of Mr. HUNTER, the House bill making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, for the year ending June 30, 1855, was taken from the table, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed its consideration, the pending question being on the amendment reported by Mr. WALKER, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to insert the following:

To the Creek nation of Indians, in full for all demands against the United States, the sum of $500,000, in payment for eight million acres of land, at six and a quarter cents per acre, taken from the friendly Creeks without compensation, by the treaty or capitulation of Fort Jackson, of August 8, 1814.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. Mr. President, after the elaborate discussion of this claim some two or three weeks since, I must infer that the Senate have acquired something like a general knowledge of its essential and primary features, and that I shall be compelled to advert, in the few remarks which I shall make, only to the objections urged by the chairman of the Committee on Finance [Mr. HUNTER] to the adoption of this amendment.

I understood that Senator, in the discussion of this claim, to confine his objections to the fact that it was an old one. I understood that its antiquity was the principal cause of the objection to it on his part, and that he proceeded in its discussion upon considerations which did not effect at all the merits of the case, but considerations which applied entirely to the great length of time which has occurred since the original inception of the claim. I understood that Senator further to say, that another branch of the claim, which has been satisfied, after the lapse of more than a quarter of a century, had been referred, together with this, to the Committee of Ways and Means of the House of Representatives in 1817, and had been decided against by that committee, and again rejected by them in 1824. That supposition of his, plausible as it was, is not borne out by the documents; and inasmuch as that is the chief objection which he urges to the adoption of the claim, I will merely read the documents to which he referred, for the purpose of showing that the two branches of the claim were not before those committees when it was considered, and that this claim has never been considered by the Senate, or by the other House of Congress; nor has it ever been the subject of consideration by the committee of any one House of Congress, until it was brought before us at the present session. The first document from which I will read is the report of Mr. Lowndes, from the Committee of Ways and Means, made on the 20th of January, 1817. The caption of that report, which refers to the subject-matter before the committee for investigation, expressly defines the character of that subject-matter. The committee say that they had had under consideration a resolution

"Instructing them to inquire into the expediency of making an appropriation to satisfy the claims of the friendly Creek Indians, whose property was plundered by the hostile Creeks, in consequence of their attachment to the United States."

The precise and definite terms in which the committee thus state the subject-matter before them, excludes the idea that this claim was considered before them. Equally conclusive is the language of the report made in 1824 by Mr. McLane. The conclusion of that report is, equally as definite, equally as positive, and shows that the subject of the appropriation now asked for was not before the committee at that time. Consequently, the adverse report made by Mr. McLane in 1824—whose great name and eminent qualifications as head of the Committee of Ways and Means were very appropriately referred to by the Senator from Virginia—on which that Senator relied as casting some suspicion and doubt upon the history of this claim, had no reference to the subject of the amendment which we are now discussing. At the conclusion of that report, in which they refer to the main features of the claim before them, the committee say:

"It is inexpedient to make any further appropriation to compensate the friendly Creek Indians for property lost and destroyed during the late Creek war."

In addition to this, I will refer to a letter which was addressed by the chief clerk of the War Department, in 1817, to Mr. Hawkins, who was at that time the acting agent for the Creek Indians, asking that officer, who was contemporary with the history of the transactions in which this claim originated, as to the precise nature of the claims which the Creeks were at that time preferring against the United States Government. He was interrogated as to "the nature and extent of the indemnity which the friendly chiefs claim in consequence of the letter addressed by General Pinckney, on the 23d April, 1814?" In response he said:

"I believe the correct way would be to liquidate the claims of individuals, some of which, I am told, are too high; reduce them to a just value, and pay them. If it were a national claim, a cession of land might be desirable; but to individuals it is otherwise."

That response, taken in connection with the interrogatory to which it refers, is about as definite an indication as the English language is capable of, showing that the claim for spoils and property destroyed by the hostile Creeks in the war of 1814, was the only claim and the only grievance brought to the consideration of the committee in 1817, at the time when a partial payment of $85,000 was made upon that claim; and subsequently, in 1824, when the committee decided that the appropriation which had already been made was an ample satisfaction, and covered the full extent of the expectations which the friendly Creeks had entertained of redress from the United States. These documents therefore, being the language of these committees themselves, and the language of the agent from whom they derived their principal information, show that the claim to which the Senator referred the other day as having been reported against in 1824, was not the claim which is now brought forward.

I presume that the Senate perfectly understand that, at the termination of the war of 1814, there were two characters of claims arising. One was national in its character for this spoliation of territory. The other was a claim of indemnity to individuals for the separate losses which they had sustained by the hostile Creeks. One was for property destroyed; for homes burnt; for personal property which had been taken for public uses, and these claims to compensation were individual in their character, because they belonged separately to individuals in precise proportion to the losses which they had sustained. But in addition to that we are informed by the record, which throws further light on the history of this whole transaction, that General Jackson in the terms of the capitulation, extorted, or rather forced from the friendly Creeks, upwards of eight millions of acres of land, which he avowedly without excuse or palliation, without any pretext that he had ever compensated by one cent, took alone for political reasons "interesting to the United States." That is the report of General Jackson himself, afterwards made to the Government of his conduct in that capitulation. One claim, therefore, which has been settled and paid, and against which the committee reported in 1824, was this individual claim of the Creeks for personal property destroyed. The other was the claim of the nation for an empire which was swept away from them by a forced and arbitrary capitulation, and which it is not pretended has ever been paid for by the Government. It is not shown that this claim was ever brought to the consideration of Congress before.

The history which the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. BELL] gave of it on a previous day is a most emphatic, clear, and lucid explanation of those considerations which have prevented the Creeks from bringing forward the claim until this late day. Sir, there was enough in the poverty of that tribe, in their intestine wars and divisions, in the utter incapacity of their nation to act with anything like concert or unity of decision, to show why they have never concurred in presenting this claim before. Moreover, while the other claim between them and the United States was not settled; while they were prosecuting, as suppliants at our doors, a claim which they did not succeed in obtaining until nearly forty years, is it singular that they did not press the Government of the United States for the allowance of this second claim, when one was already on hand?

These are the main facts upon which I rely as a defense to the argument of the Senator from Virginia. I believe that no one has ever contended, I believe that it cannot be successfully contended now, but that on the part of the United States, for political reasons alone, there was a naked and unapologetic for confiscation of about eight millions of acres of land from our allies—not from the hostile party. It will be recollected that, by the instructions which emanated from the War Department, and which were the basis upon which peace was to be concluded with the hostiles, lands were to be taken out of the conquered country for indemnity, and not to be taken by spoliation from our allies and friends in that war. General Jackson seems to have been so conscious of the fact that he had exceeded these just instructions, that when he speaks of the eight millions of acres acquired from the friendly Creeks, in addition to twelve or fourteen millions taken from the hostile Creeks as indemnity, he apologized by saying, not that he had taken them without consideration, by the terms of the capitulation, but that he had procured a cession of eight millions of acres of land from the friendly Creeks, which was justified by considerations interesting to the future peace and welfare of the United States in connection with our southwestern frontier.

Now, sir, contrary to what had been expected by the commanding general, contrary to what had been calculated by the War Department, when the instructions for the termination of this war were issued, contrary to all rules of propriety, the friendly Indians were called upon to be the capitulating party. The truth was, that at that time the war was not ended; the capitulation was premature, and was in the nature of a forced treaty exacted from the friends of the United States, with but one of their enemies present. This is the difficulty in the proceedings attending the capitulation.

The committee, in making an allowance to the Creek Indians in this case, have allotted to them what was considered an average of the price which the United States had paid for Indian lands heretofore. I believe of late years that has been from six and a quarter cents up to twelve and a half cents. The committee have allowed them the minimum of consideration which has been allowed as the price of Indian lands acquired by treaty. Surely, after the lapse of forty years, the allowance of this small amount for a tract of country which embraces, at present, one third of the great State of Georgia, will not be considered extravagant.

I proceed on the supposition that the long silence of these claimants in bringing forward this claim has been perfectly accounted for; and, however suspicious it may be, however impossible it may be, to account for the fact that during all the time they have made treaties, the records of the Government show they have never brought forward this claim; yet those records show, most unequivocally, that if there be any defense at all against this claim, it arises from the fact that this long silence may be evidence that, on the part of the Creeks, they had abandoned, in consequence of the difficulties in prosecuting their other claim, all hopes of ever prosecuting justice for this. How otherwise could it be, when they had prosecuted in vain their suit for claims for spoiliations, promised to be satisfied by the express terms of the letter of General Pinckney, in 1814? How, otherwise, can we account for it, when we recollect that a United States agent, an accredited man, indorsed by the act of this Government, sent among them to ascertain a plain, subsisting debt, reported that claim, and yet it was impossible to obtain the consideration of it before Congress for forty years? Such was the desperate condition, such appeared to be the hopeless character, of all the claims, that it was useless, obviously so, on their part to thrust unwelcomely on Congress the consideration of one claim, while they were so unjustly withholding the consideration of another. Just as soon as long-withheld justice was extended to them for their other claim, they come forward, candidly, frankly, and openly, and say they have delayed bringing forward this claim for no other reason than from the fact that their own internal difficulties, their poverty, and the difficulty of obtaining justice for the other branch of the claim, rendered them almost hopeless as to obtaining any justice for this.

Now, sir, after the years which have elapsed between 1814 and 1854, here stands upon the records of this Government—records made out by our own officials—the clear history of a transaction which inflicted injustice upon these Indians, which has not been remedied to this day. In all the treaties which have been made with this people since then, their internal difficulties have prevented anything like a unanimous declaration of this claim upon the part of the authorities of the whole nation. The history of this tribe is peculiar; their social and political constitution is peculiar, and there has been scarcely any one object of national benefit, upon which the whole nation could be brought to unite, with anything like a decision approaching unanimity.

Mr. President, I feel that I am hardly able, at this time, to go into an enlarged discussion of this question. I feel that it would be unnecessary. The Senate is obviously wearied with the long discussion of this bill. It is a subject which is proverbially uninteresting to both branches of Congress, and must necessarily be so. I shall waive my own desire to go into it, and accommodate myself to what I understand to be the clear disposition of the Senate—to proceed to a vote upon this bill, embracing this with other amendments.

I have thus briefly, Mr. President, replied to the Senator from Virginia. I have shown that by the records of the Government on which he himself relied, this claim has never before been considered by Congress, and that consequently it is free from the objection arising out of the fact, that the report in 1824 was supposed to be adverse to this claim, when it was not actually embraced in it. With these remarks I submit the question to the Senate.

Mr. CASS. I wish to ask the honorable Senator from Arkansas, whether there is any means of ascertaining precisely how much of the land of the friendly Indians was taken?

Mr. SEBASTIAN. There is a report made by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WALKER] on the part of the Committee on Indian Affairs, on the subject. That report is accompanied by a map, which is in the possession of the Committee on Indian Affairs at this time, and which I have not thought it necessary to bring before the Senate, made out at the Department of the Interior upon a letter furnished by the General Land Office, by which it appears that something like eight millions of acres were taken from the friendly Creeks.

Mr. HUNTER. Mr. President, if these empty chairs could vote, I should like to say a few words in reply to the Senator from Arkansas; but as I believe there is no one here but yourself and ourselves, and we have made up our minds, I will refrain from saying anything more on this subject, except that the Senator is mistaken in regard to the point that this land was taken only from the friendly Indians. I understand from the Senator from Alabama, [Mr. FITZPATRICK,] who is well acquainted with the geographical location of these lands, that there were lands taken from the hostile Indians comprehending now some of the finest counties in Alabama, and given to the friendly Indians in exchange for the land taken from them, and which it was necessary to take in order to interpose a barrier between them and the Spaniards in Florida; so that, in point of fact, they had better lands substituted in place of the lands taken from them. Now, sir, in regard to the reports referred to; it is obvious that Mr. Lowndes must have contemplated this very claim for land, because he quoted the memorandum which the Indians always set up as their part of the treaty, in which the whole complaint made is in regard to the lands, that their lands were taken away, without adverting to the fact that they received other lands, and better lands, from the hostile Creeks higher up.

Mr. CASS. I am perfectly well satisfied that, so far as General Jackson took the land of the hostile Creeks, who were prostrated in a state of war, and a war commenced by themselves, under the most improper circumstances, he had a right to take any portion of the country he pleased. But when you come to the friendly Indians, those who had adhered to us faithfully, it presents a very different aspect, and I think it exceedingly improper and irregular to take an acre from them when they had been our friends from the commencement. They had brought themselves into a state of hostility with their brethren on that very account. The turning point with me is, to know how much the friendly Creeks actually lost. If they lost an acre I am willing to pay them for it; if they lost a million of acres, I am willing to give them a full consideration.

Mr. WALKER. I have in my possession a statement from the Department of the Interior, made up, I suppose, from the actual surveys of the country as now known to exist; and it shows, not that eight millions of acres were taken, but that over thirteen millions of acres were taken. We have compromised the matter by coming down to eight millions, and then reducing the price proposed to be paid, from that recommended by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, twenty cents, to six and a quarter cents an acre.

Mr. CASS. I wish to inquire as to the fact stated by the Senator from Virginia, whether the Indians received a compensation in any way for the land which was taken?

Mr. WALKER. I was just coming to that point. The plain answer to that is one which I gave when I was discussing this subject before. It will be found, on reference to the paper which was drawn up on the part of the Indians, signed by them, and submitted at the time as their part of the treaty, and which they requested should be sent on to the Government here, and was sent on; that they assert that the Lower Creeks, inhabiting the lower portion of the country, and occupying the towns of Coweta and others, were the owners of the whole country, not only of that which the hostiles had not invaded, and which had not been in a state of insurrection, but that they owned the upper country also. They assert that the people who were there then, and who were hostile to them and to the United States, were not originally Muscogee or Creek Indians, but fugitive tribes, who had been permitted by the Muscogeans to come upon that upper country, and occupy it by grace and favor. After they got possession of it they were induced, under the seductions of Tecumseh, who went down and sent his agents among them, to make war in favor of England against the United States, and against the friendly or Lower Creeks, who would not join them in their opposition to the United States. The Lower Creeks, who asserted in this part of the treaty, that they were the owners of the whole country, took up arms with the United States, and for a considerable portion of time were under the command of United States officers, and under the American flag, fighting against their revolting brethren or friends, and in favor of the United States.

Then it seems that the upper tribes called the Upper Creeks were never, in point of fact, Muscogee or real Creek Indians at all. They never were a portion of that nation. They were there by sufferance. Well, what became of them? When General Jackson undertook to assemble them for the purpose of making this treaty or capitulation, they made their escape. But one hostile chief met General Jackson at Fort Jackson. The rest had fled. Where had they gone to? They went over to Florida, and joined the Semi-noses, and, I understand, that term itself signifies "runaways." They became ingrafted with the other Seminoles or runaway Indians; and there most of them have remained ever since. What was given pretensively at the time, in lieu of the lands taken under the capitulation, was this upper country, lying between the Coosa and Tallapoosa rivers. But how could it be said to be given to the Lower Creeks? It was already theirs. The upper Indians had occupied it merely by sufferance, by permission of the Lower Creeks, who were the real owners of the country.

Mr. HUNTER. The Senator makes that statement on the authority of the Indians themselves, who are interested parties. Now I understand that the Senator from Alabama, who lived in that country, says it did belong to the hostile Creeks.

Mr. WALKER. Let me assure the Senator from Virginia that I do not make the statement upon the authority of the Indians, the interested parties, but upon the concession of agent Hawkins, of General Pinckney, and of the various documents which are set out in the memorial, and in the report which I have in manuscript. These documents are found to run through a long period embraced in the American State Papers on Indian affairs. I deduce it from such authority as that. I never spoke with one of these Indians in my life.

Mr. HUNTER. I do not say that the Senator spoke with the Indians; but he takes the statement from the assertions of the Indians. I think he is altogether mistaken as to the assertions of Pinckney and Hawkins.

Mr. WALKER. Not at all. If the Senator will examine the case, he will find that agent Hawkins states that when General Jackson thought he was giving them an equivalent, they denied that he was doing so; and he adds, that he concurs with them in opinion. General Pinckney, who previously held the command, and who, it was supposed, would make the capitulation, held a very different doctrine, and promised very different terms. It was not at all wonderful that the Indians were overwhelmed with astonishment when, after having fought by the side of the Americans, under the American flag, and with American commanders, they found themselves converted into the position of enemies, and made to stand off in the capacity of parties capitulating as enemies, and were forced to give up their country. In addition to this, it was alleged that they were remunerated, when they were left only a small portion of the country which was originally theirs, and of which they had never been divested. The position which they occupied in respect to it was just this: They could at any time, under the custom of the Indian tribes, if they had the power, have driven off these interlopers, these intruders upon the upper country, and it would have been theirs. They could have put an end to the tenancy at sufferance, and told the hostiles to abandon the country. After the friendly Creeks and the Americans whipped them, they did abandon it; and the hostiles were not occupying the country at the time General Jackson, in the capitulation, left it to the friendly Indians, as he alleged, by way of equivalent for the lands which he made them capitulate away.

Mr. DAWSON. I understand the Senator from Wisconsin to say that there was but a single hostile chief who entered into that capitulation.

Mr. WALKER. Yes, sir.

Mr. DAWSON. Then the friendly Creeks themselves surrendered the land. They were headed by McIntosh and Big Warrior, whom I knew as well as I know you, Mr. President. McIntosh and his party were very intelligent and well informed men. He went on and made treaties after that, from year to year, down to the treaty of Indian Spring, in 1825. He was there, and aided in making that treaty of 1825; and, in consequence of it, he lost his life. In all the treaties, from 1814 down to the last treaty made by these Indians, all the matters of difference between them and the whites, and all the claims on their side, were entered into. But no claim was presented under these treaties, in any form or shape, for any loss which they had sustained from the General Government under this capitulation of 1814. By the treaty of Indian Spring, they ceded their entire country in Georgia; but there was not a word said then about this claim. All seemed to be perfectly satisfied and quiet. What right have the hostiles in the war of 1814 to complain? They did not make that treaty; they cannot claim anything at all; and the friendly Creeks have never claimed anything in their treaties. Then, what I want to know is, how is it that the Government of the United States should be indebted to this people $500,000, when they never presented the claim in any of their treaties?

Mr. WALKER. I concede there were treaties made at different periods, from 1825, I believe, down to as late as 1837; but it will be found, if the Senator from Georgia will advert to those treaties, that they were all treaties of cession. He asked me why in none of these treaties of cession did they not set up and assert this claim? That has been answered in two ways.

Mr. DAWSON. I am as much disposed to do justice to these people as any gentleman on this floor; and at this point I desire to make an explanation. We know that the treaty of Indian Spring was made with these Indians, but it was abrogated by the administration of Mr. Adams. At a subsequent time these very Indians came to the city of Washington and here made a treaty of cession; and all the claims and difficulties connected with the treaty of Indian Spring were reviewed, and a satisfactory treaty made, closing up all the concerns between the whites and these Indians. In the treaty made here in Washington city, and other treaties made under the eyes of General Jackson and Mr. Adams, at different times, how is it that this claim, of which General Jackson must have been well-informed in 1814, was never alluded to in them? I hold in my hand all the treaties. I have reviewed them for the purpose of satisfying my own mind as to the propriety of voting for this appropriation. As anxious as I am, as desirous as I am to do justice to these people, whom I have known from my earliest recollection, I cannot find a single ground on which to justify myself in voting away the public money, as proposed in this amendment. Hence I have asked, from time to time, those who have investigated the question, to look to all these treaties, to go over them, and tell me why it is that their whole country has been ceded, and all difficulties closed between the two nations, and yet this claim sprung up at this late day?

Mr. WALKER. It is conceded that while the treaties which have been spoken of were made between 1814 and 1837, this claim was not reasserted in the negotiations with the Government. Why was it not done? We have attempted to answer that in two ways. In the first place, the Senator will find that not only was the claim which is now asserted pending between the Government and these Indians, but another one, which has not been denied by the Government, was also pending. Now, let me ask him, can he find in any of those treaties any allusion to the large amount of money which you appropriated and paid to the Indians only two years ago? And yet, by estopping the Indians on this claim, he would estop them in their right to that money just as much as he would to this. He will find that the treaties maintain a silence in regard to both; and if his view on this point be correct, he would cut off that claim as much as this. But, sir, did they conceive themselves estopped, by the making of those treaties, from asserting their claim to the money which we paid two years ago? Not at all; but they continued to make the claim, and long since the last treaty was made, long since these people were settled west of the Mississippi, and only two years ago, we appropriated the money and paid it to them. The Senate will observe, also, that the Indians, at the very inception of this matter, laid down in the most solemn form they could, their claim to right in the matter. They laid down their demand in what they always have claimed to be their part of the treaty. It never has been complied with. They asserted their rights in conformity with the provisions of that protocol; and the only answer which General Jackson gave to it, was, "That is immaterial to me; I cannot help what you view as your rights; I do not deny that you are the owners of the soil, and that your children have a right to it; but I say that there are political considerations sufficiently strong to warrant me in taking this country." Those political reasons have been mentioned before. He did take the country. When they found that General Jackson set his foot down and was determined to have the kind of capitulation which he compelled them to submit to, the most they could do was to ask permission to put in an enduring form their understanding of their rights. They put it in that form.

The document was sent on to this city, became a part of the archives of the country, and is so yet. Having asserted their rights at that early day, and in that permanent form, it is not wonderful that they have not continued at every point of negotiation to reassert their claims in this respect.

It will be found by the honorable Senator that all their subsequent negotiations were in respect to other country, not embraced, of course, within the country covered by the capitulation of 1814. They were all the time treating in regard to other country, and most of the time in regard to that which General Jackson pretended to have left to them as an equivalent—that lying in the upper portion of their original country. The Government bought portions of it from them from time to time, and it was in relation to it that they were treating, and not in reference to the country in the lower portion of Alabama and Georgia. While they were negotiating these treaties, they had nothing to do with this original claim. They had enough on their hands with the Government to enforce, if possible, the claims for spoiliations, which had been committed on them, and which the Government, beyond all doubt, had promised to pay them for.

These were the difficulties under which they labored during the time this matter has been pending. The inferences drawn by the Senator from Georgia are only such as would go against this claim because of its age. If the Senator is disposed to set up lapse of time as a barrier to this claim, that argument is all potent; but if he applies it by way of an estoppel to their rights, there is a complete replication to that in the fact that they had in a more solemn form asserted their rights; they never abandoned them; and he cannot show where they abandoned them in the treaties; but they have stood upon that original assertion of their rights; and since the claim for damages to their personal property has been settled, they come forward now and demand that which they then deemed themselves entitled to in reference to their real estate. That is the view I have taken of it; but if the statute of limitations is to be applied against the Indians, of course they are gone.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. If I understand, Mr. President, the precise character of the objection, or the foundation for the doubts in the mind of the Senator from Georgia, it is that no mention was made of this claim in the treaty with the Creeks in 1821. I believe that was called the treaty of the Broken Arrow; again, in the treaty of 1825, properly known by the name of the treaty of Indian Spring, and which created such dissatisfaction in the nation that a portion of the friendly Creeks, and all the hostiles, arose and burnt General McIntosh, who was the negotiator of that treaty, and induced the Government, during Mr. Adams's administration, to conciliate the Indians by making a treaty in 1826, by which it was acknowledged that the treaty of 1825 was invalid, and that it was made against the consent of the authorities of the nation. These treaties, in addition to the final treaty, which, I believe, was made in 1830, the Senator says were made without any mention or recognition of this claim, and without containing any allusion, on the part of the Indians, to the fact that they preferred, or had such a claim in existence.

Now, in answer to that, I will allude to one solitary fact, to show, that, notwithstanding the presumption arising out of their silence upon the record, this claim had its existence among the Indians themselves, during the whole period from 1814 up to the time when they actually presented the claim. That fact is this: In 1842, when the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. BELL] was presiding at the head of the War Department, an agent of the Government was sent among all the Indian tribes to ascertain if there were upon their part any unsatisfied grievances, any claims which had not been properly attended to. When that agent, Mr. Hitchcock, who afterwards made an interesting report of all his proceedings, went to the Creek nation, and called the Creek's together in council around him, one of the chiefs, who was the speaker on that occasion, Opothleyoholo, a name which is familiar in connection with the history of the Creek war of 1814, arose, and spoke of this very claim for land as one of the unsatisfied claims of the Creek nation against the United States at that time. That was as late as 1842. I only mention this fact to show that the claim was never abandoned on the part of the Creeks; but, however hopeless, however desperate the difficulties in prosecuting their other claim may have rendered them in regard to this, yet they never abandoned it, but it lived during all the discontents of the nation, and never was forgotten. This fact is well attested by the report of Mr. Hitchcock, in 1842, a long time after the conclusion of these treaties, the silence of which on this claim is inferred by the Senator from Georgia to be conclusive evidence that it never existed.

I will mention another fact also. Congress, by the act of 1852 and the act of 1817, did acknowledge the obligation of this Government to satisfy and perform the promises which were held out in the letter of 23d April, 1814, written by General Pinckney to the friendly Creeks, as inducements to the hostiles to come in and capitulate. That claim was prosecuted here, and was preferred by delegation after delegation, sent here at intervals of two or three years, for thirty or forty years consecutively; the justice of it was afterwards acknowledged by Congress. The records of its prosecution are contained on the files of the Indian department. It was preferred by authorized delegations, year after year; and yet it was just as remarkably omitted in all treaties, as was this national claim for the spoliation of their lands. I mention this to show that the failure on the part of the United States to recognize these claims in their treaties constitutes no evidence at all that the Indians ever abandoned them. It shows that, so far as they were concerned, we cannot, without the greatest injustice, infer an abandonment of the claim from the simple fact that the treaties which they concluded with the Government, in the mean time, are silent on the subject.

Now, sir, I will advert to a fact, for the satisfaction of the Senator from Michigan. I will state here the official record of the considerations which induced General Jackson, on the one part, to demand, and the friendly Creeks, on the other part, to assent to the terms of this extraordinary treaty of capitulation. This is the report of Colonel Hawkins, an old and trusted agent of the Creek Indians, appointed by General Washington.

Mr. CASS. I know him well.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. Perhaps he was one of the most fair and honest men that ever officiated in that department. He was present at the time the treaty was formed; and he says, speaking of it, that General Jackson had not only, in conformity with his instructions, taken the portion of the hostile country embraced in the present State of Alabama, as an indemnity for the war, but, by a line produced into the State of Georgia, had taken about eight millions of acres of land notoriously the property of the friendly Creek Indians. He speaks of it in this way:

"It struck me forcibly at the time that the General, who was authorized only to retain lands conquered from the hostiles to indemnify the United States for the expenses of the war, should take nearly eight millions of acres from the friendly Indians, over and above all the hunting grounds of the friendly Upper Creeks, giving, without consulting them, what he called an equivalent, which they did not deem such, and did not feel himself authorized to adjust this equitable claim of theirs."

It will be seen what excellent diplomatists the Indians were on an occasion of that kind; how they saw through the absurdity of the pretension of General Jackson, that he could take lands from them for political reasons, while at the same time they saw no correlative power on his part to indemnify them; and that whereas his instructions, extended only to retaining lands out of the conquered country, he could overstep his instructions, and take eight millions of acres of land, not as indemnity, but merely for the purpose of answering certain political objects "interesting to the United States." These political reasons, however satisfactory they were, however conclusive an apology they were on the part of General Jackson for extorting such a treaty—and they were valid for that purpose—contain no argument why we should not make compensation. It was necessary of course that a broad belt of country settled by the whites should be interposed between the hostile Creeks on the one hand, and the Seminoles and Spaniards in Florida on the other; but however necessary it was to General Jackson for this reason to take that strip of country, it formed no reason in the world, as the Indians say, why we should not pay for it.

The result was, it seems, at last, being prostrated, not being admitted to discuss the terms of the treaty at all, reluctantly acquiescing and stating to General Jackson that they were friends, that there were no hostile chiefs present for the purpose of arranging the terms of capitulation, they submitted to the running of these lines, although by so doing they permitted a spoliation of eight or ten millions of acres out of their country, on condition that he would allow them to append something in the nature of a supplement or protocol to the treaty, in which they should assert their claims under the letter of General Pinckney to be protected, and declare also the great wrong done to them by this act of his, and be allowed to express their reliance and firm confidence in the justice of the United States—a confidence which has not been redeemed from that day to this, except as to compensation for their property destroyed, leaving this great national claim entirely unredeemed and unprovided for from that day to this.

I have shown before that they have kept the history of this claim alive through the traditionary discontents of their nation; that they have never abandoned it, although their conduct was such as to show that they had little hope during the time that they prosecuted the other claim of obtaining satisfaction for this. General Jackson, when asked why he transcended his instructions, and took the lands from the friendly Creeks, instead of the hostile Indians, answered:

"He did it from political motives—to prevent an intercourse between the Indians and the Spaniards and English in the Floridas; to have a border to know and separate his enemies from his friends, which was as beneficial to the friendly Indians as to the United States; and also gave the friendly Indians the lands in the fork of Tallapoosa and Coosa."

These considerations, as I have said, were very satisfactory to General Jackson; and it is not to be wondered at that he told the friendly Indians that the spoliation he committed against them was for their benefit. They could not exactly see the propriety of the logic by which he came to this conclusion. They could see that it was for the benefit of the United States; but, separated as it was from any compensation to them, they never yielded their consent to it. That consideration, however important it was to the United States, was not important to the Indians. It was of no advantage to them that the hostiles should be separated from the discontented Seminoles and the British and Spanish emissaries in Florida; but General Jackson did say to them that he gave them what he called an equivalent. It consisted of lands which, according to the stipulation, were to be assigned to the hostiles, and left to them in the forks of the Tallapoosa and Coosa. As to that equivalent, I have to say, that the Committee on Indian Affairs have a map which shows relatively the size of the country which was taken from them, and the size of the country which was said to be an equivalent. The amount taken covers upon that map probably much more than is covered by a page of the book from which I read, [the State Papers—a large octavo,] while the amount of territory which he called an equivalent, and which was given over to the possession of the hostiles, and not the friendly Creeks, would be covered by the size of a Spanish dollar.

I do not suppose there were more than one hundred thousand or two hundred thousand acres in the forks, between the Coosa and the Tallapoosa—lands which were supposed to be an equivalent for eight or ten millions of acres, and not given exclusively to the friendly Indians, but lands on which he allowed the hostiles to remain. That brought forth from the speaker on that occasion, the Big Warrior, an exclamation which was most natural under the circumstances:

"The speaker asked where the hostiles were to be placed if he took all their land? His answer was, you have room enough to take them among you. The speaker said the war was not yet settled, and they were called on for lands to pay the expenses of it: and before it was settled, he supposed there would be another call. The general replied, he would take upon himself to settle it, if it lasted twenty years, without calling for any more land."

That was the most natural exclamation in the world, when he was taking eight million acres of land from his allies, the friendly Creeks, and giving them what he called a compensation or equivalent, some one hundred thousand or two hundred thousand acres, lying in the middle of the country conquered from the hostiles, on which they were indiscriminately to be placed with the hostiles. It is no wonder, therefore, they did not regard it as an equivalent; it is no wonder that they regarded this whole diplomacy as extraordinary, as unwarranted by the instructions of General Jackson; equally unjust to them, and a violation of the terms of the letter of General Pinckney, who had assured them of a very different course of treatment; for he had required the hostiles to come in. I hope these explanations are satisfactory to the Senate.

Mr. BROWN. I am inclined to think that I shall vote for this amendment; and I desire to state in a few words why I shall do it. It seems to be admitted on all hands that we took about eight millions of acres of land from these Indians. It is asserted on the part of the Indians that we never paid anything for it. Now, if the Government takes the ground that it has paid for it, I apprehend it devolves on the Government to show that fact to be true. The Indians assert, and we admit, that we got the land. They say we paid nothing for it; and clearly, if that be so, we ought to pay something for it. If we ever have paid, I repeat, the onus is upon us to show that we have paid it, and how we paid it.

The only suggestion against the claim, which I hear from any quarter, comes from the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. HUNTER,] and it is, that we gave the Indians an equivalent in other lands. Did they agree to take it? I suppose trading between the Indians and the United States to be regulated by the same laws as govern two civilized men or nations—there must be an agreement. Is there any pretense that the Indians ever agreed to take this country? Did they not protest against it at the time as being no equivalent for the country which was wrested from them? I understand they did. The Senator from Virginia shakes his head. I understand the Indians said at the time that the arrangement did not suit them; but when General Jackson urged it upon them, and assigned what were said to be political reasons—and what I think were very good reasons, too—for making that arrangement, they finally consented to it under duress—not as a voluntary thing, but with a promise that they should have compensation thereafter.

The honorable Senator from Michigan asks if other lands were not given them in exchange? If other lands had been given to the Indians, and they had agreed to take them, there was a closing up of the transaction; but even if they got other lands outside of the Indian country, to which neither hostiles nor friendly Creeks had any claim, was that an equivalent? When have you ever bought out Indians that you have not given them other lands? Was it any equivalent to the Choctaws and Chickasaws, when you purchased them out in Mississippi, to the Cherokees in Georgia, and other large tribes, and sent west, that you gave them homes there for the homes they abandoned? May you take an Indian tribe's home from them, drive them out from their camps, break up all their family arrangements, and send them into a new country, because you give them other lands in place of those which you take? It is the first time I ever heard the pretense assumed. You always give them other lands, but you also pay them for the lands which they have left. That was the course which you pursued with the Choctaws, with the Chickasaws, with the Cherokees, and with every other tribe which you have emigrated. I see no reason why the same course should not have been pursued with the Creeks, and especially with the friendly Creeks.

But I simply rose to say that my mind was upon this point, that if we took the land, as is asserted, and have paid nothing for it, we ought to pay for it now. As to setting up the statute of limitation against the Indians, it is all humbug. This Government is the last on earth that ought to talk about the statute of limitation; for who does not know that claims are before us for ten, twenty, thirty, forty, and fifty years, as just claims, as possibly can be made, and finally are abandoned and given up in despair, because Congress cannot be induced to act upon them? And shall we take advantage of our own wrong; and because we did not do right forty years ago, and have not done right between that period and now, shall we refuse, after forty or a hundred years more, to do right? The question with me is not whether there has been delay in this transaction, (because delay would only convince me that we ought now to do what we ought to have done before,) but translating ourselves back to the point of beginning, what ought to have been done in reference to this tribe of Indians at the time they were induced to surrender the lands. If we took eight millions of acres of land, we ought to pay for it. If we have not paid for it, we ought to do it now.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Mr. President, I did not intend to say anything on the question now under consideration, but as I have been referred to by the honorable Senator from Virginia, [Mr. HUNTER], it becomes necessary that I should make a few observations upon the amendment before the Senate.

Sir, I was raised upon the borders of the country of these Indians. My boyhood was spent on their eastern border when the Ocmulgee river was the dividing line between the State of Georgia and the Creek tribe of Indians. At the close of the war in 1815, when still quite a youth, I removed to the State of Alabama, and settled within a few miles of where I now reside, at what was then called Fort Jackson, the point at which this treaty was made, and where General Jackson closed the war with the Creek tribe of Indians in 1814. I lived for the first year after I removed there literally among the Indians. I knew nearly all their leading men, and especially many of those whose names are affixed to the treaty. My sympathies are with the Indians, and particularly with that tribe of Indians for whose benefit this appropriation is proposed, about whom I know much. I have listened with a great deal of patience and anxiety to gentlemen who have discussed this question to see if they could convince me that it was proper for me to cast my vote for this amendment.

I know some of the Creek delegation who are now in this city pressing this claim. I know Opotheyoholo. I know Marshall, the other chief who is here; and I know intimately the very worthy and estimable gentleman who is the agent superintending this claim. I have listened with a great deal of interest to his explanation of it, to see if he could satisfy me of the propriety of voting for it. I have also listened attentively to all that has been said by those Senators who have advocated the amendment. I attended with pleasure to the elaborate and able argument of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WALKER] some days ago on this subject; and I was much interested this morning with the argument of the Senator from Arkansas; but, sir, I have not been able to satisfy myself that I can, with propriety, vote for the amendment.

I, perhaps, know more from personal observation than I do from a very critical examination of historical facts connected with this matter, although I have looked into it. When the war of 1812 was declared I lived upon the eastern frontier of the country occupied by this tribe; and, although then quite a boy, the exciting scenes which transpired along that frontier are still vividly in my recollection. I removed, as I said before, at the close of the war, in the fall of 1815, and settled in the country which had been the heart of the hostile operations, and may, therefore, be permitted to know something in regard to them. I am not disposed to place myself here as a barrier to this claim, but, sir, I cannot overlook the fact that a very great time has intervened between the alleged wrong of which complaint is now made and the present moment. I look at this lapse of time as evidence that the actors in the scene, the prominent men who figured with General Jackson in that war, and who consummated the treaty with him, never thought of such a claim. So far as my knowledge extends, they never whispered a solitary word in reference to any such claim on the Federal Government. Why, sir, the Big Warrior, who heads the list of those who signed that treaty, was among the most remarkable natural men that I ever saw. He almost reigned supreme over his nation. He was the great chief of what were called the Middle and the Upper Creeks. Scarcely inferior to him was McIntosh and the Little Prince, who were called the head chiefs of the Cowetas or eastern Indians. To one who knew these men as well as I did, or knew their love of money and their disposition to acquire it, it would seem strange that, if this claim really existed, if they believed it was a just one, they never presented it during their lifetime. I know of no man within the circle of my acquaintance who would have applied sooner than they would for the payment of any just demand, especially when we consider the amount claimed—half a million of dollars.

Why, sir, McIntosh, as I have always understood, paid the penalty of his life in consequence of the disposition which he made against the wishes of a large portion of his tribe, of the country of his tribe, and because of a large amount of money which it was alleged had been paid to him to obtain a cession of the Creek country, over which he assumed a right to control. The country was sold against the wishes of the people, and McIntosh was murdered by a band of them headed by one of the principal chiefs belonging to the hostiles in the war of 1812. Sir, if you tell me that the Big Warrior and the Little Prince and William McIntosh slept over their rights for this length of time, and never whispered to this Government that they had a just demand, you would impress upon my mind things which I cannot believe. This consideration has been the great difficulty with me in coming to anything like a satisfactory conclusion in favor of the amendment. I do not set up the lapse of time as an estoppel to the claim, but I oppose it because I believe the parties never thought themselves entitled to it.

A great deal has been said about the quantity of land assigned the friendly Creeks. The war raged up and down the Alabama river, to the junction of the Coosa and Tallapoosa, and extended up those two rivers as high as the Cherokee line. The first battle which the troops under General Jackson fought was at Tallasahatchee. That Indian town lies now in the county of Benton, one of the most flourishing and populous counties in the State of Alabama. Below that lies the county of Talladega, which takes its name from the celebrated battle-ground of Talladega, where General Jackson dealt such destruction to the hostile Creeks, who had besieged for several days a portion of friendly Indians.

Mr. HUNTER. I wish to ask the Senator from Alabama whether my impression is correct in regard to this matter; for I understand that these counties belonged to the hostile Indians, and were given under the capitulation to the friendly Indians?

Mr. FITZPATRICK. That, sir, is my understanding. It was hostile country. There were but few friendly Indians settled in this country during the war of 1812. The great bulk of them were hostile. Those who were friendly, however, fled to the Tennessee and the Georgia settlements—perhaps mostly to Tennessee—for succor and relief, and united with the whites, where many of them became efficient auxiliaries to the commanding generals in conducting their armies into the heart of the Creek nation. The junction of the two rivers was the seat of war, although there was no prominent battle fought there. Near the junction was one of the most populous Creek towns at that time in the whole Creek nation—the town of Coosawda—the first town, if I am not incorrectly informed, at which Tecumseh held his grand talk with the Creek chiefs in that vicinity. I live within three miles and a half of that town now, and I went there when the whole neighborhood was a wilderness, and inhabited by hardly any one but Indians. The very chief with whom Tecumseh talked was one of the warriors who fought at the battle of Calabee. Such is my understanding. From that point Tecumseh went up among the hostiles between the two rivers, and ultimately to Tucabachee, where he held his grand council with the Big Warrior, who failed to take his counsel, and was charged by him with cowardice. The hostile country then was from Fort Mimms and below, up the Alabama river to the points to which I have before alluded.

It is very difficult, however, to define what lines govern Indians in the disposition of their property, or the claims they set up for their lands. No Lower Creek, so far as my knowledge extends, went to the land assigned according to the stipulations of the treaty with General Jackson, except the Big Warrior and his adherents, if they could be called Lower Creeks. They, however, resided there before the war broke out. At the breaking out of the war, what were called the Creek or Muscogee nation owned a large portion of the State of Georgia, from the Ocmulgee river to the western line of Alabama, as it is now fixed, to the then border between the Choctaws and the Chickasaws. I will not undertake to say what was the dividing line between the Tallapoosa and Coosa Indians, and the Chattahoochee and Flint River Indians, because there was no regularly marked or dividing line between them. They seem to have rather distinct hunting grounds, instead of separate and distinct tracts of country. If I am not mistaken, however, and I have traveled through the whole of that country, the hostiles extended along the tributaries of the Tallapoosa and the Alabama until you come to the dividing waters between the Alabama, Tallapoosa, and Chattahoochee. That is what I understand to be the hostile country inhabited by the Indians who waged war upon the citizens of Georgia, and what was then the frontier of the Mississippi Territory.

The Creek Indians who adhered to the Big Warrior, had too much intelligence and too much sagacity to unite with the hostile Indians. I knew many of these friendly Indians. I lived among them, and knew their capacity to assert and maintain their rights. Many of them lived in the part of Alabama where I first resided. I recollect, and shall ever recollect, that the Big Warrior at one time came with a sealed letter to the gentleman with whom I was living, and asked him to read it. He said he was apprehensive it contained mischief, and the "forked tongues" talk, to use his language. The letter was broken open, and it was found to be from Arbuthnot, in Florida, who was endeavoring to urge him and his people to take up arms and destroy the inhabitants living in the newly acquired territory, and to smoke the great pipe of peace with the people of New Providence and the Spanish settlements. The gentleman with whom I resided, read the letter to the Big Warrior, and next morning, being summer time, he took him out under the shade of a large tree, and said he wanted to hear his "talk." The Big Warrior told him that he had made that treaty with General Jackson; that General Jackson was a straight forward, plain man; that he himself was tired of war; that many of his people had been destroyed in the war, and he was utterly opposed to its renewal; he was contented with his condition, and he said that the message of Arbuthnot should make no impression on his tribe. Such was the language of that remarkable red man. I recollect, too, that a portion of the neighbors, then new settlers in that Territory, collected in the course of the morning, to ascertain what would be the Big Warrior's determination on the communication made to him by Arbuthnot. He directed the interpreter to say to Mr. Mitchell, the gentleman with whom I was living, and those standing by, that they need entertain no alarm, no apprehension; that his name was to the treaty, and he intended to maintain the treaty sacredly. This gave peace and quietness to the settlers.

My knowledge of the country, which is now claimed to have been taken from the Indians, under the treaty of 1814, lying east of the Chattahoochee, is very limited; but from what I know of the country lying south and west of that, and within the limits of Alabama, I think that General Jackson not only did the United States a service, but did the Indians themselves a service in running a line which would cut off all communication between the Seminoles and the Creeks. General Jackson showed great political forecast, not only for the Government of the United States, but for the Indians themselves, in cutting off all communications between the Indians as well as the American citizens within our own limits, and the Indians in the then Spanish dominions, which had a beneficial effect, I am satisfied, in preventing future outbreaks.

After the war, the friendly Indians returned to their own homes. The "Big Warrior" went to the town of Tukabachee, where he lived and died. The Creek Indians, living on the Chattahoochee and the Flint rivers, remained at their homes during the war, and I know of no Indian belonging to what I understood to be the Lower Creeks, as they were generally denominated, who ever went into the country assigned, between the rivers Coosa and Tallapoosa.

Mr. BELL. Then, do I understand the Senator to say that the Lower Creeks, who were the friendly Indians, did not remove and occupy the ground assigned to them as an equivalent, by General Jackson?

Mr. FITZPATRICK. They did not live there, except the Big Warrior and his tribe. The hostile Indians had occupied the country between the Tallapoosa and the Coosa, which General Jackson gave to the friendly Creeks as an equivalent for the land taken from them.

Mr. PETTIT. I wish to ask the Senator from Alabama a question, for I sincerely want information on this question, and I have not got it sufficiently to satisfy my own judgment as to how I ought to vote upon it. I wish to ask him whether the Government of the United States owns, and is in possession of, or whether it has sold to individuals, any lands in this region which it has not bought of some tribe. I understand that we acknowledge that the whole face of the country was once owned by the Indians, and that we claim it only after having bought out their possessory right. Now, I wish to know whether there is any large tract of country there for which these Indians are claiming pay, that we have not paid either them or some other tribes for?

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Subsequently to the treaty of 1814?

Mr. PETTIT. At any time.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. All the country not embraced in the treaty of 1814 has since been acquired by the United States under other treaties.

Mr. WALKER. If I understand the question of the Senator from Indiana, it is whether, within this district, amounting to over eight millions of acres, we have ever acquired any other title than that which we obtained by the capitulation of 1814.

Mr. PETTIT. The object of my question was for information. I take this position for the whole broad surface of the Union: It has been owned by innumerable tribes, and I hold that this Government can have no lands upon this continent which it has not bought, in some capacity, at some time, from some tribe. It seems there is a large quantity of land in Alabama and Georgia, for which a tribe of Indians claim payment from us. What I want to know is, have we possessed ourselves of any lands there which we have not bought of, and paid for, to some tribe?

Mr. JOHNSON. Yes, sir; we have.

Mr. PETTIT. That is what I want to know. If that be the case, we ought to pay for it.

Mr. JOHNSON. There are nearly ten millions of acres which we have never paid for.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Land was acquired under the treaty made by General Jackson, both in Alabama and on the eastern side of the Chattahoochee river, in Georgia. Since this treaty, all the other territory held by these Indians has been purchased, and is now owned by the Government, or by citizens who have bought land from the United States. There is no land there unappropriated to which the Indians have any title, except that under the treaty of 1832 each Creek head of a family was authorized to take three hundred and twenty acres; and a small portion of those lands are yet unsold, I understand, in Alabama, from the fact that some removed without disposing of them, and others died before they were disposed of; and these lands are yet held by the Government for the use and benefit of the Indians who were located on them.

Mr. PETTIT. Then I understand the Senator to say that we have acquired the whole face of this country, bought out the possessory right of some tribe without paying for it, this money being no necessary part of the consideration for any portion of the face of the country.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. I take the ground that it has been paid for, and that is the reason why I cannot vote for this amendment.

Mr. DAWSON. I will read the instructions given to General Pinckney, when he went into this country:

"The United States will retain so much of the conquered territory as may appear to the Government thereof to be a just indemnity for the expenses of the war, and as a restitution for the injuries sustained by its citizens and the friendly Creek Indians." And he directed the terms to be communicated to the friendly Indians; and said: "You may likewise inform them, that the United States will not forget their fidelity, but, in the arrangements which may be made of the lands to be retained as indemnity, their claims will be respected; and such of their chiefs as have distinguished themselves, by their exertion and valor in the common cause, will also receive a remuneration in the ceded lands, and in such manner as the Government may direct."

The Secretary of War also instructed General Pinckney that "One of the terms of a peace with the hostiles must be an indemnification for the expenses of the war, by the cession of so much land as should be deemed an equivalent."

And he directed further:

"That the treaty should be, in form, altogether military, and in the nature of a capitulation."

These lands, in 1814, were taken by the Government, under a treaty then entered into, in consideration of the expenses incurred in the war, and to remunerate the whites and friendly Indians for the losses sustained. That was the compensation paid for the lands.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. The great difficulty with me has been, that notwithstanding these chiefs set up a claim to lands which the commanding general in 1814 attempted to take from them, the correspondence read by the Senator from Arkansas shows that the agent said when the treaty was made, that $60,000 would have been, he believed, a full requital for all the claims they set up. In 1817, it will be recollected, they had a delegation here seeking compensation from the Government for spoliation committed in the war of 1812-'13, and 1814, and, if I am not mistaken, $85,000 were then appropriated to the Indians, as a full remuneration for all the claims they had on the Government up to that period. The parties mainly interested, and who were competent to vindicate their rights and enforce them before a liberal and enlightened Government, never asserted any right until many of those who served in the transaction had passed off the stage of action; and some two years ago an additional appropriation of $111,000 was made. In the mean time we have had some three or four treaties with these Indians, and all their territory lying within the present limits of the State of Georgia has been acquired. In that portion of country a large number, perhaps I might say the bulk of what were called the Lower Creeks, always resided, save the Big Warrior and his tribe, who lived on the Tallapoosa. In 1832, I think, we made the last treaty with these Indians, and acquired all the lands they had lying in Alabama, except the reservation before alluded to. In all the treaties we have had, from that of 1814 until the close of 1832, if there ever was any claim set up by that tribe of Indians for remuneration for land taken from them by this capitulation, it has never reached my ears.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. I think it very possible that the Senator from Alabama did not hear the extracts which I read. My voice is peculiarly unfortunate to make myself heard; and I will ask the Senator whether he heard what I read from the report made in 1817, by Mr. Lowndes, and the report made in 1821, by Mr. McLane, and the answer of Mr. Hawkins to the interrogations of the War Department, in 1815?

Mr. FITZPATRICK. I did not. I, however, read Mr. Lowndes's report some days ago.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. They show that the claim which has heretofore been prosecuted by the Indians was exclusively for spoliation; that is, the aggregate of individual claims for their separate losses by depredations and the destruction of property by the hostiles. Those documents are conclusive on that point; and I take it for granted, from the tenor of the remarks of the Senator from Alabama, that he did not hear me read them, because it is with great difficulty that I can make myself heard all over the Chamber. I take it for granted, also, that he is arguing in ignorance of the fact that in 1842, Opothleyoholo, now a delegate in this city attending to this business, pressed this claim before Mr. Hitchcock, who was sent out as an agent of the War Department, when the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. BELL] was at its head. He told him that the claim of the Creeks for lands and spoliation was one great cause of complaint on their part at that time. I quote this merely to show that when agent Hawkins said $60,000 would have contented the Indians in 1814, he had allusion entirely to the claim for spoliation on property.

It is also inferred, from the silence of the Indians, that they abandoned this claim. To controvert this, I show that as late as 1842, Opothleyoholo, in an Indian council, brought forward this unsatisfied demand; and he further stated that when General Jackson became President, the Creek Indians believed they would have full satisfaction for all their claims, because they had the most unlimited confidence in the integrity of General Jackson. He went on further to state that when he came here it was at the time when General Jackson was seriously pressed by the difficulties arising out of the Indian emigration, and the contests arising out of the fact that the Creeks and Cherokees had made a great many difficulties with the Government about the jurisdiction of the State sovereignties. General Jackson was then very anxious for the emigration; and, according to the narrative Opothleyoholo gave at the time of his interview with General Jackson, his reply, in answer to the claim for indemnity for these spoliation of lands was, that as soon as they emigrated west the Government would settle with them for the whole amount of their claims.

The Creek Indians were very much astonished when they emigrated west, in pursuance of the treaty of 1832, and found that the balance due them for property destroyed, $110,000, was not paid, and that some arrangement was not made about the land taken from them—eight million acres—without compensation. A delegation came on before their removal, instructed to prefer this very claim; but the consideration of it was waived by General Jackson, who did not want to complicate himself by too many questions at that time; but he assured them that their claims would be adjusted when they removed west. In the mean time, the old General had gone out of office, and they could no longer prefer their claims under the same friendly auspices which they expected to operate in their favor when he was President.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. I was about to remark that it was strange that this claim was never mentioned in the many treaties which were held with these Indians during the lifetime of the prominent actors in these scenes—during the lifetime of the Indians who signed the original treaty. There were many sagacious and shrewd men who had charge of these Indians as their agents during this time, and who, to my knowledge, were always alive to their interests. To none of them will I do more homage than to the agent who has been alluded to, (Mr. Hawkins.) Though but a youth, I knew him slightly, and I can indorse the recommendations which have been made of him. The claim set up by Opothleyoholo in 1842, I do not remember that I have heard spoken of before. It will not have much weight with me, however, when such men as the Big Warrior, the Little Prince, and McIntosh, set up no claim before their death. They lived many years after the treaty of 1814.

Governor Mitchell succeeded Mr. Hawkins as agent, and Mr. Crowell followed him. There has been no period since when they have not had a most competent agent to supervise, control, and superintend them, as to their pecuniary matters. During the whole term of General Jackson's administration, who was entirely familiar with these Indians, not a word was said, so far as my knowledge extends, about this claim. Although I have lived a great length of time in the country upon their borders, and mingled with them to a certain extent, I never heard a word of the claim until during the winter before the last.

All these facts amount to a conviction on my mind that these Indians, and those who guarded and controlled them, did regard as full compensation the appropriation of money made in 1817 under Mr. Lowndes's report, for all claims under the treaty of Fort Jackson.

I did not design, as the Senator from Virginia will do me the justice to say, to participate in this debate; but, having been alluded to, I deemed it proper to put myself right in reference to the vote I should give. If I could vote for the claim as one of right, I would not hesitate to yield the amendment my support. I would gladly do so if I could believe I was doing an act of justice to these people.

Mr. SHIELDS. It is important that we should have an Executive session; and I therefore move that the further consideration of this bill be postponed until to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, transmitting a report from the Secretary of State, with accompanying documents, in answer to the resolution of the Senate of 30th of January.

Mr. CASS. That resolution was introduced on my motion, and I rise now to move that the papers be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and be printed. They have relation to the proceedings of the Greek Government, connected with the affair of Dr. King, and are very interesting to the people of this country.

The motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On motion by Mr. SHIELDS, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of Executive business; and after some time spent therein, the doors were reopened; and

The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, May 23, 1854.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. WILLIAM H. MILBURN.

The Clerk proceeded with the reading of yesterday's Journal.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I presume we may, by unanimous consent, dispense with the reading of yesterday's Journal, which is very lengthy.

The SPEAKER. Unless objection be made, the further reading of the Journal will be dispensed with.

Mr. JONES, of New York. I object. The Journal, in which we all are concerned, should be read, so that, if there be any mistake, we may make the necessary correction.

The Journal of yesterday was then read and approved.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. MAURICE. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to make a personal explanation.

[Cries of "Agreed!"]

Mr. MAURICE. I was, much to my regret, prevented by sickness from being in attendance at the session of the House yesterday. I desire simply to say, that if I had been present, I should have voted in the negative on the bill to organize the Territories of Kansas and Nebraska. If it be in order, I would ask leave of the House to have my name recorded in the negative.

[Cries of "I object!"]

Mr. GIDDINGS. I move that fifty thousand copies of yesterday's Journal be printed for distribution among the people. It relates to very important proceedings, and ought to go out.

Mr. PHELPS. I object.

Mr. BRIDGES. I move that when the House adjourns to-day, it be to meet on Friday next. The motion is submitted with a view that the officers of the House may have an opportunity to remove the carpet, and renovate the Hall.

PENSION FRAUDS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Department of the Interior, transmitting, in obedience to the resolution of the House of the 11th instant, requesting the communication of such information as to the frauds on the Pension Office mentioned in the late annual report of the Commissioner of Pensions, and any other similar frauds which may have since been discovered, as will exhibit their nature and extent, a report from the Commissioner of Pensions containing all the information in the possession of the Department on the subject.

On motion by Mr. HAVEN, the communication was laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has moved that when the House adjourns, it be to meet on Friday next.

Mr. WHEELER. I demand the yeas and nays, and tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. WHEELER and HOUTON were appointed.

The House was then divided on the demand for the yeas and nays; and the tellers reported forty in the affirmative.

So the yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BRIDGES. Upon the suggestion of some friends around me, I withdraw my motion.

Mr. SEYMOUR. I find that the communication from the Department of the Interior, which was before the House just now, relates to frauds committed upon the Pension Office; and that subject is now before the Committee on the Judiciary. I therefore move to reconsider the reference that was made just now, and that the communication be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, it will be so ordered.

No objection being made, the communication was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. DICKINSON. I send to the Clerk's table a notice of my intention to move for leave to introduce a joint resolution upon some subsequent day.

The SPEAKER. The notice can be given under the rules.

Mr. HAMILTON. I object, if it can be given under the rule.

The SPEAKER. If the notice is a notice of the gentleman's intention to introduce a joint resolution, it can be given, and must be given, if objected to, under the rule, at the Clerk's table.

Mr. HAMILTON. Then I object.

Mr. COBB. I call for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The business first in order is the consideration of the bill reported from the Committee on Public Lands, by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. BENNETT], "granting lands equally to the several States to aid in the construction of railroads and for the support of schools." The pending question is on a motion to recommit the bill; and the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. HAMILTON] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. PHELPS. I ask my friend from Maryland to give way, to enable me to submit a motion that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, with a view of taking up the deficiency bill.

Mr. HILLYER. I rise to a privileged question. I move that when this House adjourns, it adjourn to meet on Friday next, for the purpose of enabling the Hall to be cleansed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia cannot take the floor from the gentleman from Maryland for that purpose.

Mr. HILLYER. I have always understood that a motion to adjourn over was a privileged motion.

The SPEAKER. So it is, if the gentleman can get the floor to make it, and so is a motion to adjourn; but the gentleman must get the floor before he can submit either.

Mr. BENNETT. I desire to make a suggestion.

Mr. PHELPS. I requested the gentleman from Maryland to yield the floor to enable me to move to go into committee, with a view of taking up the amendments of the Senate to the deficiency bill.

Mr. HAMILTON. Now, I will hear the suggestion of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. BENNETT.]

Mr. BENNETT. I desire to make a suggestion, which I trust will be favorably received by the House. I have no disposition to crowd the land bill in the way of the deficiency bill; and I therefore ask that the consideration of the bill which I reported some time ago be postponed four weeks from this date.

Mr. HAMILTON. I yield the floor to the gentleman from New York for that purpose.

Mr. LETCHER. Let us understand what the question is now before the House.

The SPEAKER. It is to postpone the consideration of the land bill reported by the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNETT] four weeks from this date.

Mr. WHEELER. I object.

Mr. CLINGMAN. The gentleman from New York has a right to submit the motion indicated by him.

Mr. BENNETT. I move that the consideration of the bill referred to be postponed four weeks.

The question was then taken; and the motion was agreed to.

So the consideration of the bill was postponed four weeks.

THE DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. PHELPS. I now renew my motion that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, for the purpose of taking up the deficiency bill.

The question was then taken; and the motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. CHANDLER in the chair.)

The CHAIRMAN. When the deficiency bill was last under consideration, there was an amendment pending offered by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. WENTWORTH.]

Mr. CAMPBELL. I rise to a question of order. The consideration of this bill, as well as other bills, having been set aside by order of the committee, I make the point of order that we must proceed to the consideration of the bill next succeeding the one last under consideration—that relating to the organization of the Territories of Nebraska and Kansas.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion made by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. PHELPS] was, that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union upon the deficiency bill.

Mr. PHELPS. There is no motion submitted by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. CAMPBELL.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair believes that the suggestion of the gentleman from Ohio was a very proper one.

Mr. PHELPS. I could not understand the remarks submitted by the gentleman from Ohio. I do not know that there is any objection to the consideration of the deficiency bill.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I object to the consideration of the bill now.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, whether the committee shall proceed to the further consideration of the deficiency bill?

Mr. WHEELER demanded a division.

The House then divided, and eighty-three voted in the affirmative. A count in the negative not being demanded, the committee agreed to proceed to the consideration of the deficiency bill.

Mr. PHELPS. Mr. Chairman, I do not propose to submit any additional remarks on the amendments now pending, except to call the attention of the committee to the necessity of speedy action on this bill. In order to facilitate such speedy action, I propose to let the committee vote on the amendments without submitting any further remarks. I hope, therefore, that the committee will proceed now to vote on the amendments made by the Senate. I hope the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WENTWORTH] will withdraw the amendment which he offered the other day, so as to let the committee proceed to vote on the Senate amendments.

Mr. WENTWORTH. I am willing to withdraw it, if there be no objection.

There being no objection, the amendment proposed by Mr. WENTWORTH was withdrawn.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will now proceed to report the first amendment.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Page two, line twenty-two of printed bill, strike out "two," and insert "four," thus increasing the amount for extra clerk hire in the State Department from $2,000 to $4,000.

Mr. PHELPS. The Committee of Ways and Means recommend a concurrence in that amendment.

The question was put; and the amendment was agreed to.

The second amendment was then read, as follows:

Page three, after line fifty seven, insert the following: For contingent expenses of foreign intercourse, $15,000.

Mr. PHELPS. Mr. Chairman, that amendment was recommended by the Committee on Foreign Affairs in this House, but was not acted upon. The amendment is in accordance with the estimates of the Department.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

The third amendment was then reported, as follows:

To pay expenses incurred by Edward Cunningham, acting consul at Shanghai, for a police force for the preservation of the peace by American citizens, $572 80.

Mr. PHELPS. Mr. Chairman, we propose to increase the amendment to the necessary amount expended. These expenses were rendered necessary under the treaty made between this country and China. The consuls at the ports of China adjust matters of provisional objects. Many of our seamen are there, and the preservation of the peace by them devolves upon us. Those in the ports of China are required to be brought before the consul. Mr. Cunningham was the acting consul at the time these expenses were incurred. The amount which is proposed to be paid is recommended by our then Minister to China, as being for expenses necessarily incurred by the acting consul. It is also recommended by the Department of State. And the committee recommend a concurrence in this amendment.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

The fourth amendment was then reported, as follows:

For payment of the claim of Thomas N. Johnson for his services as marshal at the port of Shanghai, from the 9th of December, 1851, to the 15th of September, 1853, the sum of $1,798 91.

Mr. PHELPS. Mr. Chairman, in this amendment there is a clerical error. The name of the person to whom this amount is due is Thomas M., not Thomas N. I hope that amendment will be made.

I also propose another amendment to the amendment. It is one reducing the amount. Strike out "ninety-eight dollars" and insert "eighty-one dollars," and strike out "ninety-one cents" and insert "seventy-four cents," so as to make the sum $1,781 74. Mr. Johnson acted as the marshal in these ports, and this appropriation only affords him a fair salary for the services performed. It is recommended by the late Minister to China, and also by the Department of State. The committee is satisfied that the amount is justly due to Mr. Johnson.

The question was taken on the amendment to the amendment; which was agreed to.

The question then recurred on the amendment as amended, and it was put; and the amendment agreed to.

The fifth Senate amendment was then read, as follows:

For payment to John Bozman Kerr, in addition to his salary and allowances as chargé d'affaires to Nicaragua, the amount of his expenses on the journey to San Salvador and Guatemala, and of his expenses at those capitals under his commissions to the Governments of those Republics, together with a full outfit as chargé d'affaires to the national representation of Central America.

Mr. PHELPS. The Committee of Ways and Means recommend a non-concurrence in this Senate amendment.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I should like to know the reasons which induced the committee to come to that conclusion.

Mr. ORR. Will the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. PHELPS] state the amount which will be appropriated by this amendment? It is not stated.

Mr. PHELPS. There is a portion of the amount proposed by this amendment which may be paid to Mr. Kerr; and that is his traveling expenses on the journey to San Salvador and Guatemala.

Mr. ORR. What is about the amount?

Mr. PHELPS. It is proposed by this amendment to allow him a full outfit as chargé d'affaires to the national representation of Central America, in addition to his usual salary, which was $4,500; in addition, I say, to his usual salary as chargé d'affaires to Nicaragua. He was appointed chargé d'affaires to Nicaragua, and he also bore with him letters of credence to the national representation of Central America, if such a Government should be established.

I hold in my hand a copy of the instructions given to Mr. Kerr by the State Department, and also a copy of instructions given to him after his departure from this country. The first extract, which I will read, bears date the 21st of April, 1851. It is as follows:

"Your salary will be at the rate of $4,500 a year. You will also be allowed an outfit equal to a year's salary, and an amount equal to a quarter's salary towards defraying the expenses of your return, when you take leave of the Nicaragua Government at the conclusion of your mission."

I here remark, that that is the salary fixed by law, making an outfit of $4,500, the only salary of a chargé d'affaires of all our officers of that grade; and a quarter's salary is also allowed them for the purposes stated in the instructions which I have read. That Mr. Kerr has had.

Again, the Secretary of State instructs Mr. Kerr to exchange ratifications and treaties between the United States and the Republic of San Salvador and Guatemala.

As to the expenses to be incurred in the performance of that duty, and other duties, the instructions say:

"As the discharge of this and of other duties confided to you may render it necessary for you to visit other Central American States besides Nicaragua, you will be allowed your necessary traveling expenses on your way thither, and while on your return to Leon. These, however, will not include the expenses consequent upon your sojourn in the capitals of either of the States. You will keep a regular account of those expenses, which must be supported by vouchers, in every instance where they can be obtained, to be transmitted with your account for adjustment at the Treasury."

Those expenses can be paid without further legislation. Such necessary expenses can be paid out of the appropriations for the contingent expenses of foreign missions.

I will read another extract from the instructions given to Mr. Kerr. It is as follows:

"In case you should deem it advisable to recognize the national representation of Central America, created by the treaty between Nicaragua, San Salvador, and Honduras, of the 8th of November, 1849, a letter accrediting you to its Minister for Foreign Affairs is herewith transmitted."

Mr. Kerr was never appointed a Minister to the national representation of Central America, and for that reason the Committee of Ways and Means were of opinion that he is not entitled to any additional salary, or any additional outfit.

The committee recommend a non-concurrence in the amendment of the Senate.

Mr. ASHE. I will ask my honorable friend from Missouri if Mr. Kerr did not discharge the duties of both missions, not merely the one at Nicaragua, but at Central America, to which court he bore a letter of credence? It has been usual to allow, under similar circumstances, to double outfits, and I cannot see any good reason why it should not be allowed in this case. It was allowed very lately to Major Donelson, when he was required to go from Berlin, the court to which he was originally accredited, to the Germanic Confederation. If allowed to a Democratic representative, where is the justice in refusing to a Whig? We should feed all out of the same spoon.

Mr. PHELPS. I will tell the gentleman the difference. Major Donelson, holding the office of Minister at Berlin, was duly appointed Minister to the Germanic Confederation, vacated the first appointment, and, under his new appointment, was entitled to an outfit under his last appointment, and received it.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Ohio. I would like, by the consent of the committee, to have the report of Mr. EVERETT, in the Senate, read. It is very short, and I think it makes the matter very plain. I think we should concur in the amendment of the Senate. The report states the facts fully. I send it to the Clerk's desk, and ask that it be read.

The report was read.

Mr. GREENWOOD. I would inquire of the gentleman from Missouri why the amount to be appropriated is not specified in the amendment?

Mr. PHELPS. As to that matter, I cannot say. This is an amendment adopted by the Senate. It is proposed to allow him, in addition to his salary as chargé d'affaires at Nicaragua, full outfit as chargé d'affaires to the national representation of Central America. That would be $4,500. So far as his traveling expenses in going to San Salvador and Guatemala are concerned, he will have to show his vouchers for them. These expenses can be paid now without legislation.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I will say one word in reference to this matter.

Mr. ORR. I would suggest that the gentleman move an amendment. We are now under the five-minute rule, but it has, so far, been very little observed.

Mr. STEPHENS. I move to strike out any word of the amendment, so that I may be allowed to say a few words.

I have carefully looked at the Senate amendment, and find that it is in strict conformity with the previous practice of the Government. Mr. Kerr was put to great expense in fulfilling the desires of the Government, and the amendment, in my judgment, ought to be concurred in. The Senate has strictly conformed with the practice of the Government.

Mr. PHELPS. I oppose the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia, merely for the purpose of saying that he and myself understand the precedents differently. I will read an extract from the report of Mr. EVERETT. He says:

"Several similar cases are found in our diplomatic history, of which that of Mr. Donelson is the most recent and clearly analogous. This gentleman being Minister Plenipotentiary at Berlin, was commissioned in the same character to the central Germanic Government at Frankfurt, and under that commission allowed a full outfit."

Mr. Donelson, while holding the position of Minister Plenipotentiary at Berlin, was nominated by the President and confirmed by the Senate as Minister to the Germanic Confederation at Frankfurt. When appointed to the latter position, his diplomatic functions at Berlin ceased, and he was allowed his salary and his outfit. Mr. Kerr, however, was only appointed chargé d'affaires at Nicaragua; he never held a commission as chargé d'affaires to the national representation of Central America.

Mr. STEPHENS. The gentleman is mistaken. He held a commission exactly in the same words to the national representation at Central America that he did to Nicaragua. The language is identical with the exception of the change of name.

Mr. PHELPS. If the gentleman refers to the report, he will find that he is mistaken. There is merely an authority for him to exchange ratifications of treaty with the Republic of San Salvador, another for him to exchange ratifications of treaty with the Republic of Guatemala, and a letter of credence to the national representation at Central America; but his commission was as chargé d'affaires to Nicaragua.

The CHAIRMAN. No further debate is in order.

Mr. STEPHENS. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. TAYLOR. I merely desire to suggest to the gentleman from Missouri, that I have before me the letter of Mr. Webster, then Secretary of State, appointing Mr. Kerr.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio move an amendment?

Mr. TAYLOR. I will, if it is necessary. I move to strike out the words "addition to his salary," for the purpose of enabling me to say a few words.

I have before me the report of Mr. EVERETT upon this subject, which has just been read to the committee, and which, it seems to me, ought to be conclusive upon the subject.

A distinction is drawn by the gentleman from Missouri between the case of Mr. Donelson and that of Mr. Kerr. Now, I do not think the facts will sustain that position. Mr. Donelson was Minister Plenipotentiary at Berlin, and received an outfit of $9,000. He was then appointed Minister to the Germanic Confederation, and received an additional outfit of $9,000.

Mr. PHELPS. I would ask the gentleman if Berlin is not within the Germanic Confederation?

Mr. TAYLOR. That makes the case still stronger. He had $18,000 within the Germanic Confederation; and why should not Mr. Kerr have the outfit of a chargé when he was appointed to a second mission? Here is Mr. Webster's letter:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
WASHINGTON, November 20, 1851.
SIR: The President of the United States having thought proper to name John Bozman Kerr their chargé d'affaires to the national representation of Central America, I have the honor of announcing the same to your Excellency, and of praying you to give credence to whatever he shall say to you on my part. He knows the concern which our Republic takes in the interest and prosperity of the national representation of Central America; our strong desire to cultivate its friendship, and to deserve it by all the good offices which may be in our power. He knows, also, my zeal to promote these by whatever may depend upon my ministry.

I have no doubt that Mr. Kerr will so conduct himself as to merit your confidence; and I avail myself with pleasure of this opportunity to offer to you the assurance of my most distinguished consideration.

DANIEL WEBSTER.

His Excellency The Minister of Foreign Affairs, of the national representation of Central America.

Now, it has always been the practice of Congress to allow a gentleman who has been appointed temporarily Chargé or Minister, even if he is not confirmed by the Senate, the usual outfit and salary. Why make an exception in this case? The Senate, on full consideration, have allowed the outfit, and I hope this committee will not make a distinction against Mr. Kerr. He maintained his residence in Nicaragua, and went on an additional mission to Central America by order of the President of the United States, and under a commission from the Secretary of State, and it seems to me that he is justly entitled to the outfit usually allowed.

I now withdraw my amendment.

The question was then taken on the amendment of the Senate; and it was concurred in.

The sixth amendment was read, as follows:

Page six, after line one hundred and thirty-three, insert the following:

For rent of surveyor general's office in California, purchase of instruments, records, drawing materials, furniture, fuel, and pay of messengers, $4,000.

The question was taken; and the amendment was concurred in.

The seventh amendment was read, as follows:

For compensation of a draughtsman and clerks for the office of the surveyor general of California, $10,000.

Mr. PHELPS. The Committee of Ways and Means recommend a concurrence in that amendment.

The question was taken; and the amendment was concurred in.

The eighth amendment was read, as follows:

For contingent expenses in the office of the Commissioner of Pensions: For stationery, $1,000; for binding books, $1,000; for office furniture, $1,000; for printing and engraving bounty land certificates, $1,500; for miscellaneous items, $1,500.

Mr. PHELPS. The committee recommend a concurrence in that amendment also.

The question was taken; and the amendment was concurred in.

The ninth amendment was read, as follows:

For continuing the surveys in the northern portions of Iowa, Minnesota, and Wisconsin, at the rates now authorized by law, $40,000.

Mr. PHELPS. The committee recommend a concurrence in this amendment. It is for the purpose of continuing the surveys, which, if they are not made this year, will be made the next.

The question was then taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment next in order was then read, as follows:

For completing and keeping in order the grounds south of the President's House, $9,770.

Mr. PHELPS. The committee recommend a non-concurrence in that amendment.

Mr. CRAIGE. I understand that the money that was appropriated for this purpose has been already exhausted. These grounds are in a very bad condition, making the neighborhood quite unhealthy. The health of a former President was very much injured, so much so that his family removed during the summer months to the heights at Georgetown. There are pools of water in the grounds in question, which it is desirable should be filled in with earth. From what I learn I think it is indispensable that the improvements asked for should be made.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I move to strike out all but the words "$9,000," merely for the purpose of saying that the appropriation asked for here is to be applied to the improvement of the grounds south of the President's House. Between the street and south of the President's house is a wall, and also a canal. You will find, by examining the appropriations for the last six or seven years, that there have been expended upon the piece of ground in question about $60,000. The appropriation now asked for is an additional one, necessary, it is said, to complete the improvement of this ground.

Mr. CRAIGE. Whatever the amount expended may have been, I do not know. One thing is very evident, that the grounds should be still further improved; and another thing is quite certain, that the workmen who have been employed upon these improvements have not been paid. The Government ought to pay for the improvements which are now going on there.

Mr. JONES. There were a great many persons at work there on last Saturday, and I have no idea that the sum named here, or $50,000 additional, will be sufficient to complete the improvements upon this ground.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky. I oppose the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. JONES,] and I desire to say but a few words in regard to this matter. It is true that a large amount of money has been expended upon this ground, but the improvement required there was a very extensive and a very expensive one. Gentlemen who have been familiar with this city for the last ten or twelve years, will recollect that at one time there was a very deep ravine upon this ground, and that nearly the whole place has had to be filled up with earth brought from other places—sometimes a great distance. The expenditure of $66,000 is really a matter of no consequence, in comparison with the great improvement which has been already made. The work is now nearly completed; and the sum now asked for will put the ground in a very fine condition. Inasmuch as the health of the President, and of his family, and the beauty of the city, depend upon this improvement, I think there ought to be no hesitation upon the part of the committee in passing the appropriation now asked for.

Mr. JONES. I withdraw the amendment I offered.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is upon concurring with the Senate amendment.

Mr. LETCHER. I move to strike out the words $9,000. That will make the sum $770. According to the information I have had in regard to that piece of land, the first appropriation that was made by Congress was expended in making a fish-pond—in making this very hole about which the gentleman talks, which had to be filled up subsequently by an additional expenditure of the public money.

I was upon the ground the other day, and I saw that the lot was pretty well laid out, and that the grass was coming up; and I cannot exactly understand, under these circumstances, what they want with the $9,000 asked for. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. CRAIGE] says that debts have been contracted which we ought to meet. I shall vote against this appropriation, for I think it is high time that Congress should give their officers to understand that they are to expend the money which is appropriated, and not to expend money in advance of appropriations, and then ask for additional appropriations. I am for confining them to the law as it is written, and to compel them to make their action correspond with it. We hold the first place here. They are our servants and agents, and they are to perform their duties in compliance with the law as written, and not the law as they choose to enlarge it.

Mr. CRAIGE. I apprehend that if the law were carried out on that maxim, we would never get work properly done. While the principle, as a general one, is correct, it would not work well if it were carried out too strictly. It is often necessary for the employees of Government to perform works which have not been provided for by general appropriation.

Mr. LETCHER. If the gentleman from North Carolina will permit me to interrupt him, I would ask him if this is one of the cases he speaks of?

Mr. CRAIGE. I think it is. It would be a very extraordinary thing, indeed, Mr. Chairman, where the Government of the United States has appointed officers for the purpose of performing duties, and where it may have been necessary, in order to carry on the affairs of Government, that there should be a particular work performed by these officers, that, under that general law of the Government, such work exscripta, and not provided for specifically, could not be done. This House never recognized any such doctrine, how much soever we may be disposed to save the funds of the Government. Whenever the Government contracts a debt, let us pay it whatever it is.

The CHAIRMAN. The question recurs on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. LETCHER,] to strike out the appropriation of $9,000.

Mr. TAYLOR. Is not an amendment to the amendment in order?

The CHAIRMAN. It is not. There is an amendment to the amendment pending.

Mr. LETCHER. I withdraw my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Then the question is on concurring with the amendment reported from the Senate.

Mr. SAGE. Mr. Chairman, I move to reduce the appropriation $5,000, for the purpose of asking a question. I should like to know the amount that has been expended here? It is said on the other side of the House that it would require all this money to complete the improvement. If this is so, what amount has been expended; and how much more are we to pay?

Mr. LETCHER, (interrupting.) With the consent of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. SAGE,] I desire to ask the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means whether, in this very case, by an amendment of Mr. Seymour, of New York, it was not proposed to give a bond for finishing this work with the appropriation made by the last Congress?

Mr. HOUSTON. I have not looked particularly at this matter myself. But, in reply to the questions propounded by the gentlemen from New York and Virginia, [Messrs. SAGE and LETCHER,] I would say this: I do not know the amount of money that has been expended on the improvement of these grounds. I think, however, that my friend from Tennessee [Mr. JONES] is mistaken as to the amount; although, if he has examined it, I will not controvert his statement. During the first session of the last Congress an appropriation was made of $12,000 for this purpose; and, on the recommendation of the Committee of Ways and Means, a proviso was appended to the appropriation, saying that this amount, or any part of it, should not be expended until, and unless, a contract was entered into for the entire completion of the grounds. Well, Mr. Chairman, that sum is gone. The present occupant of the White House had nothing to do with it. The money was expended before he came into power; and although it may have been expended—I care not in what way—are we then to leave the grounds unimproved, while there is the best reason to believe that their being left so produce sickness to the inhabitants.

Now, sir, I am not generally in the habit of voting for this kind of appropriation. But it seems to me that this is a case which appeals more strongly to us than almost any other; and for the reason that the best opinion is, that leaving the grounds in their present condition; the condition in which they were during the winter and spring, they produce sickness in that quarter of the city, and compel the occupants of the White House to leave it every summer, and seek a residence at some other place; it seems to me that, under such circumstances, you should appropriate money enough to complete the improvement. If it is admitted that the grounds, in their incomplete state, produce sickness, then I think we ought to complete the improvements; and while I will contend, and ever have contended, not only by speech but by votes, for a strict adherence to the rule which the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. LETCHER] lays down, in reference to confining the expenditure of moneys for public works to the amount appropriated, yet if there is any case in which a violation of that rule is admissible, it is the one now under consideration.

Mr. LETCHER. Is an amendment now pending?

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment offered by the gentleman from New York is pending.

The amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. LETCHER. I move to reduce the appropriation one dollar.

If I understand the matter correctly, the Committee of Ways and Means recommend that this appropriation be stricken out of the bill; in other words, that the committee shall non-concur in the amendment of the Senate; and yet, remarkable as it is, the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, [Mr. Houston]—the committee which makes this recommendation—advocates this as a necessary appropriation.

Mr. CRAIGE, (interrupting.) I presume that the reason why the Committee of Ways and Means made their recommendation was, that at the time they came to their determination, they supposed that the amount could be placed in the general appropriation bill, and that it would answer every purpose. But the fact is, as I have become well satisfied, that a great portion of this work is already completed, and the Government is indebted to the contractors for it. That being the case, the appropriation should be made in this bill. The money is due, and the contractors are compelled, for the want of this appropriation, to borrow money to carry on the work, and to pay a high rate of interest for it. Justice, therefore, requires that this appropriation should be made.

Mr. HOUSTON. I desire to say a word or two in reply to the remarks of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. LETCHER,] which seem to place me in a false position. I have not the charge of this bill; and although the Committee of Ways and Means, as such, has recommended a non-concurrence in the action of the Senate, yet, as an individual member of the committee, I have the right to differ from that recommendation. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. PHILIPS] has the charge of this bill, and I pursue, in my action as an individual, the course which my judgment suggests.

Mr. LETCHER. It seems to me that the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means is somewhat in the position of General Taylor—voted down by his own Cabinet.

Mr. HOUSTON. That is very often the case. The chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means has often to defend the action of the committee when that action is in direct conflict with his own opinion and judgment.

But in this particular case I believe I was absent from the city when the bill was reported to the House; and, therefore, I am at liberty to take such a course in reference to it as I see fit, guided by the dictates of my judgment and sense of duty. I believe it is right, and therefore I advocate it.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I desire to ask the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means one question; and that is, whether this appropriation will improve the political atmosphere of the Democratic party?

Mr. HOUSTON. The political atmosphere of the Democratic party is pure now; it was improved last night. [Laughter.]

Mr. LETCHER. If there is no objection, I will withdraw my amendment.

No objection being made, the amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky. I offer an amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The amendment was read, as follows:

For furnishing an additional number of iron settees for the President's and Capitol grounds, $1,000.

Mr. HOUSTON. I would ask the gentleman if that appropriation has been recommended by a committee?

Mr. KERR. I should like to know whether the Committee of Ways and Means recommended that?

Mr. STANTON. The necessity of the case recommends it.

Mr. HOUSTON. As I understand it, no committee at all has recommended it.

The question was then taken upon Mr. STANTON's amendment; and it was agreed to—ayes 60; noes not counted.

Mr. COBB. I desire to offer an amendment, and to make a remark or two, not by way of edifying the House, but for the purpose of satisfying myself as to the intention in reference to the point to which my amendment refers. I move to add at the end of the amendment the following:

Provided, That no part of said appropriation shall be expended in pulling down the stone wall south of the President's House and grounds.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I offer this amendment in good faith. But in order that I may know whether I am right in the information upon which I have based the amendment, I will ask the chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, whether the report I have heard is true, that any portion of this appropriation is intended to be expended in pulling down the stone walls south of the President's House and grounds?

Mr. CRAIGE. I will state to the gentleman that I do not know that there is any such intention.

Mr. COBB. Well, then, in order to make the matter sure, I hope the amendment will be adopted. I have heard such a report, and I want to make it sure that that stone wall shall not be pulled down. It has been the policy of the various Administrations in reference to the improvements; no, sir, I will not say it has been their policy, but in the experience I have had since I have been a member of Congress, my observation has been, that it has been the practice of the various Administrations to build up one year and pull down the next. It is true, that by carrying out such a policy we shall benefit the laboring classes. But I ask, is it the true policy for this Government to adopt? Is it the true policy for Congress to sanction? Is it good policy for us to authorize the pulling down of that wall, which has been there ever since I have been in Washington city as a member of Congress? Such, I understand, is the intention. Sir, I desire to protect that wall. It has been there for many years. It will cost considerable to remove it; and I can see no reason why it should be done. In my humble judgment, the grounds within the inclosure, south of the President's House, cannot be beautified more than they now are. Why not allow them to remain? Why remove the old landmarks which have been in existence so long?

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky. I rise to a question of order. I submit that the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama is not in order, for the reason that it has no relevancy to the Senate amendment to which it is offered. When the amendment speaks of improving the grounds south of the President's House, it means that portion of the grounds south of the inclosure. The designation of the grounds south of the President's House has always been understood to mean those, not including the grounds within the inclosure around the President's House. I submit, therefore, that the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama is not in order, being irrelevant.

Mr. COBB. The suggestion of the gentleman from Kentucky will not cover my object. I have understood that it is the intention to remove these walls, and that I meant to prevent. I say put the proviso in. If it be not the object to do what is supposed, the proviso will do no harm. The gentleman knows the wall is south of the very grounds proposed to be improved.

Mr. STANTON. The gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. HAVEN. I oppose this amendment, and shall briefly explain my reasons for doing so. I do not expect that the committee will listen to me on this small subject, as they have been dealing for the last fortnight with empires. I am controlled in my vote, and expect to be, by this consideration: The last Congress made an appropriation of $12,500 to complete the work on this ground; and on motion by an honorable gentleman from New York, [Mr. Seymour,] there was a proviso added that the amount should not be used unless security was given by the contractor that it should complete the work. Now, if the contractor of the Government has discharged his duty, there is security for the completion of the work; and I, for one, will not vote in this Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to overlook a consideration of that kind. We not only put it to the officer last year to do this work for a given sum, but we ordered him not to do it unless he had security that that sum should complete it. Here we are now asked for an appropriation of some nine thousand and odd dollars. I, for one, will not vote for it; others may if they please.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I would ask that the law of the last session may be read.

The Clerk read the law, as follows:

"To complete the improvements on the square south of the President's House, $12,000: Provided, That the grounds can be filled up, and the surface completed for the sum herein appropriated, and a contract for the completion of the work with good security be tendered and accepted at a sum not exceeding this amount."

Mr. HAVEN. That is the reason why I sustain the report of the Committee of the Whole, although the Chairman opposes it.

Mr. CRAIGE. If the officer who had the work in charge has not done his duty, and the work is not finished, that is no reason why we should not now complete it.

Mr. HAVEN. I do not care who the officer was, who appointed him, or who are responsible for him. For one, I do not mean to be responsible for the subject.

The question was then taken on Mr. COBB's amendment; and it was rejected.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I move to strike out the whole amount, for the purpose of inquiring of the chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, whether he can inform the committee what it is intended to do in reference to the public grounds south of the President's House? In passing there Saturday last, I observed that the street running south of the President's House was fenced across. I am at a loss to know what is the design. Is it proposed to take down the wall to which the gentleman from Alabama refers, and include all from the President's House to the canal in the President's grounds?

Mr. CRAIGE. I have answered that question before. I told the gentleman from Alabama that I did not know whether it was contemplated to remove the wall south of the President's House or not. If it be necessary, then we should improve the grounds south of that wall. I stated that during the last Administration, the President of the United States was compelled to remove his family from the President's House to the heights of Georgetown, because they could have no health there in consequence of ponds, whether fish ponds or not, I do not know. These appropriations are made for the purpose of filling up these holes, leveling the grounds, and covering them with grass. They are to put those grounds in the same condition with the other public grounds.

Mr. JONES. I think, sir, the gentleman will find, by examination, that the Long Bridge across the Potomac river, which is causing the river to be filled up above and below that bridge, so that it is now not unfrequently, at low water, naked for a large extent, is more deleterious to the health of that part of the city than this piece of ground south of the President's House. But why is it that the street has been fenced up?

Mr. COBB. It is not a street. It is only a part of the public grounds.

Mr. JONES. It has been open ever since I have been in Washington, and used as a street; and around that south wall there is a pavement.

Mr. CRAIGE. All the travel is on the other side.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Ohio. I do not think that if the sum appropriated by the last Congress has been found insufficient to finish the improvements upon this ground south of the President's House, this committee ought to hesitate to appropriate a small amount to finish them.

The argument of the gentleman from New York seems to me to be entirely inconsistent with good policy in this respect. It is well known to the gentlemen of this committee that the grounds south of the President's square border on the mouth of Tiber creek, where it enters into the Potomac, and that the ground is very flat, and hence exceedingly unhealthy. The remark of the gentleman from Tennessee in regard to the effect of the Potomac bridge upon the health of that part of the city may be correct. But is it not wise for us to have the improvements of these grounds completed, as they have been so far advanced? Suppose the money heretofore appropriated has been squandered, we are not responsible for that. The responsibility belongs to the Executive. We are asked by a responsible person to appropriate $9,000 to complete the improvements of these grounds, and it seems to me that they ought not to be left in an unfinished state. From what information I have obtained, as a member of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, I think it is absolutely necessary to make this appropriation, and I hope the committee will concur in the amendment of the Senate, and pass on to something else.

The question was taken on Mr. JONES's amendment; and it was rejected.

Mr. MORGAN. I move to amend the Senate amendment, so as to reduce the appropriation $5,000; and I do it for the purpose of asking the same question as I asked before. I wish to know how much of the $9,700 has been already expended? I ask the question in order that I may be able to guess what amount will be asked for in the next deficiency bill.

Mr. CRAIGE. I will answer the gentleman's question as far as I am able to do it. The Superintendent of Public Buildings and Grounds says that this amount is necessary. I cannot tell the gentleman how much has been already expended, for the reason that the work is now going on.

Mr. MORGAN. Then you do not know but what just as much will be called for next year?

Mr. CRAIGE. I cannot say as to that. I think that this sum will be sufficient to finish the improvements. That is the opinion of the Superintendent of Public Buildings and Grounds, of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and of everybody acquainted with the work. But I cannot say how much has already been expended. About half the grounds have been turfed, all the ditching has been done, and the work is now going on.

Mr. MORGAN. I withdraw the amendment I offered.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is upon concurring in the amendment of the Senate, as amended by the committee.

The question was then taken; and decided in the affirmative—yeas 72, noes not counted.

So the amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

The eleventh amendment was read, as follows:

For iron flagging in front of the old portion of the Patent Office Building, and altering windows and private stair-way $5,730.

Mr. PHELPS. The Committee of Ways and Means recommend a non-concurrence in this amendment. They deem it advisable, before making the appropriation asked for, to wait until the improvements are nearly finished about the Patent Office Building.

The question was then taken; and the committee refused to concur in the Senate amendment.

The twelfth amendment, next in order, was then read, as follows:

For altering streets and repaving in front of the east wing of the Patent Office Building, iron railing and flagging, and painting new saloon, $14,250.

Mr. PHELPS. The committee make the same recommendation in this case—a non-concurrence with the amendment of the Senate.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Ohio. Do I understand that the committee recommend a non-concurrence in the amendment of the Senate?

Mr. PHELPS. The committee deem it advisable that the building should be finished before the appropriation asked for is made.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky. I ask, for information simply, if this work has not already been done? If debts have not been contracted which make it necessary that this appropriation shall be made?

The question was then taken on the amendment; and it was not concurred in.

The thirteenth amendment was then read, as follows:

For furnishing the rooms of the new wing of the Patent Office Building with furniture, and providing the saloon therein with cases for models, $45,000.

Mr. PHELPS. The committee recommend a concurrence in that amendment.

The question was then taken; and the amendment was concurred in.

The fourteenth amendment was then read, as follows:

For completing the improvement of Pennsylvania avenue from Seventeenth to Twenty-sixth street west, $9,000: Provided, That all appropriations herein made for repairs and improvements of the public buildings or grounds within the District of Columbia, shall be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. PHELPS. The Committee of Ways and Means recommend a non-concurrence in this amendment.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky. I would ask the gentleman from Missouri what reason the committee assign for recommending a non-concurrence with this amendment? The work is in a half-finished state, and ought to be completed.

Mr. PHELPS. During the last session of Congress an appropriation was made for the purpose of completing and paving the grounds; and a strict contract was required to be entered into for that purpose. We understand that the work could not have been accepted under that contract. Such is the report of the Superintendent of Public Buildings. There has been a change in that office; and I do not know by what means it happened that the public has been injured by the non-fulfillment of the contract entered into by the contractor for the pavement of these grounds. The Committee of Ways and Means, for this reason, recommend non-concurrence in the amendment.

The question was taken; and the amendment was non-concurred in.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will now report the fifteenth amendment of the Senate.

Mr. PHELPS. I propose that the committee consider the fifteenth, sixteenth, seventeenth, and eighteenth amendments together. It is only anticipating the amount due under treaty stipulations to the Sioux Indians, and is taken up for the Indian appropriation bill. The committee recommend concurrence in them. The money is due by treaty stipulations.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection the Clerk will read those amendments.

The amendments were then reported, as follows:

For fulfilling treaties with the Sioux of the Mississippi: For the third of fifty installments of interest, at the rate of five per cent. per annum, on $1,360,000, stipulated in the fourth article of the treaty of 23d July, 1851, $68,000.

For the third of fifty installments of interest, at the rate of five per cent. per annum, on $112,000, being the amount in lieu of the reservation set apart in the third article of the treaty of 23d July, 1851, per Senate's amendment thereof, $5,600.

For the third of fifty installments of interest, at the rate of five per cent. per annum, on $1,160,000, stipulated in the fourth article of the treaty of 5th August, 1851, $58,000.

For the third of fifty installments of interest, at the rate of five per cent. per annum, on $69,000, being the amount in lieu of the reservation set apart in the third article of the treaty of 5th August, 1851, per Senate's amendment thereof, $3,450.

The question was taken on concurring with these amendments; and they were agreed to.

The nineteenth amendment was then reported, as follows:

To pay clerks for services performed on Chickasaw Indian business, in pursuance of the regulations of the President of the United States, and in conformity with the decision of the late Secretary of the Interior, $6,187 50.

Mr. PHELPS. The Committee of Ways and Means recommend a concurrence in that amendment. The amount was estimated for in the annual estimates.

The question was taken; and the amendment was concurred in.

The twentieth amendment was then reported, as follows:

For the actual and necessary expenses incurred by the provisional government of Oregon, in defending the people of said Territory from the attacks and hostilities of the Cayuse Indians, in the years 1847 and 1848, and for such allowances for the expense of adjusting the claims on that account as the Secretary of the Treasury may deem proper, $75,000. But the said claims and accounts shall be settled and adjusted at such place and in such manner as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe; and no claims shall hereafter be allowed on account of this war which are not presented within the next fiscal year.

Pending the reading of the amendment, Mr. PHELPS, (interrupting.) The reading of this amendment is not necessary. It may be rejected, as the Committee of the Whole House have recommended the passage of a bill to defray the expenses incurred in the Cayuse war with Oregon, while they were considering territorial business; and, if I mistake not, the bill has been passed.

Mr. HOUSTON. Oh, no. It is better to have the appropriation made in this way.

Mr. PHELPS. Then I withdraw my suggestion. I hope, therefore, this amendment will be adopted.

Mr. HAVEN. Mr. Chairman, I hope the amendment will not be adopted. If gentlemen have ascertained that there are certain provisions and resolutions which should accompany this appropriation, it is better that the amendment be non-concurred in.

Mr. HOUSTON. The amendment appropriates $75,000, the same amount as was appropriated in the bill in question.

The question was taken on concurring in the Senate's amendment; and it was non-concurred in.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will now report the twenty-first amendment.

Mr. PHELPS. Let the twenty-first and twenty-second amendments be read, as the same explanation applies to both.

They were accordingly read, as follows:

Page ten, after line two hundred and thirteen, insert: For arrearages of pay for services of volunteers in the Kentucky regiment called into service in 1836, $1,000.

For arrearages of pay for services rendered by volunteers or militia in the Black Hawk war, $1,000.

Mr. PHELPS. These sums are estimated as being necessary to defray the expenses of the volunteers called into service. The appropriations are recommended by the Department.

The question was taken on the two amendments; and they were concurred in.

The twenty-third amendment was next reported, as follows:

For clothing for the Army, camp and garrison equipage, and horse equipments, to supply the place of losses sustained by the wreck of the steamer San Francisco, $26,590.

Mr. PHELPS. That amendment recommends itself, and the Committee of Ways and Means recommend a concurrence in it.

The question was put; and the amendment was concurred in.

The twenty-fourth amendment was then reported, as follows:

For the transportation of Governor Stevens and his party, and for explorations made by him between the Mississippi river and the Pacific ocean, $40,000.

Mr. PHELPS. The Committee of Ways and Means recommend a non-concurrence in that amendment.

[A message was here received from the Senate, by the hands of ASBURY DICKINS, Esq., their Secretary, notifying the House that the Senate had passed bills of the House of the following titles:

An act regulating the times of holding the sessions of the district and circuit courts of the United States for the eastern district of Louisiana; and

An act to establish an additional land office in the State of Florida.

Also, requesting the House to return to the Senate a bill passed by the House for the relief of Thomas Frazer.]

Mr. HAVEN. I move that the bill referred to in the message from the Senate be returned to the Senate.

The question was put; and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. McDUGALL. I offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's table.

The amendment was reported, as follows:

For deficiencies of Governor Stevens and his party, $25,000; for deficiencies of Lieutenant Whipple and his party, $15,000; and for further explorations between the Mississippi river and the Pacific ocean, $50,000.

Mr. McDUGALL. I will ask the Clerk to read a letter upon this subject from the Secretary of War.

The letter was read, as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
WASHINGTON, May 22, 1851.

SIR: In reply to your letter of the 16th instant, I have the honor to state that the amount required to cover deficiencies in the appropriation for the survey of a railroad route to the Pacific is estimated at $40,000. In the report from this Department of the 6th of February last, the deficiency was estimated at $25,000. Lieutenant Whipple has since, in a report, of which I inclose a copy, stated the deficiency for his party at $15,000. I have this day brought the subject to the attention of the Committee of Ways and Means, and requested that an appropriation of $40,000 be made to supply the deficiencies in question.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
JEFFERSON DAVIS,
Secretary of War.

Hon. J. W. McDUGALL, Chairman of Committee on Pacific Railroad, House of Representatives.

Mr. McDUGALL. The $40,000 which are appropriated in the Senate amendment, is the item of $25,000 which was estimated for Governor Stevens, and $15,000, added upon the motion of one of the Senators from California, for the continuation of the exploration of Noble's Pass, for a railroad route through the Sierra Nevada; that being the amount estimated for by the Secretary of War. The item of $15,000, added to the $25,000, is designed to cover the deficiency of Lieutenant Whipple, and to complete the exploration. Since the adoption of the Senate amendment, Lieutenant Whipple has arrived in this city, and he informs me that $15,000 in addition will be necessary to carry on these explorations. They are now incomplete; and I am informed that before the general appropriation bills will be passed, the appropriations already made will have been exhausted, and that $50,000 in addition will be necessary to complete the explorations at this time. The explorations of Governor Stevens are very incomplete; and in order to enable him to go on with the work the present season, some such sum as this must be appropriated, beyond the appropriation of $40,000 recommended in the Senate amendment. Unless this be done, the work must be discontinued, and the explorations for the whole year be lost.

The amount asked for is small in comparison with the magnitude of the result which it is proposed to accomplish, and I hope the amount of $50,000 will be appropriated. I state again, that the explorations of Governor Stevens are incomplete, and he cannot prosecute the work during the present session unless this appropriation be made. It is a matter of very great importance that there should be an exploration of Noble's Pass, which is the only practical pass through the Sierra. If it is not designed by the Government to abandon this magnificent enterprise, it is exceedingly important that this appropriation should be made.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I hope, sir, that the amendment of the gentleman from California will not be adopted, nor the amendment of the Senate concurred in. For one, I cannot vote for either, nor can I see how any old-fashioned, straight-faced Democrat can vote for either of the proposed appropriations. Sir, the doctrine held at one time, and still held by me, is, that this Government has no power, under the Constitution, to commence or carry on works of internal improvement. By making this appropriation providing for these surveys, you concede, in my opinion, the whole power to the Government. If you have authority under the Constitution to make appropriations from the Treasury for surveys, preparatory to the construction of a road, I cannot conceive how you can deny the power of the Government to go on and complete the work. Sir, by making any appropriations at all for this purpose, you proceed directly in the face of the doctrine laid down by the Democratic party; and I hope the members of that party in this House will put themselves right upon the record, by rejecting the amendment of the gentleman from California, and also that of the Senate.

But, sir, it is not my purpose—I have not the time, if I had the disposition—to go into an examination of this question. I suppose it will come up, and be discussed fully when we come to consider the bill which is the special order in this committee to-morrow.

Mr. McDougall. I withdraw the amendment, and move that the appropriation be increased $5,000. I wish to state, that it is not necessary for me to affirm, in presenting this amendment, the power of the Federal Government to make this class of improvements. That power is not involved. I do not think it necessary to affirm that doctrine now; nor do I think that it will be necessary to affirm it any time this session of Congress. This provision is simply for an exploration of our own territory, to ascertain its resources, its capabilities. The territory is a vast one, and lies between the Rocky Mountains and the Pacific ocean. It is our own property, our own possessions. Does the gentleman deny that we have the power to inquire into the capabilities and resources of all portions of the Confederacy, particularly of the Territories, our own property, which it is our business to make available and valuable? I have risen to state that the question of the power of the Government to make internal improvements is not involved here. All these explorations are valuable; valuable not merely for railroad purposes, but for the purpose of enabling us to understand the capabilities and resources of our vast Republic. Very important it is to favor all these explorations. They ought to be multiplied.

The question was taken; and the amendment to the amendment was lost.

The question was then taken on the amendment of the Senate, and it was non-concurred in.

The Clerk reported the twenty-fifth amendment of the Senate, as follows:

For continuing the works for bringing water into the city of Washington, $500,000.

Mr. PHELPS. Mr. Chairman, the Committee of Ways and Means recommend a non-concurrence in this amendment of the Senate. It proposes an appropriation of $500,000 towards the introduction of water into this city. Already $100,000 have been appropriated for that purpose, and I believe that nearly the whole of that sum has been expended. On the plan under which that $100,000 was expended, the estimates of the officer show that the aqueduct will cost $2,300,000. It must be borne in mind that this is the estimate of the officer in charge of the work. In all public works which have been constructed within my experience, we have always found that the real cost far exceeded the estimates submitted by the officers who had them in charge at the time of commencement.

Another plan has been proposed for bringing water into this city by a gentleman of the name of Salamon. I think that his plan would involve an expenditure of about $1,000,000. It is shown by his plans and estimates—and they are both indorsed by respectable gentlemen—that under his plan the city could be amply supplied with water, even should its growth exceed what is anticipated by its friends. For this reason the Committee of Ways and Means recommend a non-concurrence in the amendment of the Senate.

It is proper that I should remark that the estimates concerning public buildings and public grounds of the city of Washington belong more appropriately to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds; but being placed in the deficiency bill by the Senate, it became the duty of the Committee of Ways and Means to examine and report on them.

Mr. HAMILTON. I have a remark or two to make in connection with this proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman be kind enough to offer an amendment.

Mr. HAMILTON. I am going to oppose the recommendation of the Committee of Ways and Means, and speak in favor of the appropriation.

Mr. PHELPS. In order to enable the gentleman from Maryland to speak in order, I will move an amendment pro forma. I move to strike out "$500,000."

Mr. HAMILTON. This whole subject, together with all the estimates, was referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia—of which I am a member—during the early part of the winter. This appropriation was recommended by the Secretary of War, and reasons were given why it should be voted by Congress.

It will be recollected by the House, that at the first session of the last Congress an appropriation of $5,000 was made for the purpose of securing to this city a supply of water from the Potomac river. That money was expended, and the surveys made by Captain Meigs were reported to this House, and afterwards, at the last session of Congress, $100,000 was appropriated, to be expended upon the execution of whatever plan might be adopted by the President of the United States. Three plans were proposed by Captain Meigs, either one of which could have been adopted: one to bring the water from the Little Falls; one to bring it from Rock Creek; and the other to bring it from the Great Falls. The President of the United States adopted the plan proposing to bring the water from the Great Falls. The act appropriating the $100,000 made it obligatory upon him to select the plan, and the money was to be expended on the plan adopted by him. That has been done. The money has been expended; the work has been commenced; lands in Maryland have been condemned; contracts—embryo contracts, at least—have been entered into to furnish the bricks, and everything connected with the work. If this House is determined that the work shall be continued, that it shall not be abandoned, I conceive that this is the proper time to make the appropriation. This is the estimate of the War Department; and the House is urged to adopt it upon the ground that now is the proper time if it is to be appropriated at all; that the sickly season will soon commence; that the $100,000 has already been expended; that the work must otherwise remain in its present condition until the commencement of next year, and in that event, it will end in a loss to the Government of the money which has been already expended.

Sir, I hold to the opinion that this work will go on, now that it has been commenced. I originally opposed this project strongly and sternly in this House. But it has sufficient foundation to be irresistible, and the question now is, whether this appropriation should be made so as to avoid such a loss to the Government?

Sir, if the appropriation is to be made at all, it ought to be made now, and in this bill. I have reported a bill for this very purpose, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, but it is in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and there is no probability that it will be reached till near the close of the session, if at all; and this is as good a place for the appropriation as any other.

Mr. PHELPS. With the permission of the committee, I will now withdraw my amendment; and I hope we shall have a vote at once upon the Senate amendment. I suppose members have made up their minds upon it.

There being no objection, the amendment was withdrawn.

The question recurred on concurring in the amendment of the Senate.

Mr. PHELPS. Another vote can be taken upon it in the House. Let the amendment, therefore, be rejected, and the question will come in the House upon concurring with such action.

Mr. HAMILTON. I would ask the Chairman what the state of the question is?

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon concurring with the amendment presented to the committee by the Senate.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. The amendment of the Senate provides for supplying this city; and all of us who wish water will vote to concur in that amendment.

Mr. FLORENCE. I desire to ask a question. The CHAIRMAN. No debate is in order.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky, obtained the floor.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Will the gentleman from Kentucky allow me to ask a question of the gentleman from Missouri, over the way, in regard to this matter?

[Cries of "Order!" "Order!"]

Mr. SMITH. Is it not in order to ask questions? I wish to inquire whether the appropriation which has been made was not subject to the plan of the President; and whether the plan now being presented is not one which he has advised?

Mr. PHELPS. My information is, that it is the plan which was adopted by the President; but that does not preclude the Congress of the United States from adopting any other plan.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky. I offer the following amendment:

Provided, however, That no part of said sum shall be expended, except upon condition that, after advertisement for sixty days, a contract can be made with responsible parties, who will give bond and security for the faithful and complete execution of the work, for a sum not to exceed the amount of the engineer's original estimates.

I do not believe that this project is understood by the House. If I believed the members were in possession of proper information, to enable them to judge wisely of the consequences of this appropriation, I would not detain the committee by a single remark. The work for supplying the citizens of Washington and Georgetown with water, as proposed to be carried out under this appropriation, is of too vast a magnitude not to merit some consideration. I am not opposed to any economical and feasible plan for procuring water; but I am opposed to this, because I believe most sincerely that, to complete it, will require not less than $5,000,000.

The appropriation of $100,000, made by Congress at the last session, was rejected by this House when first proposed. When it came from the Senate as an amendment to the appropriation bill, it was again rejected, and only passed upon the recommendation of a committee of conference, to save the bill to which it was attached. No single member in either House who voted for it ever dreamed that it was but the beginning of an expenditure which was to be calculated by millions. No, sir; if it had been so supposed, I venture to say the appropriation would never have succeeded.

It is true, as the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. HAMILTON] says, there have been three plans suggested for supplying the cities with water—one from the Great Falls, another from the Little Falls, and the other from Rock Creek. The plan from the Great Falls proposes to erect upon the crest of the falls a dam eight feet high, from which water is to be conveyed to this point through a brick conduit of nine feet in diameter, and about sixteen miles long. No human power can place a dam at that point of sufficient strength to resist the freshets, which sometimes swell the river from thirty to fifty feet above the ordinary level of the stream. The project is wild and visionary, and can never prove anything but a failure. Along this line of aqueduct there are to be placed two reservoirs; the principal one at the Little Falls, to contain eighty-two millions five hundred and twenty-one thousand five hundred gallons, at an elevation above high tide in the Potomac of one hundred and forty-five feet, and a distributing reservoir, a short distance above Georgetown, to contain fifty-nine million seven hundred and eighty-three thousand gallons, also at an elevation of only one hundred and forty-five feet above tide water. The former will cover fifty acres, and the other thirty-six acres. I have before me the map made by the engineers of these several surveys, and the position of these reservoirs, from which the course of the aqueduct may be seen. Here is the Rock Creek survey, (exhibiting it upon the map,) to which I ask the attention of the committee. It will be seen by this plan that it proposes to have a dam, at no greater distance from Washington than the distributing dam of the Great Falls project, of greater capacity than both the dams on that project together, and at a higher elevation. It will contain two hundred and thirty-one millions, and is situated one hundred and sixty-six feet above tide water. This project was first surveyed by Colonel George W. Hughes, of Maryland, then a member of the Engineer Corps, and was estimated would not exceed in cost $500,000. It was subsequently surveyed by Captain Meigs, and has been highly approved as the best plan by some of the most enlightened and experienced civil engineers in the country. And I may here ask, why is it that the Great Falls plan, which cannot be carried out without an increased expenditure of public money more than is necessary, should be preferred to the one which brings the water from Rock Creek? The Rock Creek plan, by the engineer's own showing upon the map, will afford two hundred and thirty-one millions of gallons, while both reservoirs together, on the other plan, will not afford that much, nor at so high an elevation. Surely, a superabundance of water may be had from Rock Creek, of the best quality; and on account of the smallness of the cost, it ought to be preferred. But why bring the water from the Great Falls, when it may be had in abundance at the Little Falls, not more than half the distance from the city?

Mr. HILLYER. Will the gentleman from Kentucky allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. STANTON. I would do so cheerfully, but I have but five minutes' time to devote to the subject, and wish to make a few more remarks. I have recently seen the statistics of the Philadelphia water-works. They were, I think, commenced about 1794; and from that time to the present, the whole cost of original construction, repairs, and every other expense, has been only about $3,200,000. These works have been kept in operation for sixty years, and now supply a population of four hundred thousand persons; and this has been the whole expense! The estimates of Captain Meigs, for his project of water-works, is $2,300,000—and this only to begin with, only the original construction! Why, sir, the population to be supplied is only about one eighth of that of Philadelphia, and we propose to expend almost as much to begin with, as has been expended in sixty years to keep supplied abundantly a city of four hundred thousand inhabitants. But I know something of the topography of the country through which this aqueduct is to run, and a rougher and more impracticable location for such a work could hardly have been found in any portion of our territory. The estimates of the engineer are not, in the view of many practical men, as experienced and intelligent as the engineer himself, one half of what the work must cost to complete it, if we allow it to go on according to the magnificent plan upon which it has been projected. The whole thing, sir, is upon a scale of magnificence not even rivaled by the renowned structures of a similar kind for which ancient Rome was famed. I know of no reason why we should expend the people's money upon such a project, unless to hand down to posterity the name of its author, and perpetuate, to future ages, the folly and wastefulness of this Congress.

Mr. HILLYER. I would like to inquire from the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. STANTON,] if, in the alterations in the plan of which he has been speaking, he did not refer to the plan of taking the water from Rock Creek, instead of from the Potomac?

Mr. STANTON. What alterations does the gentleman allude to?

Mr. HILLYER. That about which you have been speaking to the committee. This plan which you have been advocating—does it not look to taking the water from Rock Creek, and not from the Potomac?

Mr. STANTON. Yes; at an elevation of one hundred and sixty-six feet above tide water on the Potomac river, and at a cost of $500,000. And this plan would give two hundred and thirty-one millions of gallons of water, while the other plan, which is to cost $2,300,000, would give only eighty-two millions of gallons, at the same distance from the city, and from an elevation of twenty-one feet less.

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Chairman, I regret extremely that the honorable gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. STANTON,] has seen fit to place this great enterprise before the House in the manner that he has. The members of this House would suppose that there is deception somewhere; and, indeed it necessarily carries upon its face evidence that there is deception somewhere. There is something more involved in this than appears upon its face. The fact that the gentleman states that there should be two hundred million gallons of water supplied from Rock Creek, and only eighty-two millions from the Potomac, is of itself sufficient to show that there is something wrong somewhere. But it is not as thus stated. If the members are at all conversant with the report of Mr. Meigs to the President of the United States upon this subject, they will remember that he says that Rock Creek will supply the city of Washington with not more than from eight to ten millions of gallons of water daily. It may at some seasons of the year supply more.

Mr. STANTON. The gentleman from Maryland misunderstood me. I said that that amount would be contained in the dam. Rock Creek will supply nineteen millions of gallons daily.

Mr. HAMILTON. It may at some seasons of the year; but it will not supply more than ten millions of gallons in the summer. That exposes the fallacy of the position of the gentleman from Kentucky in reference to this work. The Potomac works will furnish this city daily with sixty-seven millions of gallons; and this will be its capacity at all seasons of the year. The difference, then, between the capacity of the two works is the difference between eight or ten millions of gallons and sixty-seven millions of gallons at all seasons of the year.

Mr. SKELTON. I would ask the gentleman what use has this city for such a vast quantity of water? Is it to be used to run machinery, and for such like purposes?

Mr. HAMILTON. We all have our ideas upon that subject. They may differ somewhat; but I am not called upon to enter into an argument to prove the necessity of that amount of water, and of the use which can be made of it. But we have men in this city who have great ideas in regard to the magnificence of the capital, and of the requirements of the metropolis of the Union. They have the idea that we are to have fountains, and jets, and reservoirs in all our public grounds, and everything of that kind, which will consume this vast amount of water.

Ten millions of gallons are required for the supply of a single jet daily in the Boston Commons; and if this city is to be, according to the opinion of many men, yes, of the great mass of the American people, the metropolis of the greatest Republic that ever existed, and of the greatest country upon the face of the habitable globe, the day may come when it will require, not ten, but sixty-seven millions of gallons daily to supply the wants and conveniences of its citizens.

But I care nothing about that. My object is to show the capacity of these works, and the difference between the two. I suppose this House is not disposed to enter into a controversy as to the parties who are involved in this matter, and as to whether this, or that, or the other work shall be selected. What kind of an avocation would it be for two hundred and forty members to sit here and decide upon the proper plan to be adopted? We have referred that question to the proper officer of the Government, for the purpose of securing unity of action. We gave that power to the President of the United States absolutely and unqualifiedly, and we adopted the plan which he selected, and this Congress, by its action thus far, has carried it out. That plan was estimated to cost $2,300,000. We adopted that plan when we conferred the power upon the President, and appropriated money for that purpose.

Mr. HILLYER. I ask the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. STANTON] to withdraw his amendment, to enable me to offer another?

Mr. STANTON. I withdraw it, if there is no objection to my doing so.

No objection was made, and the amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. HILLYER. I move to increase the appropriation $10,000.

During the last Congress, Mr. Chairman, I served upon the Committee for the District of Columbia, and this subject was frequently before that House committee, and I know something about it. We then heard much of the two plans proposed to bring water into this city. The one involved a very large expenditure, as was said, and the other involved, comparatively, a small expenditure.

The large expense involved of conducting the water from the Potomac into this city is the principal objection of those who oppose this appropriation. But it is proposed to bring it from Rock Creek because it will cost less. Now, sir, it will be ascertained, if gentlemen are disposed to go into the investigation of this subject, that Rock Creek rises in the valley of the Potomac, and that the water is not sufficiently pure to be suitable for supplying the city of Washington with water; while the water in the Potomac comes from the mountains, and is precisely what is wanted. None can be purer. It is desirable, it is of vast importance, that the water which is to supply the people of this city should be from the very purest source.

These various plans have been submitted to the President of the United States, and by him referred to scientific men, who have examined them thoroughly, and have reported in favor of bringing the pure water from the Great Falls of the Potomac. They have selected that as the source from whence this aqueduct is to be brought. Now, sir, I think that the judgment of the President of the United States, and of these scientific gentlemen, should be sustained by the action of this House. It is true that it will involve the expenditure of a large amount of money; it is true that it will involve, perhaps, a larger amount than either of the other plans; but it seems to me that the advantages of this plan are more than sufficient to balance the increased amount which will be needed. I think, therefore, that instead of diminishing the amount of this appropriation, it should be increased.

Mr. HAMILTON. I will state, that according to the report of Lieutenant Meigs, the whole cost of bringing the water from Rock Creek is $1,258,863.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky. According to Colonel Hughes's report it will cost only $500,000.

Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia. If the gentleman will allow me, in order that the committee may understand what this Rock Creek is, I will inform them that it is the little stream—

A MEMBER. The Tiber?

Mr. BAYLY. No, not the Tiber; but the little filthy stream that runs between Georgetown and Washington. It has on its banks—God knows what are on its banks; but I do not think the water is good to drink any more than that of the Tiber is. It is about of the same description, though it is a larger stream.

Mr. HILLYER. If there be no objection, I will withdraw my amendment.

Mr. MILLSON. I object. I desire to speak in opposition to it.

Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to say anything in regard to the merits of these various plans for bringing water into the city; but, sir, I propose to speak in opposition to them all. It may be my fault. It may be that I do not understand the duties of Congress or the obligations as well as I ought; but really I have not been able to see the obligation there is upon the people of the United States at large to supply the people of Washington with water to drink. Now, sir, if these water-works are designed for some public purpose, if they are designed for any purpose for which Congress may properly appropriate the money of the United States, let it be shown. But if the design be simply to supply the people of Washington with water to drink, I really do not see the propriety of doing it. I do not believe there is a city in the world that is supplied with water except at its own expense. The city of New York is supplied at its own expense.

Mr. CRAIGE. Is the gentleman not aware that a large proportion of the property in the city is Government property, and is not subject to taxation?

A MEMBER. There are $40,000,000 of property here belonging to the Government which is not subject to taxation.

Mr. HILLYER. The Government has property to the amount of $40,000,000 here.

Mr. MILLSON. It is said that the Government has property here which pays no tax. Why should it pay a tax to the people of Washington? On what ground can the gentlemen suppose that the Government of the United States ought to pay the inhabitants of Washington for the privilege of building on its own lands?

Mr. CRAIGE. If the Government should not pay tax, why should the people of Washington be called upon to furnish water for the public property of the country, as well as for the public employes?

Mr. MILLSON. There is no such obligation on the part of the inhabitants of Washington. If they bring water here for their own use, and the Government want its use, it ought to pay for it. But I do not see why the people of the United States should be at the expense of supplying the people of Washington with water. I do not see why my constituents, who have to drink very bad water, should be charged with a tax for the purpose of supplying the people of Washington, who already have much better water than they can get.

Now, sir, in reference to the use of the water by the Government, I should like to hear gentlemen explain the reasons why, as a mere matter of public utility, this appropriation should be made. I ask the gentleman with a sincere desire to receive information on the subject. If the public interests are to be promoted by this expenditure, let us know how. But I do not see on what principle it is that the people of the United States at large are to be charged with the payment of some $5,000,000 for the purpose of bringing water into the city of Washington, not for public, but for private uses? I shall vote against the whole appropriation, unless there be some better reason than that the inhabitants of Washington have not as large a supply of good drinking water as they perhaps may desire.

Mr. HILLYER. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. I move to reduce the appropriation to $10,000.

I understand, Mr. Chairman, indeed I know, for I have had frequent conversations with practical gentlemen, who understand this question, that there have been proposed three plans for bringing water into the city of Washington; one plan spoken of at Rock Creek, which is estimated to cost about $500,000. The gentleman from Virginia is mistaken in reference to the character of the water in that creek. It is derived from springs, and is perfectly pure, and quite as good as that of the Potomac, I do not know but better. It will furnish ten million of gallons daily, by the estimates of these gentlemen who have examined it, a quantity amply sufficient for the city of Washington for a century to come.

A second proposition is, to construct works at the Little Falls, a short distance from the city of Washington, which would cost something more than the proposition to get water at Rock Creek, and would involve the necessity of machinery to elevate the water to a sufficient height to spread it over the city. Nevertheless, that project would not cost more than one half, probably not more than one third, the cost of bringing it from the Great Falls. Now, I have heard practical gentlemen, engineers, who are well acquainted with this subject, say that the plan proposed by Captain Meigs will not cost less than $7,000,000. And I venture to assert here to day, and I appeal to the future history of this work, that it will not cost one dime less than $5,000,000.

Sir, I say the whole project is extravagant, and ought not to be adopted. If the city of Washington is to be supplied with water by the Government of the United States, we ought to do it on some more feasible and practical plan. When other plans can be adopted, with a saving of several millions of dollars, we have no excuse for adhering to the present one.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Ohio. I desire to call the attention of the committee to the facts as they now exist, and to what we ought to do as practical men. On 3d March, 1853, we appropriated $100,000, for the purpose of bringing water into the city of Washington. Here is the provision:

"To be expended under the direction of the President of the United States, for the purpose of bringing water into the city of Washington, upon such plan, and from such places, as he may approve, $100,000: Provided, That if the plan adopted by the President of the United States should require water to be drawn from any source within the limits of Maryland, the assent of the Legislature of that State should first be obtained."

Well, sir, I learn, from the best information that I can obtain, that it is necessary to get the water within the State of Maryland, and that the assent of that State has been obtained. If gentlemen will refer to House Document No. 1, of the present session, they will find there the report of the Secretary of War, and what he says upon the subject. He says:

"An appropriation was made at the last session of Congress, for the purpose of bringing water into the city of Washington. In order to obtain an ample and constant supply from a source so elevated as to avoid the necessity of the use of machinery, it was decided that the water should be drawn from the Great Falls of the Potomac, through a conduit nine feet in diameter. Upon the adoption of this plan, immediate application was made to the Legislature of Maryland, in which State the source of supply lies, for their assent to the proposed work, which being given on conditions readily complied with, some portions of the necessary land were selected and purchased, and, as soon as the season would permit, a considerable force was put upon the work.

"The works are estimated to cost rather less than $2,300,000; and when completed, will be capable of delivering seventy million gallons of water daily, at an elevation of fourteen feet above the upper floor of the Capitol. For further information and details, I refer to the report of the chief engineer."

Well, now, sir, gentlemen greatly mislead the committee, unless they have much better information than I am able to derive from public or private sources, when they say this project will cost $5,000,000. The Secretary of War, upon information derived from the engineers, says that the works are estimated to cost less than $2,300,000. Who am I to believe? Who has got the best information on the subject? I take it for granted that the Secretary of War has got the best information that the nature of the case admitted of, and I am prepared to act upon it.

I wish to say, further, that while I am against any extravagant appropriations for bringing water into the city of Washington, I think our past history here makes it imperative upon us to take some steps to preserve the public archives and public buildings of our Government from fire. Gentlemen who were here a few years ago know that the library of Congress was burned for want of water; and the Secretaries of State for the last eight or ten years have told you that the public records are in daily peril, and that the archives may be burnt up any day for want of water.

Sir, the public are vitally interested in this matter. Gentlemen ask why we should supply the citizens of Washington with water. We must do it to meet the public emergencies here. The United States own ten million dollars worth of property in this city, and the most valuable records of our nation are here. We have a population here now of fifty thousand inhabitants, and ere long, in the progress of our country, that population will probably amount to two hundred thousand. The records of the country are growing daily and daily more important, and every gentleman here knows that there is not now the necessary supply of water to extinguish fires, to protect the public buildings, and to satisfy the wants of the public men here, to say nothing of the convenience of the inhabitants of the city. It behooves us, therefore, not to abandon this plan. Shall we throw away the $100,000 already expended, or shall we continue the work? I am not prepared to say that the appropriation recommended by the Senate is not too large; but they had all the information before them; they had the recommendation of the Secretary of War, under the direction of the President of the United States; and upon that information they say that this appropriation is necessary to carry on the work on the plan adopted by the President, under authority of law. Why, then, should we abandon that plan now, and refuse to vote this money?

The appropriations heretofore made have been ascertained not to be sufficient. The proposition is to furnish ten million gallons of water daily to this city, which is needed when we take into the account that the city comprises an area of five miles in extent, and its great importance to the nation—how important it is that the city should be supplied with water, in order to the preservation of the public records, the protection of your public edifices, and the property of the country, which is valued at about $10,000,000—

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. In order to test the question upon the amendment itself, I withdraw the amendment I offered.

Mr. BARRY. I move to amend by adding $1,000.

The point involved in this discussion is simply this, whether or not the aqueduct shall be continued? As has been stated, this work was begun under authority of Congress. The President was authorized to select a plan for the purpose of supplying the cities of Washington and Georgetown with a supply of water, and an appropriation made to begin the work. The President selected the plan of an aqueduct from the Great Falls, the specifications of which are in this report of Lieutenant Meigs. The appropriation has been exhausted, an additional appropriation is required, and we find ourselves discussing the relative value of different plans, as though the person to whose discretion Congress had intrusted the selection of a plan had not acted, or had acted unwisely. If this course is pursued, there can be nothing safe or stable in the progress of public works. At every session of Congress, influences will be brought to bear to induce the abandonment of the plan already adopted and in progress, for the adoption of another, in the opinion of its advocates cheaper, or otherwise preferable. Nothing can be achieved in this way.

If it was wise originally to refer the selection of a plan to the President and Secretary of War, it seems to me consistent to adhere to the plan they have adopted, unless there is shown eminently good reason for its rejection.

No such reason I think has been offered. Estimates have been referred to, which I think wholly erroneous. Lieutenant Meigs reports that a seven feet aqueduct supplying thirty-six million gallons of water daily, will cost, completed, $1,921,244. Thirty million gallons more of water can be supplied at an increased expense of $350,000, making $2,271,244, and allowing ten per cent. upon that sum for contingencies, we have $2,498,368, the entire cost of the work.

The Rock Creek aqueduct, by the estimate of the same officer, will cost, completed, $1,258,863, with a daily minimum supply of nine million eight hundred and sixty thousand gallons, one seventh of the supply of the Great Falls plan, at one half of the expense.

Another objection to the Rock Creek aqueduct is, that the creek being but a small stream, its waters may be rendered impure by manufactories that may be established upon its banks above the reservoir. The cultivation of the land on its banks will make the water muddy and impure. The supply from the Potomac is exhaustless, and the water as fine as any in the world, and, from its great volume, little apt to be injured by any cause.

Shall we now go into a discussion of all the various plans, as though the subject was under discussion for the first time? They were all brought before the Committee for the District of Columbia some months since; and the committee determined that, as the officers to whom the selection of a plan had been referred had acted, it was not a case that required our interference, and that we would report the estimates for the plan adopted rather than suggest a new one. The power and the right of Congress to make the change are unquestioned; but the expediency of doing so, unless it is determined to abandon the construction of the water-works, is the question.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky. I do not agree with the honorable gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. BARRY,] that the fact of the President's having approved the plan of the engineer which brings the water from the Great Falls, should deter us from rejecting this appropriation, if it appears to be our duty to do so. We are now asked to indorse the President's approval of this plan; for it is the first time that the character of the plan has ever been considered by this House. The first appropriation was made to be expended according to such plan as he should adopt. The plan was not then adopted, but we will approve it if we vote this appropriation of a half million of dollars. Now is the proper time to fight it. Now is the time to say whether we will sanction so immense an expenditure, by permitting the work to continue, when water may be supplied at so much less expense. Now is the time to put a stop to this reckless waste of the public money. The action of the President does not commit us. If he has been misled into the adoption of a scheme of waste and extravagance, it is our imperative duty to stop it by withholding the appropriation, as we have an undoubted right to do.

In regard to the Rock Creek plan, I may be permitted to refer to the report of Colonel Hughes, which I have in my hand. Colonel Hughes is known to many members of this House to be one of the most able and experienced engineers of the country. He made a most thorough reconnaissance of the Rock Creek stream, and his report is very able and satisfactory. He says, in regard to the water:

"The water of Rock Creek is pure, cool, and pleasant to the taste. In all of these particulars it is unexceptionable. For analysis of this and the water of the Potomac above the Little Falls, see the annexed paper by Dr. Forman, of the Smithsonian Institution.

"By measurements of the stream, made in the manner before described, we obtained the following results of its daily discharge:

On Hoyle's farm.....	22,021,080 gallons.
At proposed dam.....	22,000,000 "
At Claggett's ford.....	17,067,616 "

"It is usual, in estimating for the supply of a town with water, to allow to each soul thirty gallons daily. This is the highest calculation I have seen, and is, no doubt, ample for all the uses of a city, except for manufacturing purposes.

"According to the recent census, Washington city contains forty thousand and twenty-seven inhabitants. This would require for present wants one million two hundred thousand eight hundred and ten gallons of water daily. It is, therefore, perfectly apparent that a most abundant supply of water can be procured from Rock Creek on the plan I have proposed. An allowance of one million five hundred thousand gallons daily may be regarded as a very liberal supply for the present, and to meet this the capacity of the distributing reservoir might be reduced to five million gallons, which would greatly diminish its cost. I have, however, estimated for one of larger dimensions."

Colonel Hughes estimates the whole cost of constructing the works upon this stream at less than a half million of dollars. If there be any doubt as to the correctness of the estimates for construction, there certainly can be none as to the capacity of the stream to furnish a good supply of the best water. Colonel Hughes is sustained, too, by many eminent civil engineers, who have examined it, and this question is, therefore, beyond dispute.

If I remember correctly, Captain Meigs, in one of his reports, speaks of the hurried manner of his examinations, from want of time, and does not claim for his estimates perfect accuracy. Sir, such a survey and such a project should be the study of a whole year, instead of two or three months. His examinations could not have been more than cursory, and I have no doubt the scheme was rashly conceived and rashly adopted. The estimates cannot be reliable, and the work never can be executed for $2,300,000. This declaration is not made upon my own judgment alone. I have not conversed with a single engineer outside of the Army, who does not fully sustain me. Why, sir, it will take sixty million of bricks to construct the conduit alone. He has, I learn from the public papers, already contracted for forty million at ten dollars per thousand, dependent, however, upon Congress making an appropriation to pay for them. These are for the aqueduct alone. The foundation upon which the aqueduct is to rest, the masonry to carry it over the ravines, the excavations, the reservoirs, the land condemned, the dam, machinery, and other parts of the work will be equally costly. If the laying of these sixty millions bricks cost as much as those laid in the Capitol—and I presume they will cost more—the naked conduit alone, exclusive of excavation and foundations, will consume fully one half of the sum estimated. Why, sir, no man with the slightest practical idea of the character of this work, and the nature of the country through which it is to be constructed, can believe for a single moment that any reliance is to be placed upon the estimates presented to us. Why, sir, I have been informed that they are now, or have been, paying as much as $7 50 per cubic yard for some part of the excavations which are necessary to be made.

Mr. HILLYER. Seven dollars and fifty cents per cubic yard?

Mr. STANTON. Yes, sir; $7 50 per cubic yard.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. That is under military superintendence.

Mr. STANTON. That surprises the gentleman; but let me state my authority, for if not true, then I have been misled. A gentleman, knowing that a select committee of the House had under investigation the subject of employing military men to construct such works, came to me and told me he was prepared to prove that the excavations were being made at a cost of $7 50 per cubic yard. I do not know what is the character of the excavation, whether through solid rock or earth; but I presume it must be rock. It is a fair illustration of the folly pursued in the construction of our public works, and demands the exercise of the correcting hand of Congress.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Pennsylvania, offered a pro forma amendment.

I am in favor of supplying the city of Washington with water. I think the fact that the Government has so large an amount of money invested in public buildings, imposes upon us the obligation of supplying the city with water, if for no other purpose than for the protection of these public buildings. But if that object can be accomplished by an expenditure of $200,000, I never shall vote for an appropriation of five, or three, or even one million of dollars to accomplish the same purpose. Now, I undertake to say, from the information I have collected upon the subject, that with an expenditure of $200,000, this city can be supplied with water by forcing it up from the Potomac into a reservoir upon the high grounds around the city. A sufficient supply can thus be obtained for all the purposes for which it will be required.

I do not believe, though I am not booked upon the subject, that the great water works of the city of New York, cost $5,000,000.

Several MEMBERS. They cost $18,000,000.

Mr. WRIGHT. As one of the features connected with this proposed plan for supplying this city with water, we are told that here is an aqueduct of some seventeen miles in length, which will be built at an immense cost, when that water could be conveyed through iron pipes at one tenth or one fifth of building the aqueduct.

But, sir, this scheme, like every other scheme about this Capital, must be done upon a grand and expensive scale. And why? Because the money comes out of the public Treasury. There is no obligation upon the House to carry out any work upon so grand and scientific a scale, as is proposed to be done in this case. Do it upon a plain—an economical plan—and with direct reference to the amount of expenditure upon it, and as cheaply as it can be done. The fact that $100,000 has already been appropriated, furnishes me with no argument for the continuance of a work upon so expensive a scale as the plan which has been adopted. The best mode is the cheapest mode, and no person need tell me that an expenditure of $5,000,000 is necessary to accomplish this object, when it can be done for far less money; and when every practical man in Congress, and out of Congress, knows perfectly well that it can be done for an infinitely less sum.

Mr. RIDDLE. I did not intend to have taken any part in this debate, though I confess that the experience which I have had in the construction of water-works, for one city at least in this Union, has led me to investigate the subject somewhat fully, and that investigation has brought me to a different conclusion from that expressed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. WRIGHT.]

Now, sir, when these propositions were first presented to this Congress, I was under the impression that the cheapest and best method would be to bring the water in iron pipes, and, upon my own responsibility, I wrote to the most extensive iron works in this country to ascertain what thirty-inch iron pipe, carried a distance of thirteen miles, would cost; and I ascertained that so great would be the friction that it would not furnish a sufficient quantity of water to supply two thousand people, and that it would cost $7 50 a foot. Now, I say, as a practical man, that in the end it would be much cheaper and wiser to construct an aqueduct nine feet in diameter, which will not cost, through an ordinary excavation, more than ten dollars per foot, while it would furnish an abundant supply for two hundred thousand people.

Now, Mr. Chairman, another word. I was forcibly struck with the remarks of the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. BARRY,] that if we, in this House, attempt to decide which is the best plan, we shall continually be changing. I think the proper course was taken in the outset. We left the whole matter to the decision of the President of the United States and Secretary of War, who authorized a scientific man, a civil engineer, to make a survey and estimates. This gentleman, (Lieutenant Meigs,) upon whose judgment I have great reliance, called to his aid a practical civil engineer, one who had been connected with the Chesapeake and Ohio canal, and who stood high in his profession. The result of the investigations have been given in an able report to Congress. Now, sir, I should much prefer relying upon the report made by these gentlemen, than upon any information which I might derive from ten years study of the subject. And I think this committee would do much better to rely upon the report of those scientific gentlemen than to undertake to decide this question for themselves.

Mr. TAYLOR, by unanimous consent, withdrew his amendment.

Mr. VANSANT. I do not know upon what authority gentlemen base their estimates, as to the cost of their respective favorite plans. The gentleman from Pennsylvania on my right, [Mr. WRIGHT,] speaks of furnishing the city of Washington with water at a cost of $200,000. Another gentleman, upon the opposite side of the Hall, [Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky,] has declared that $500,000 will be sufficient for all purposes in supplying the city with water. Now, sir, if we look to the experience of other cities which have constructed works of a similar character, we shall be able to arrive at something approximating to a correct result. Two hundred thousand dollars for supplying the city of Washington with water! Why, Mr. Chairman, the cost of laying down the pipes for the net-work for the distribution of water in the city would cost $300,000 or $400,000, at the lowest estimate. The net-work in the city of Boston cost about $1,200,000. That of Philadelphia cost something like $700,000 or $900,000; and that of the city of New York about $2,000,000. And yet gentlemen talk about supplying a city occupying so much territory as Washington, for the small sum of from $200,000 to $500,000. Such estimates, it strikes me, are most remarkable.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. I do not understand that the Government is to carry the water all through the city.

Mr. HAMILTON. The Government is to lay the main trunks.

Mr. VANSANT. Gentlemen have asserted that there is no kind of reliance to be placed on the estimates of Captain Meigs, for the respective plans to bring water into this city. Now, I have not the pleasure of a personal acquaintance with Captain Meigs, nor do I know anything of his reputation as an engineer, but he has had at least I suppose, the advantages of theory and practice in his profession. He has had doubtless before him the experience and the estimates of competent engineers in the survey of the Croton works, and in their completion; of the Cochituate works, as also of the water-works at Philadelphia.

Looking at all these works, and taking the city of Boston as an illustration, I desire to answer the argument of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. STANTON,] who is a practical man in a portion of this character of work, in reference to the large estimate which he placed on the sixteen miles of aqueduct, &c. Now, water is introduced into the city of Boston from a distance of twenty miles, exceeding the distance to the Great Falls four miles. What did that work cost, including the net-work, and also, including the purchase of very valuable ground within the city, for the construction of reservoirs? One reservoir alone, erected on Beacon Hill, the highest part of that city, cost upwards of $509,000. It cost that amount because of the high price of property on which it is located, and the large amount of embellished masonry of which it is constructed. The reservoirs in Boston alone, cost over $1,000,000; and all along the line of the road property is much more valuable than it is along the line of road where it is proposed to construct the Potomac aqueduct, and yet the Boston work when completed cost something less than $5,000,000. The water debt is now greater than that sum, because, in the beginning, the rent from the water did not pay the interest on the original water loans and the current expenses consequent upon keeping the works in repair, &c.

Now, we will take New York as another illustration. Water is brought into the city of New York from a distance of forty miles, and yet when the water was introduced—and gentlemen to my left are very much mistaken in reference to the cost of the Croton works—and distributed through the mains, the cost was but little more than $9,000,000. The whole water debt now of New York city is something like $13,000,000. This augmentation of the debt has resulted from the construction of improvements in the works, their extension through the city, and in the failure of the water rents to be equal to the payment of the interest on the water loan, and the current expenses of the works.

Taking into consideration the extraordinarily great sums which so much contributed to swell the cost of the Croton works—for civil engineering, for the Harlem river viaduct—which cost about $1,000,000,—for bridging Manhattan valley, for interest on water loan during the five years that the work was progressing, &c.—and also expenses incurred in the construction of the Chocituate works, equally surprising, as evidenced in the report of the Boston water board for 1852, I am induced to believe that, by prudent management, the cost of introducing water into the city of Washington from the Great Falls of the Potomac will not much exceed the estimate of Captain Meigs.

Mr. PHELPS. I am opposed to the amendment.

Mr. SKELTON. I rise to a question of order. Is it in order for one gentleman to speak upon the same side of the question repeatedly, when others are refused the privilege of speaking at all upon the question?

Mr. PHELPS. The gentleman is mistaken. I was about to remark that I was opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. SKELTON. The gentleman has already spoken on the proposition under consideration.

Mr. PHELPS. No, sir; not upon the proposition under consideration, for it has but just been offered by the gentleman from Maryland. It is true that I expressed my opinion with reference to the Senate amendment; but I have said nothing about the amendment now pending.

But, sir, I have not taken the floor for the purpose of entering into the discussion of this matter.

Mr. SKELTON. Then why not let others be heard?

Mr. PHELPS. I have risen for the purpose of making a suggestion to the committee, for the purpose of expediting the transaction of business. I presume that the amendment of the Senate is in the form which the friends of the measure desire, and I presume, also, that those who are opposed to the measure would as soon meet the question upon the Senate's amendment as in any other form. I desire, therefore, that the committee shall come to a vote upon the adoption of the Senate's amendment; and I would add that it is immaterial how that vote results, for when we go into the House the yeas and nays can be taken on the amendment.

A MEMBER. We cannot discuss it in the House.

Mr. PHELPS. I know that no discussion will take place there; but there is a great desire, I suppose, on the part of the members of the committee to dispose of this bill; and I presume that the mind of every member of the committee is made up with respect to this proposition.

Mr. SAGE. I hope the gentleman from Maryland will now withdraw his amendment.

Mr. VANSANT. I withdraw it.

Mr. WALSH. The noble, generous, and energetic character of the people of Washington must be known to every member of this House.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman offer an amendment?

Mr. WALSH. No, sir; I was only going to ask the Chair whether an amendment would be in order to furnish the people of Washington with coffee, tea, milk, sugar, and whisky for their water. [Laughter.]

Mr. SAGE. I move to reduce the appropriation $490,000.

I listened with a great deal of attention to the argument of the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. VANSANT,] as to the cost of this work. I am compelled to say that I am inclined to go against this whole scheme, because I believe, after the argument of the gentleman from Maryland, and the estimate made by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. STANTON,] that the cost of this work has been greatly underrated. I would much prefer giving the citizens of Washington $100,000 directly, than going on and making appropriations from time to time, which will, in the end, amount to six or eight millions.

I desire to say, further, that I coincide with the views expressed by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. MILLSON,] when he said that he could see no good reason why Congress should be called upon to make this large appropriation. My constituents have to pay for the water they use, and I see no reason why the people of Washington should not do the same thing. Such a project as the one now under consideration, in taxing the people of the whole country to bring in water for the use of the people of Washington, and enriching them by enhancing the value of their property, is all wrong. I hope, before this question is taken, that a full discussion may be had upon this subject, as it is one which is quite new to many of us. We ought to investigate the matter fully, and discuss it in all its bearings, as the work projected is a great and expensive undertaking, which should require the most full and mature consideration.

Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia. In reply to the remarks of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. SAGE,] I beg leave simply to say, I do not think that there is any corporation in any city of the United States to whom more injustice is done in the precise line of argument used by the gentleman from New York than that of the city of Washington. The Government of the United States have more property here than individuals, and it is wholly free from taxation. Not only is this property free from taxation, but a greater portion of the persons brought here by the Government are also free from taxation. The gentleman from New York may come here, bring his servants, carriage, and horses, and yet pay no taxes for them.

A VOICE. How is it at the hotels?

Mr. BAYLY. As far as the hotels and boarding houses are concerned, the charges are pretty heavy; but we have nothing to do with them. As far as corporation taxes are concerned, I have never paid a single cent—

Mr. WALSH. I never paid a cent at home.

Mr. BAYLY. The gentleman has been more fortunate in that respect than I have been. If I had not paid my taxes, there is a process by which I might have been obliged to pay them.

Mr. WALSH. I am fortunate in not having any property upon which to pay taxes. [Laughter.]

Mr. BAYLY. I will not enter into an encounter of wit with my friend from New York, because any man who does that would be like a man taking up a pin-cushion full of pins and squeezing it with his hand. I am too prudent a man for that. I wish to say that I think the precise line of argument which the gentleman from New York [Mr. SAGE] pursued in respect to the corporation of this city is most unjust and unfair. We all know the necessity that exists for supplying the city with water in order to protect our public buildings. We all recollect how near the Capitol came being burned down but two or three years ago for the want of a sufficient supply of water. Is there any reason upon the face of the earth, when we bring a large population here exempt from taxation, and when we have also a large amount of property exempt from taxation, that we should not bear our portion of the burden? I think not.

Mr. VANSANT and Mr. WHEELER addressed the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. No further debate is in order. The question is on the amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. SAGE.]

Mr. SAGE. I desire to withdraw the amendment.

Mr. SKELTON. I object to its withdrawal. The question was then taken; and the amendment to the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. SKELTON. It strikes me that this is the time for discussion of this subject. I move, therefore, to reduce the appropriation $100. This is the appropriate time, I repeat, for the discussion of this subject; and I trust the committee will not manifest too much impatience when they reflect on the importance of the question under consideration. I recollect, Mr. Chairman, when the first appropriation of $100,000 was made in this Hall. It was made in a way that was not legitimate, but in violation of the rules of the House. It was made by indirect legislation, by merely inserting an appropriation into a bill, while the rules of the House require appropriations to be made for the purpose of carrying out objects already provided for by law. This appropriation of $100,000 was, I say, made in violation of the rules of the House. That sum has been expended. There are various propositions now before the committee, and we should judge which of these propositions should be adopted in preference to the others. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. HAMILTON] tells us—

Mr. STANTON. Will the gentleman from New Jersey allow me to make a remark?

Mr. SKELTON. I cannot yield the floor, as I have but five minutes to express my views, and I do not expect to get the floor again.

The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. HAMILTON] tells us that this work is to be performed; that the fiat has gone forth. What fiat, Mr. Chairman? The President of the United States has determined on the plan. But are we bound by it because he has so determined?

Mr. HAMILTON. I did not mean to convey that idea.

Mr. SKELTON. But enough of that. I trust we are not bound to carry out this proposition. I, for one, am opposed to these appropriations, and to the construction of this work in toto. It has been stated here that the supply of water is to be sufficient to accommodate a population of two hundred thousand inhabitants. Now, I would like to ask these men who advocate making appropriations for supplying provisions for the people of Washington, how long these are to be continued? That is the point to be determined now. Are we to provide for this population for the term of a hundred or a thousand years to come? How long will it be before they arrive at the age of adults, and be capable of taking care of themselves, and of providing for their own wants? I merely suggest this question. Now to another point, which I desire more particularly to allude to.

The only argument that I have heard on this floor in favor of Congress supplying the wants of the population of the District of Columbia has been, that we have a vast amount of property here which is not taxed, and that we pay no taxes here. In reference to the question whether we do or do not pay taxes, I do not think it is a point involved. You can go to any city in the United States, where you are not a permanent resident, and you are not required to pay taxes. No man passing through any county has a right to be taxed, and hence this city concedes no privilege not conceded in all the cities of the Union.

Another argument is, that the Government has millions worth of property here which pays no taxes to support corporation expenses. Let gentlemen who take this ground answer me this question: What has created the value which property possesses in the city of Washington? What has enhanced the value of the farm lands surrounding this city from a few dollars per acre, which they bore when the public buildings were first located here, and raised them up to a value almost equal to those which surround the great commercial cities of Philadelphia and New York? It was the location of the public buildings here, and the expenditure of the public fund here, which has created the immense amount of wealth which exists in the city of Washington. What sustains the value of that property now? Talk to us about paying no taxes upon this property here. Does the Government pay taxes upon its property anywhere? Does it pay taxes upon its property in the cities of New York, Philadelphia, or Boston, or anywhere else in the United States? Certainly it does not, and upon the same principle upon which we are urged to construct these works in this city, those cities have the right to come forward and ask the Government to build water-works for them, because the Government property in those cities is not taxed.

But, suppose we should remove these public buildings from Washington, what would this property be worth to the holders of it? I speak of the holders of the property, because they are the only individuals who reap a benefit from this work, and get the good of it; for the landlords take good care that the tenants shall not profit by it, and the property-holders reap the exclusive benefit of it. Sir, I would vote to-morrow to remove the Capitol from this location; and I ask gentlemen of what value would this property be if the Capitol were removed from Washington?

Mr. FLORENCE. I am opposed to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Jersey. But I rose merely to propound a question to the gentleman over the way, the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. STANTON.] It is, whether the contracts for the excavation, which he says were contracted for, were published according to the law which requires, that before contracts shall be entered into, they shall be advertised for? I wish to know whether, in relation to this aqueduct, the proposal was made public?

Mr. STANTON. I would say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, that I do not know that any contract at all has been entered into for the excavation. My remark was, that I had been informed by a gentleman who came into our committee room, that he was prepared to swear to the fact that he had been upon the ground, had seen and talked with the contractor, and that the contractor was engaged in excavating some portion of the work at the rate of $7 50 per cubic yard. I presume it was through rock; but even if it had been cast-iron, it should not have cost that much.

Mr. FLORENCE. I simply desired to propound that question to the gentleman from Kentucky, and I will yield the balance of my five minutes to the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. VANSANT.]

Mr. VANSANT. I wish to say a few words in reference to this matter of the supply of water for the city of Washington.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. I ask the gentleman to yield to me a moment.

Mr. VANSANT. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. I wish to say a word in reference to the argument which has been advanced in regard to the payment of taxes in the city of Washington. I have always been liberal—at least I have been charged with being so—in the matter of appropriations for the District of Columbia. I think I have been as liberal as any gentleman upon this floor. We have paid largely of the corporate expenses of the city of Washington. We have paved their streets, improved their property, laid pipes for gas, and have helped them build their City Hall. We are continuing to assist them, and I hope we shall continue to do so in a reasonable manner, as we are the owners of a large property which pays no taxes. I hope Congress will continue that policy, in regard to furnishing the city with water, but that we shall do it upon a reasonable plan.

Mr. SKELTON. If there be no objection, I will withdraw my amendment.

Mr. WHEELER. I object.

The question was then taken on the amendment to the Senate amendment; and it was not agreed to.

Mr. BARRY. I do not propose to occupy the attention of the committee further than to call their attention to the estimates which have been made.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair must remind the gentleman that there is no amendment pending upon which he can speak.

Mr. BARRY. I move to increase the appropriation $100.

Mr. Chairman, if the informant of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. STANTON] is not mistaken, there is a very singular discrepancy in these estimates. The work was to be contracted for, as I understood it, at $25,000 for excavating six thousand five hundred cubic yards of earth. Now, if this contractor is paying $7 50 per cubic yard for doing the same work, it seems to me there must be something wrong somewhere.

Mr. STANTON. I understand it is not done by contract.

Mr. BARRY. But if it could be done for that by contract, it is certainly paying an unreasonable price for the work.

Mr. STANTON. A contract was made for the brick work upon the wings of the Capitol for $2 49, but the contractor was released, and the engineer went and employed hands by the day to do the work; and this same work is now costing $5 08, which was originally contracted to be done at $2 49, and it may be the same way in this case.

Mr. BARRY. If it be not an improper inquiry, will the gentleman tell me who his informant was?

Mr. STANTON. I will tell the gentleman privately. I do not feel authorized to speak of him publicly before the House.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Ohio. If the gentleman from Mississippi will permit me, I wish to ask the gentleman from Kentucky if I understood him rightly in saying that they were now paying $7 50 per cubic yard to make these excavations? because it seems to me that is certainly a very unreasonable rate.

Mr. STANTON. I have been so informed.

Mr. TAYLOR. Rock or earth?

Mr. HENN. I rise to a question of order. I submit that the debate is not in order under the 34th rule of the House.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. BARRY. I believe I have the floor. I desire, however, only to correct one statement.

Mr. HENN. I insist upon my point of order. The 34th rule prescribes that when debate shall be closed any member shall be allowed five minutes to explain any amendment which he may offer; after which, any member who shall first obtain the floor shall be allowed five minutes to speak in opposition to it. Now, I submit that gentlemen are not confining themselves to the amendments which are offered, and I insist that the Chair shall enforce the rule.

Mr. SAGE. I move that the committee do now rise.

The question was put; and the motion agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the Chairman [Mr. CHANDLER] reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had the Union generally under consideration, and particularly the bill of the House (No. 132) to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending 30th June, 1854, with the amendments of the Senate thereto, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. HOUSTON. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That when this House adjourns on Wednesday, the 31st instant, it will adjourn to meet on Thursday, the 1st day of June, at 8 o'clock, a. m.; and that when the House adjourns on that day, it shall adjourn to meet on Monday, June 5th; and that the doorkeeper be instructed to renovate and refit the Hall of the House for the summer session.

There was no objection.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. I move the following amendment:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House be directed to remove the chairs at present in the House, and to substitute new ones, suitable for summer.

I now call for the previous question on the resolution and amendment.

The call for the previous question was seconded, and the main question was ordered to be put.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

The resolution, as amended, was then adopted.

Mr. HOUSTON. I move to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted, and that that motion be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DEPUTY POSTMASTERS.

Mr. McDUGALL. I move that the bill to increase the compensation of deputy postmasters be taken up, in order that it may be referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

There was no objection, and the bill was accordingly taken up and referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. HILLYER. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken; and the motion was agreed to.

Thereupon the House adjourned (at three o'clock and twenty minutes) till to-morrow at twelve, m.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, May 23, 1854.

Prayer by Rev. WILLIAM H. MILBURN.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved. PETITIONS.

Mr. TOUCEY presented a petition of sundry citizens of New Haven, Connecticut, praying for a reduction of the rates of ocean postage; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. RUSK presented the petition of Emma C. B. Thompson, widow of Charles B. Thompson, late of the United States Navy, praying to be allowed arrears of pension due her late husband; which, together with certain papers in relation to the subject on the files of the Senate, were referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. SLIDELL presented the petition of Puig, Mir & Co., praying the remittance of certain duties on two cargoes of coffee, imported by them into New Orleans; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CHASE presented additional documents in support of the claim of Isaac Swain, to indemnity for the impressment of a certain vessel into the service of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

CONNECTICUT LEGISLATURE ON NEBRASKA AND KANSAS.

Mr. TOUCEY. With the consent of the Senate I desire to say a word of explanation in regard to what was said in the Senate yesterday. The resolutions of the Legislature of Connecticut, which were discussed yesterday, were presented, I am sorry to say, in my absence. I observe, by the report of the debate which sprung up on the occasion, that my colleague fell into an error, as he naturally would, in speaking of the Democratic sentiment in the Legislature of the State of Connecticut, as he is not particularly intimate with that portion of his constituents. He is mistaken in supposing that those resolutions received the support of the Democratic members of the Legislature. Not one-fourth of the Democratic members of both branches voted for them, and of those who actually voted, more than two thirds voted against them. No Whig voted against them.

I am very happy, sir, to make this explanation, because I am very well acquainted with that portion of the people of my State who are represented by the Democratic members. They are firm friends of the Union and of the Constitution, and the sentiments which are to be found embraced in these resolutions cannot, in my view, receive their support. I think that they will now, and at all times, strenuously oppose them.

DRY-DOCK AT PENSACOLA.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, a report of the Secretary of the Navy, in response to a resolution adopted by the Senate in reference to the dry-dock, basin, and railway at the Pensacola navy-yard, was received some days since, and, on my motion, it was laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed. That report has been received from the printer, and is now lying upon our tables. I move that it be taken up with a view to reference.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, the report of the Secretary of the Navy, in response to a resolution of the Senate calling for information relating to the dock, basin, and railways at the navy-yard, Pensacola, was received some five or six days since, and was, on my motion, laid on the table, and ordered to be printed. I observe, sir, the order has been executed, and copies of the report furnished us. I therefore move it be taken from the table, with a view to reference.

The resolution calling for the information was adopted at my instance, and before moving a reference of the report to the appropriate committee, I ask the indulgence of the Senate while I submit a few remarks; for the report, in my humble estimation, calls for the prompt consideration and action of Congress, and the notice of the country. By an act of Congress, passed August 3, 1848, the Secretary of the Navy was directed to enter into a contract with Gilbert & Secor, for the construction of a balance floating dock, basin, and railways at the navy-yard, Pensacola.

Pursuant to this direction of Congress, the Secretary did, on the 25th of October ensuing, enter into a contract with the said Gilbert & Secor to build the dock, basin, and railways for the sum of $921,937.

I will not go into detail further than to say, that the dock, basin, and railways were to be of sufficient capacity to dock and haul on and off the ways a war-steamer of the first class, or a line-of-battle-ship of fifty-three hundred tons.

According to the report of the Bureau of Yards and Docks, the dock, basin, and railways have been completed some time since, a year or more—but not yet accepted by the Government; the tests thus far not having proved satisfactory. The contractors have, however, been paid the whole amount stipulated by the contract, with the exception of two thousand five hundred dollars reserved for contingencies.

An examination of the contract, Mr. President, and the manner of its execution will present a most extraordinary state of things. I go by the report received from the Department, and will not mention facts derived from other sources, although I have statements from gentlemen of high character and standing in relation to the execution of this contract, which are entitled to serious consideration. By the record I shall be governed, and not go beyond it.

The Bureau of Yards and Docks says, that none of the stipulations of the contract have been dispensed with, except, that of a floating gate, and the one which provides for testing the dock as a camel for transporting ships over the bar at Pensacola. But let the Bureau speak for itself:

"Fourth. 'Whether any of the stipulations of the contract have been dispensed with; and if so, what were the stipulations so dispensed with, and the reasons therefor?'"

"In reply to this question, I respectfully state that the only stipulations in said contract dispensed with are those for the floating gate, proposed in the specifications to be fitted for the purpose of forming a partition in the dock, and that for cancelling the stipulation which provides for testing the dock as a camel for transporting ships over the bar at Pensacola.

"The reasons for dispensing with the former are, that this gate was considered entirely useless, and even an incumbrance, and therefore, for a reasonable consideration, it was agreed to be dispensed with by the Department. The reasons for cancelling the camel properties of the dock were, that, upon the representations of this Bureau to the Department, that in its opinion the experiment of sinking the dock outside of and carrying the ships over the bar would be hazardous to the vessel as well as to the dock; that, as the Government was bound to furnish the steam power to tow and manage said dock when so used, and as the side of the dock would present as much surface to oppose the wind as all the square sails of a large ship, it would require immense power—which the Government had not at command, and could not procure except at an enormous expense—to move and control the dock when passing over the bar to sea; that, provided the dock should be sunk under the bottom of a ship at anchor outside the bar, after pumping the whole or a portion of the water from the chambers, should there be an undulating motion of the water, as there generally is at that place, the ship afloat, with battery on decks, as she could not there be securely shored, would be likely to fall over upon one side or the other, and seriously injure, if not render utterly useless, both the ship and the dock. In consideration, therefore, of the great power required to move such a mass, the impossibility of procuring it at times when it might be wanted, and its great cost, together with the danger attending the several necessary operations, the Secretary of the Navy, after consulting persons of experience and good judgment, came to the conclusion that the dock could never be used as a camel in practice; that it would not be safe or proper to venture the experiment, and therefore directed propositions to be made to the contractors to dispense with that part of the contract for a fair consideration; and, after consultation, the Secretary (Mr. Kennedy) proposed to cancel that provision of the contract, deducting from the amount of payments under the contract $12,000, which proposition was accepted, and that sum has accordingly been deducted."

It will appear, by reference to the contract, page 27, that the contractors were to receive, "in case a floating gate was (is) made to said basin," the sum of $13,000 for it—mark the language, Mr. President—"in case a floating gate is made," the contractors are to receive $13,000. From this language I should infer that at the time the contract was entered into the Department had doubts as to the propriety of having a floating gate to be made or not, as it thereafter might determine. If the gate was made, the Government to pay $13,000 for it; if it was dispensed with, to pay nothing. This, I hold, is the true construction of the contract. The Department did dispense with it, considering it entirely useless, and even an encumbrance; and, in my humble judgment, the Government should not have paid one dollar.

The Bureau informs us, for a reasonable consideration it was agreed to be dispensed with by the Department, but does not enlighten us as to what was the reasonable consideration. It was not a deduction of the $13,000 from the gross amount of the contract, which I consider would have been the proper reasonable consideration; neither was it an abatement of any portion of the $13,000; for we are told in the report, that the contractors have been paid the full amount of the contract, $921,937 less $12,000 deducted for cancelling the provisions for the camel properties, and $2,500 retained to cover contingencies. This, sir, I repeat, is the only deduction from the gross amount of the contract, as shown by the report on our tables. Thus the Bureau, by its own report, overpaid Gilbert & Secor $13,000, or, in other words, allowed them that sum for not making the floating gate, which the contract left optional with the Department.

The contract stipulated that the dock should possess the properties of a camel, to transport vessels of the class mentioned; that is, a line-of-battle-ship, or a war-steamer of the first class, in and out of the harbor, and over the bar of Pensacola bay; and if it failed to perform this stipulation, $75,000 were to be abated from the amount of the contract. This stipulation was dispensed with, as it appears, at the instance of the Department, and the contractors only required to abate $12,000, which proposition they, I presume, accepted with avidity; for they well knew they had entered into a stipulation which they could not perform, and never would have been guilty of the consummate folly and temerity of attempting, but would unhesitatingly have forfeited the $75,000, as stipulated.

The reasons for releasing them from this requirement of the contract have already been read, and to them I respectfully call the attention of the Senate. To have attempted its execution, the Bureau informs us, would have been "hazardous to the vessel, as well as the dock." So, no doubt, thought the contractors; and they would of their own accord have forfeited the $75,000, rather than have attempted that which they believed they could not have accomplished, and have put their property, the dock, in imminent peril. It does appear a little strange to me that all these difficulties should not have suggested themselves to the Department at the time of making the contract; a change appears to have come over the spirit of the dreams of the Department, Bureau, contractors and all, since this humbug of a balance floating dry dock was urged on Congress in 1848, and several years previous. Then one of its greatest beauties, one of its greatest recommendations, was the camel properties. One in those days, reading the glowing description of the advantages and beauties of these docks, in fancy saw these beasts of burden of Neptune walking like a thing of life o'er the waters, bearing with majestic grandeur on their backs a ship of the first class over shoals and bars, to secure havens within the numerous bays on our coast. Since that day, new light appears to have dawned upon the subject; now all look upon the experiment as an abortion, a failure, the veriest humbug of this age and generation, including, I have no doubt, the contractors themselves, who may well laugh in their sleeves at the gullibility of the Government, and their own good luck; for they have received all their money, less the enormous sum of $2,500, retained to cover contingencies.

But a commission was appointed to examine the dock, basin, and railways, have the proper tests applied, and ascertain if the contract had been fulfilled by the contractors. This commission was comprised of gentlemen eminently qualified for the duty assigned them. There is Captain Tattnall, a gentleman well known to the country as an intelligent, energetic, and honorable officer of our Navy. There is Major William H. Chase, well known as one of the most accomplished officers of the Corps of Engineers, and a gentleman distinguished for his general intelligence and high and honorable bearing. The next is Mr. Hart, a naval constructor, who ranks among the first of his profession in the service; and lastly, Mr. Herron, the then civil engineer of the Pensacola navy-yard, who is well known in his profession as a most skillful and scientific engineer, and who has executed at that place one of the most difficult works ever constructed in this or any other country, which excites the admiration of scientific men, and entitles him to be ranked, if not the first, among the first civil engineers of the day. Let us hear what this commission says:

COMMANDANT'S OFFICE,
NAVY-YARD, PENSACOLA, May 28, 1853. }

SIR: The board of officers appointed by your letter of the 12th February, 1853, "to examine and report the result of the test to be made of the balance floating dock, basin, and railway, constructed at the navy-yard at Pensacola, by the contractors, Messrs. Gilbert & Secor," and acting under your instructions of the same date, and subsequently under the instructions contained in your letters of the 12th, 13th, 15th, and 22d April, and of the 3d May, has the honor to report, that it has completed the duties assigned to it, so far as its recently limited instructions have permitted.

In relation to the manner in which the board has performed its duties, reference is made to its journal and the accompanying documents, all of which have been verified by the members of the board, as being correct copies from the originals.

The board was directed by exact and carefully worded instructions, with ample latitude allowed to supply any notable deficiencies therein, to make a close, critical, and comprehensive examination of the apparatus named in the contract with Gilbert & Secor, as a balance floating dock, basin, and railway; looking to its parts in detail; to its separate uses as a dock, a basin, and a railway, and to its completeness as a whole, in order to test the principle, convenience, power, and faithful construction claimed for it by the contractors; and to form an opinion as to the performance or non-performance of the stipulations of the contract. Under this view of its instructions, the board duly notified the authorized agents of Messrs. Gilbert & Secor that the frigate Columbia was at their disposal, in order to be placed in the dock, carried into the basin, and hauled on and off the railway, in the manner prescribed by the board. A correspondence ensued between the agents and the board, arising from objections made by the contractors to certain parts of the prescribed operations.

The board adhering without material change to its first determination, it was finally arranged with the agents of the contractors that the frigate Columbia should be placed on the cradle in the dock, and the whole carried into the basin, in readiness for the frigate to be hauled on and off the railway, the board reserving the right to haul the ship on to the railway, with her entire armament on board or not, and assuming the entire responsibility of her safety.

The board designed to make the several tests of the dock, railway, and basin with as much weight as possible, seeing that all that could be commanded would fall short more than one half of that required by the contract to be used.

The naval constructor at this yard, one of the members of the board, was deputed to place shores and braces in the frigate, and also to remove the guns and stores to such a position as would bring the center of gravity as nearly as possible within certain lines.

On the same day that this agreement with the agents was made, these persons refused to execute it, and one of their number proceeded directly to the north, in order to confer with his principals. It was deemed important that the senior officer of the board should proceed at once to Washington, in order to explain the proceedings of the board, and to meet and refute the objections made by the contractors to the fair and proper test prescribed by the board.

The proceedings of the board were not disapproved of. But representations having been made to the Navy Department that there was not sufficient depth of water off and near the permanent wharf of the navy-yard to sink the dock to the depth necessary to receive the frigate Columbia, with her arms and stores on board, it was deemed important to obtain the opinion of the Attorney General in the premises.

This opinion was decidedly given as to the obligation of the Government to furnish the requisite depth of water. Under this consideration, and of that of the time and expense deemed necessary to excavate the required depth, the test of placing the ship on the cradle was dispensed with, and the operation confined to the simple one of taking the ship into the dock, with the removal of all or any part of the armament and stores, in order to reduce the draught of the ship, and consequently that of the dock when sunk to the lack of water complained of. But it was required after the ship had been raised, to place in the dock a weight equal to that removed from the ship.

The board was instructed accordingly. As these instructions were founded in error of fact, the board deemed it its duty to report the same to the Navy Department, affirming that there was water enough to afford an adequate test as prescribed by the board; that no excavations were necessary to procure additional depth of water, and that no obstacle existed, known to the board, that would prevent every proper test being made with any ship that could pass the bar at the mouth of the harbor.

In answer to the letter of the board, it was stated that the Navy Department adhered to its instructions, but that it was left optional with the board to remove the armament and stores or not; at the same time duties were expressed as to the sufficiency of water claimed in the premises. It is due to the board in this place to state that the tests required to be made were, in its judgment, perfectly consistent with the first instructions received from the Navy Department and with the stipulations of the contract.

That before such tests were arranged, the board made itself acquainted with all the local circumstances existing in the premises, a knowledge of which was indispensable to the exact performance of its duties. That it required nothing at the hands of the contractors but what was considered a fair illustration of the principle, convenience, and power of the apparatus, generally styled the floating balance dock, basin, and railway, offered at a great cost as a whole by its designers and the contractors confidently to the Government, as being superior to, and in substitution of, the permanent dry-dock.

The contractors were notified of the final instructions from the Navy Department, and of the readiness of the board to witness the operation of placing the Columbia in the dock.

The journal will show the time taken to prepare and sink the dock for the reception of the ship, with all the attendant circumstances, up to the time that the dock was raised and pumped out. The journal will also show the draught of the dock at various points, and the exact amount of depression from right lines, extending along the keelson, and the ends and sides, whilst the ship was in the dock; also, the several draughts of water when the ship was removed.

After the dock, with the frigate Columbia on board, was in readiness to be carried into the basin, the agents of Messrs. Gilbert & Secor made a verbal request to the board, that her removal from the moorings to the basin might be dispensed with. In answer thereto the board stated, that its instructions left it no discretion on this point, and that it otherwise desired that the dock should be hauled into the basin.

In reply to this requisition a letter was received from the agents, declining "to take the floating dock into the basin, with the present loaded vessel in the dock, for two reasons, viz: first, that there is not ten feet of water in the basin; and secondly, that the contractors have never proposed to put the dock in the basin, bearing a ship with all her armament on board."

The board, in reply, stated, that if the agents persisted in their refusal to take the dock into the basin, it would be necessary that the ship should be released from the dock, as soon as the injuries which she had sustained by the docking operation have been repaired by the agents.

At the time of refusal of the agents it was high water for the day, at which time there were nine feet six and a half inches over the gate sill of the basin.

The greater draught of the dock was near the center of her bottom.

It was nine feet six inches, and accurately obtained under the immediate supervision of the board.

The board arrives at the conclusion, that the contractors have signally failed to exhibit fully and to its satisfaction the convenience, power, and faithful construction of their floating dock, basin, and railway, and for the following reasons:

1. That it weighs about 2,300 tons more than estimated, which consequently increases the draught of water two feet, thereby interfering with its passage into the basin.
2. That by settling under the Columbia, when docked, nineteen and a half inches, (that ship weighing but 2,185 tons,) it proved that it was of inadequate strength, and altogether incapable of raising a ship of 5,300 tons weight, as contracted for; this great settling also, by increasing the draught of water, augmenting the difficulty of a passage into the basin.
3. That when the dock was sunk to twenty-three feet above the working platform, (the Columbia being just on the point of entering it,) it rose on one side three feet in ten minutes, by a sudden and great loss of water in the chambers, although the pumps supplying the water were still in operation, thereby showing a very great leakage of the tanks or pumps, or probably both, and consequently an improper construction.
4. That sixty tons additional ballast were necessary to sink the dock, (the engines being worked to their highest gauges,) it being evident at the same time that the engines were unequal to sinking it to a greater depth than that required to take in the Columbia, a ship of less than one-half of the weight contracted for.
5. That it was found very difficult, with the highest gauge of steam, to lift the Columbia, owing to the leakage already referred to, showing that the dock was incapable of raising a ship of five thousand three hundred tons weight, as contracted for.
6. That the contractors declined the test of taking the dock into the basin, on the ground that there was a deficiency of water in the basin, and that the contract did not require it. The water at high tide was nine feet six and a half inches above the granite courses at the bottom of the basin, which would have been sufficient to have admitted the dock, had its draught of water not been increased three feet by the causes referred to.

The board cannot, therefore, recommend that the whole apparatus, or any part of it, whether it be the balance floating dock, basin, or railway, be received by the United States. The board having been also ordered to consider the "advantage or disadvantage of that plan of docking ships of the Navy," as compared with others, is of the opinion that the balance floating-dock is far inferior to the ordinary stone dock, whether as regards economy, safety, or facility of operation.

The "estimate of the probable expense of working, and cost per annum of repairing and taking care of the dock," and a report on the floating gate, the board will make the subject of a separate and future communication.

We are, sir, respectfully, your obedient servants,
JOSIAH TATNALL,
Captain United States Navy.
WM. H. CHASE,
Major United States Engineers.
S. T. HARTT,
Naval Constructor.
JAS. HERRON,
Civil Engineer, Navy-Yard.

Commodore JOSEPH SMITH,
Chief of the Bureau of Yards and Docks.

NOTE.—The undersigned entertained the opinion that the balance floating dock, basin, and railway, combined advantages for repairing vessels not possessed by the ordinary stone dock, for the reason that two or more ships could be repaired at the same time by the former apparatus, whilst the stone dock afforded facility for the repair of only one ship at a time; and it was believed that equal economy, safety, and facility of operation would be obtained by either mode. The undersigned has changed his opinion; this change is not due solely to the signal failure, on the part of the contractors, to perform what they promised in their contract, which failure was principally due to error in calculation for displacement of the dock; to the want of strength in the dock; and to the lack of sufficient depth of water in the basin—but it was produced by ample evidence afforded to the board, in the course of the operation of taking up the frigate Columbia, that, on the score of economy, safety, and facility, the ordinary stone dock possesses superior advantages.

Taking this in connection with the time and expense of placing the dock in the basin, and hauling the ship on and off the railway, as well as considering the destructibility of the material of which the dock and a portion of the railway are composed, leaves no doubt in the mind of the undersigned as to the correctness of the opinion unanimously expressed by the board in the premises.

WILLIAM H. CHASE, Major Engineers.
COLUMBUS, GA., June 11, 1853.

COMMANDANT'S OFFICE,
NAVY YARD, PENSACOLA, July 18, 1853.
SIR: The board for testing the floating dock, basin, and railway, in their report of May 28, 1853, referred to a future report on the subject of the floating gate, and of the probable expense of working and cost per annum of repairing and taking care of the dock, which they now have the honor to submit.

The test of shipping the floating gate was made on the 30th of May.

The time occupied in getting it from its moorings at the side of the basin to the position of shipping was one hour and fifteen minutes. There were eight men employed in the operation, the weather being unfavorable and water rough. The gate proved to be very crank, and required a lever across its gunwales, and considerable time and management to get it into the grooves.

It could not be sunk into its proper place, owing to the sand having washed into the keel groove, and a little above it on each side.

In regard to the cost of working the dock, the board cannot offer a correct estimate. All the circumstances attending the docking of the Columbia, being different from and very unfavorable, when compared with the contemplated mode of working the dock, when the deep basin shall be finished.

In view of the rapid decay of wood in this climate, and that the dock is now about three years old, the board are of opinion that it will require twenty per cent. of the original cost to keep it in order, equivalent to a renewal in five years from the present time.

It now requires recaulking and painting.
 We are, sir, respectfully, your obedient servants,
JOSIAH TATNALL, Captain.
WM. H. CHASE, Major Engineers.
S. T. HARTT, Naval Constructor.
JAMES HERRON, Civil Engineer.

Commodore JOSEPH SMITH,
Chief of the Bureau of Yards and Docks,
Washington, D. C.

Their report speaks for itself, and I only ask attention to one or two points in it. According to the terms of the contract, a ship of five thousand three hundred tons was to be taken into the dock and basin and raised on the railways. The test made with the frigate Columbia, weighing two thousand one hundred and eighty-five tons, clearly demonstrated that the capacity of the dock was inadequate to do that which the contract stipulated. The Columbia was only taken into the dock; the contractors declined to take the dock into the basin with the ship on board for two reasons: One that there was not sufficient water in the basin; and here I would ask whose fault was it there was not sufficient water in the basin? Surely the contractors had engaged to construct a basin of sufficient capacity in every respect to take the dock in with a ship on board weighing five thousand three hundred tons; yet it had not water to receive the dock with the Columbia docked, weighing two thousand one hundred and eighty-five tons, less than one half of the stipulated tonnage. The other reason assigned is, that the contractors never agreed to take the dock into the basin bearing a ship with all her armament on board. Was there ever such subterfuge attempted to be practiced upon practical, sensible men? Why, I ask, stipulate to take up a ship of five thousand three hundred tons and float the dock into the basin, and then refuse to float the dock into the basin with a ship of two thousand one hundred and eighty-five tons because, forsooth, her armament was on board; the weight was the thing to be considered. The contractors stipulated that the dock should be of sufficient capacity to take over the bar at Pensacola a ship of the largest class. When a ship of that description made its appearance off the bar of Pensacola and desired to enter the harbor with the aid of this dock as a camel, what was to be done with her armament? Was it to be thrown overboard; and, after she was repaired and recrossed the bar, to be fished up and placed in statu quo? The commission further say, it will take twenty per cent. of the original cost of the dock per annum to keep it in repair, equivalent to a renewal every five years. The cost of the dock was $555,712, so that sum will have to be expended every five years, should it be accepted by the Government, or $111,156 per annum to keep it in repair. It may from these data be safely calculated that it will take some ten or twelve per cent. of the cost of the railway, basin, and other appendages and fixtures of this dock, to keep them in repair. So it may be estimated they all will require an annual outlay of some $150,000.

The report of the commission shows that the contractors have failed, most signally failed, to fulfill their contract; and it ought long since to have been so declared by the Department, and steps taken accordingly.

This failure, sir, affects the only naval station on the Gulf of Mexico, and which happens to be located in Florida; and I here, Mr. President, as one of the Senators from that small, poor, wronged, and neglected State, enter my protest against this $1,000,000 being placed to her debit, in any estimate that may hereafter be made, of her cost to the United States. The $40,000,000 expended in the Seminole war, commencing in 1835, it has been insisted should be charged to her, when it was notorious that the greater portion of the amount was squandered on hangers-on of the Army and contractors from other States, while the people of Florida were not only impoverished, but many of them ruined. The sum of $921,937, lavished on this wild and fanciful experiment, should be charged to New York account. Gilbert and Secor, the contractors, are from there—the engineers and mechanics were from there—their supplies were brought from there—and every dollar of the money, according to the stipulations of the contract, was paid there. So, I repeat, let Florida not be charged with this folly; she had no lot, part, or portion in it; for my late colleague, [Mr. Yulee,] then a member of the Naval Committee, resisted this appropriation at every stage, though it was apparently for the benefit of a dock-yard within his own State—he thinking the testing of this wild experiment at the Pensacola yard would not advance its onward march, to be classed with the first dock-yards of the country. The result has proved the correctness of his course, and the wisdom of the conclusion to which he came; for this wasteful experiment there, has, in my estimation, retarded the advancement of that yard, I fear, for years to come. Had not Congress been imposed upon by these humbug wooden docks, it would, as it should have done ere this, have made an appropriation for a stone dock—such as is erected at Norfolk, New York, and Boston. We cannot now look forward to the day when a work of that kind will be commenced at the Pensacola yard; for this mass of perishable materials will long remain, I fear, as an encumbrance or nuisance there. If this dock should ultimately be received by the Navy Department, I would most freely vote for a liberal appropriation to float it without the bar, and send it adrift, and relieve the yard from the disfigurement of the basin and railways, and restore it to its pristine beauty and elegance.

But let me return to this report. Look, sir, at the contract. Here was the sum of $921,937 about to be paid on an experiment. Is there any provision in it which will really protect the Government from loss? Is it not a contract to test an experiment at the risk of the Government, instead of the contractors who were to derive large pecuniary benefit? The sum of $737,550 was paid to these contractors on an experiment, and a bond of $100,000 only given to save the Government harmless! In this the Department has failed to exercise that vigilance which a discreet individual would have done, and which should ever characterize the expenditure of the public money.

But the twenty per cent. reserved on each payment has long since gone into the pockets of the contractors. Why was this done? The report shows why, and the papers accompanying the same disclose the fact that the payment was most improperly made. It is true, as we are informed, the Department exercised the precaution of taking from the contractors a refunding bond to guard the interest of the Government in the event of a failure of the structures not standing the test required by the contract. This, forsooth, was properly guarding the interest of the Government: pay the contractors all the money before the contract is completed with, and if they fail, bring suit, I suppose, on the refunding bond. Why, Mr. President, this is laughable. Did you, sir, ever know, in the history of this Government, a defaulting contractor to refund money improperly advanced him by the Government? The idea is ridiculous. You had as well attempt to get melted butter out of a dog's mouth, as money out of the hands of a defaulting contractor after he has once placed it in his fob.

It seems that it was assumed by the Department that there was not water of sufficient depth near the basin to sink the dock; and the question was, whether the United States or the contractors were bound to find the water, or, in other words, to deepen by excavation or dredging. The Secretary of the Navy called for the opinion of the Attorney General, who decided that the Government was bound to furnish the water; and as the Government was not ready to furnish it, and the structures having been completed, the contractors were entitled to the percentage reserved, and by order of the Secretary it was paid them.

From what source did the Department derive its information that there was not sufficient water near the basin? Was it from actual measurement or sounding by the proper officers of the Government, or did it come to the conclusion there was not sufficient water upon the assertion of the contractors? When the test with the frigate Columbia was about being made, a year ago, the contractors again alleged there was not water sufficient to float the dock into the basin, and the instructions from the Bureau to the commission appointed to make the test, were given upon that hypothesis. What does the board say?

"As these instructions were founded in error of fact, the board deemed it its duty to report the same to the Navy Department; affirming that there was water enough to afford an adequate test as prescribed by the board; that no excavations were necessary to procure additional depth of water, and that no obstacle existed known to the board that would prevent every proper test being made with any ship that could pass the bar at the mouth of the harbor."

The Bureau, in reply, expressed doubts as to the sufficiency of water claimed in the premises. The Bureau seemed very tenacious of its opinion as to the depth of water, and well it should, for upon that opinion the Attorney General advised the payment of near $200,000 to the contractors, to which they were not entitled if the true state of the case had been made known. It is remarkable, Mr. President, that the Bureau should, in direct opposition to the report of the commission, composed of such men as it was, still insist there was not sufficient water, when the officers on that commission, being on the spot, say unequivocally, without the expression of a doubt, there was water sufficient for any ship that could pass the bar, which is well known will admit vessels drawing twenty-two or twenty-three feet, with ease.

From a review of the entire subject I am constrained to believe the officers of the Government have been very remiss in not properly guarding and protecting the interest of the country. There is, Mr. President, a screw loose somewhere which should be attended to, and I trust the committee who will have charge of the subject, will give it a full and thorough investigation. I now submit the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the Report of the Secretary of the Navy of the 9th instant, being Executive Document 64 of the present session, communicating information in compliance with the resolution of the Senate, in relation to the dock, basin, and railway at Pensacola, be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, with instructions to examine into the contract with Gilbert & Secor for the construction of said dock, basin, and railway; and also to ascertain how and in what manner said contract has been performed, what security has been given for reimbursing the United States the amount of $913,437, which has been paid to the said Gilbert & Secor by the Navy Department, in case the said dock, basin, and railway should not be accepted by the Government, and what further steps are necessary to protect the interests of the United States.

Resolved, That if said committee, in the investigation, should deem it necessary, they be authorized to send for persons and papers.

The resolutions were adopted.

Mr. BROADHEAD. A report was made by the Secretary of the Navy upon the whole subject of docks on the 5th of March, 1853, which was accompanied by copies of the contracts for the construction of the docks, basins, and railways, at Philadelphia, Kittery, and Pensacola, and the floating dock at San Francisco. As we may be called upon before the close of the session to make large appropriations for the one in California, I move the reference of this report to the same committee.

The motion was agreed to.

THOMAS FRAZER.

Mr. HAMLIN. Yesterday a motion was made to reconsider the vote by which the bill from the House of Representatives, for the relief of Thomas Frazer, was indefinitely postponed. I learn that that bill has been sent to the House, and I now move that the Secretary be directed to request the House to return that bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The bill was subsequently returned to the Senate by Mr. McKean, Chief Clerk.

REPORTS FROM STANDING COMMITTEES.

Mr. GWIN, from the Committee on Finance, reported a bill to authorize the coinage of gold pieces of the value respectively of ten eagles and five eagles, and for other purposes; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

Mr. GWIN. I give notice that as soon as the bill is printed, I shall ask for its consideration. It is important that it should be acted upon.

Mr. STUART, from the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office, to whom was referred the petition of Samuel Colt, praying the extension of his patent for certain improvements in fire-arms, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill authorizing the Commissioner of Patents to grant an extension of a patent to Samuel Colt, a citizen of the United States, for an improvement in fire-arms; which was read, and passed to a second reading. The report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. ALLEN, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred documents in support of the claim of Gideon Prior, a soldier in the revolutionary war; to a pension, and the petition of John H. Hand, praying to be allowed a pension on account of disease contracted in the service of the United States, submitted adverse reports thereon; which were ordered to be printed.

Mr. CLAY, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of William Brown, praying to be allowed a pension, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for his relief; which was read, and passed to a second reading. The report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. BROWN, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the memorial of E. H. Wingfield, late Indian agent in New Mexico, praying to be allowed traveling expenses from Santa Fe to Washington city, for the settlement of his accounts, and for a per diem allowance during his detention, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. CLAY, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the petition of Adèle Sands, widow of Richard M. Sands, of the Army, praying an increase of pension, and the petition of Charlotte S. Westcott, widow of Captain George C. Westcott, of the Army, praying for a pension, submitted a report, and asked to be discharged from their further consideration, on the ground that a general bill had been reported which would embrace the objects prayed for; which was agreed to.

The report was ordered to be printed.

REPUBLIC OF DOMINICA.

Mr. DOUGLAS submitted the following resolution for consideration; and asked for its immediate consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Relations be instructed to inquire into the expediency of recognizing the independence of the Republic of Dominica, and of opening diplomatic intercourse with the same.

Mr. CHASE objected; and the resolution was laid over.

EMPLOYMENT OF CLERK.

Mr. FISH submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the select committee appointed to consider the causes, &c., of mortality on board of emigrant ships, be authorized to employ a clerk.

SLAVE TRADE IN CUBA.

Mr. MASON, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President be requested to communicate to the Senate (if in his opinion it be compatible with the public interest) copies of all correspondence in the State Department relative to the slave trade in the Island of Cuba, and of any late decrees or other acts of the Spanish Government in that island connected with the same.

COMPENSATION OF POSTMASTERS.

Mr. RUSK. I am instructed by the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, to whom was referred a bill from the House of Representatives regulating the pay of deputy postmasters, to report it back with an amendment, and recommend its passage.

Mr. WELLER. I desire to ask the Senate to put that bill on its passage now. It has been carefully examined by the Post Office Committee of the House, as well as of the Senate. It has received the favorable action of the House, and, in my judgment, ought to be acted upon.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. HUNTER. Is the bill under consideration by general consent?

The PRESIDENT. It is.

Mr. WELLER. The original bill was passed by the House of Representatives, and was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads. It has been under consideration, I believe, for more than a month. The only amendment proposed, is one submitted by the Post Office Department, the object of which is to render certain and definite that which was somewhat uncertain by the provisions of the original bill. There is no change whatever in the principle. The only effect of the amendment is to make the bill more certain, and to obviate any difficulty which might arise in the Department.

The amendment of the committee was to strike out the following proviso:

"That, to any postmaster of any distributing or separating post office whose commissions may be reduced below the amount allowed at his office for the year ending the 30th day of June, 1851, the Postmaster General shall be authorized, in his discretion, to allow such additional compensation as he may deem proper, such compensation to date, and be allowed from, the 30th day of March, 1853: Provided further, That the commissions and allowances authorized by this act shall be subject to the provisions of the forty-first section of the act entitled 'An act to reduce into one the several acts establishing and regulating the Post Office Department;' and all acts, or parts of acts, inconsistent with the provisions of this act, be, and the same are hereby, repealed; and this act to take effect, and be in force, from and after the commencement of the next fiscal quarter after its passage."

And insert:

"That to any postmaster of a distributing office at which the commissions, allowances, and emoluments since the 31st day of March, 1853, have been insufficient to defray actual and necessary expenses, and afford the annual compensation derived from commissions at the office before the said 31st of March, the Postmaster General may, in his discretion, allow quarterly from the date aforesaid, out of the postages collected at any such office an amount sufficient to supply such deficiency: Provided further, That to any postmaster of a separating office, whose commissions, allowance, and emoluments may be insufficient to provide for the extra labor necessary to the prompt and efficient performance of the duties of separating and dispatching the mails passing through those offices, the Postmaster General may make such quarterly allowances out of the postages collected at such office, as he may deem sufficient to compensate such extra labor. This act shall take effect, and be in force, from and after the commencement of the next fiscal quarter after its passage."

Mr. BELL. I desire some explanation of the amendment. I desire to know whether the provision is ample enough to supply additional clerks in distributing offices?

Mr. RUSK. Yes, sir; the amendment was made for that express purpose. It was made to cover that under the authority of the Postmaster General. I will state to the honorable Senator from Tennessee, that at the time the law of 1851 was passed, a provision of this description was made; but in a subsequent act passed there were words used which gave the Postmaster General a great deal of trouble in construing the subsequent law to repeal the discretion which existed. It is necessary, therefore, to reinstate this discretion; and it is substantially reinstating the old law of 1851. This has been done by the committee, on consultation with the Department. The original bill, as it came from the House of Representatives, was not sufficiently full. It made no provision for the separating offices, which are very necessary; and besides, it went back to 1851. The difficulties have occurred in these offices since 1853; and the amendment reported to the Senate by the committee, after consultation with the Postmaster General, only operates since March, 1853.

Mr. BELL. I do not understand what the difference is between the offices called separating offices and distributing offices.

Mr. RUSK. A distributing office is where letters are distributed to various offices. They send certain mails from one quarter of the country to another, northern and southern, and they are distributed at particular offices. As to separating offices, New Orleans is an instance. Mails go to

33D CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

WEDNESDAY, MAY 24, 1854.

NEW SERIES...No. 81.

New Orleans, directed to California, to Arkansas, and to Texas, and other places, and there they must be separated. Such are separating offices, and they require a considerable amount of labor.

Mr. BELL. And I understand the provisions of the amendment apply to both descriptions of offices?

Mr. RUSK. Yes, sir, to both descriptions.

Mr. JOHNSON. I wish to state a fact in connection with this bill. I do not understand precisely how it comes up now, but I will ask the Senator from Texas is the bill upon its passage?

Mr. RUSK. The bill passed the House of Representatives providing for the increase of deputy postmasters.

Mr. JOHNSON. Well, if it has already passed there, I am happy to hear it. I wanted to show the absolute necessity which exists for such a provision, and I thought I could do so by the simple statement of a fact; but if it has passed, it is unnecessary to say anything about it.

Mr. RUSK. There is a typographical error which will require to be corrected. The 30th of March, occurs in one place, evidently by mistake. It should be the "31st of March."

The PRESIDENT. That correction will be made.

The amendment of the committee was agreed to, the bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in, and was ordered to be engrossed. The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read a third time, and passed.

NEBRASKA AND KANSAS.

A message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McKean, Chief Clerk.

Mr. PRESIDENT: The House of Representatives has passed a bill entitled "An act to organize the Territories of Nebraska and Kansas," in which I am directed to ask the concurrence of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore subsequently announced the bill to the Senate on its first reading.

The bill having been read a first time,

The PRESIDENT said: The bill will now have its second reading, with a view to reference, if there be no objection.

Mr. SUMNER. I object to the second reading of that bill out of its regular order.

The PRESIDENT. Then it goes over until to-morrow.

BOOKS FOR NEW MEMBERS.

Mr. JONES, of Iowa. I desire to have called up, and acted upon, a resolution which I submitted some time ago, under the directions of the Committee on Pensions, to provide for the distribution to new members of the Senate of the same number of Mayo & Moulton's edition of the pension and bounty land laws, as was ordered at the last session.

Mr. HUNTER. I hope the Senator will not call up that resolution at this time. It is time to proceed to the consideration of the special order.

Mr. JONES, of Iowa. I do not think there will be any objection to it.

Mr. HUNTER. Yes, sir; there will be opposition to it.

Mr. JONES. It is important to have it acted upon. I hope there will be no objection to it.

Mr. WELLER. It can be disposed of as well in the morning hour to-morrow as to-day.

The motion of Mr. JONES, of Iowa, to consider the resolution was agreed to.

The resolution is as follows:

Resolved, That the joint resolution of the 24th of February, 1854, for supplying new members of the present Congress with all such books of a public character in the same proportion as were furnished to members of either House at the last Congress, embraces Mayo & Moulton's edition of the pension and bounty land laws, &c., in the proportion of eight copies to each of the said new members, and that the Secretary of the Senate shall so understand and execute the said resolution.

Mr. WELLER. I do not suppose that it is worth while to interpose any objection to the resolution. It has been the custom heretofore for the Houses of Congress to distribute books among themselves. For my part, I have a great many more now than I want. I hope the vote will be taken now, as I desire to make a motion.

The question was taken; and the President declared that the yeas appeared to have it.

Mr. JONES, of Iowa. I did not understand that there was any objection made to the passage of the resolution. I did not know that the Senator from California made any objection to it. I thought he was in favor of it. It is simply to give to new members, who have come in since the passage of the resolution of last year, the same number of those books which the old members have received—that is, eight. The new members have each received one, and the resolution proposes to allow seven more copies to each.

Mr. WELLER. I would ask the honorable Senator whether any restriction as to the price is to be put upon these books?

Mr. JONES, of Iowa. The price was fixed originally. The sum which was paid for those received by the old members will be paid for these.

The question was taken; and no quorum voted.

Mr. JONES. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. WELLER. I appeal to my friend from Iowa to suffer this resolution to pass over until to-morrow. Some of us have not yet examined this book. If it be a valuable one to the country generally, we shall be disposed to vote for the resolution.

Mr. JONES, of Iowa. I am one of the old members, and have received my number of copies. I have, therefore, no personal interest in the resolution; but I dislike to see this distinction made of giving to old and not to new members.

Mr. WELLER. I am a new member, and I speak for myself, and say I do not want them.

Mr. ADAMS. You may speak for me, too.

Mr. JONES, of Iowa. If the Senator does not want them, I will take his number and dispose of them.

Mr. WELLER. At all events I want to look at the book first before I give my vote towards making the people pay for it. If I want one of the books I can buy it. I move that the further consideration of the resolution be postponed until to-morrow, in order that the Senate may proceed to the consideration of the indigent insane bill.

The motion was agreed to.

INDIGENT INSANE BILL.

Mr. WELLER. I move to postpone all prior orders, for the purpose of taking up the indigent insane bill.

Mr. BELL. I suggest whether it would not be better for us to go on, and finish the Indian appropriation bill now, and not take it up and then lay it by for several days, as we have already done. I trust that the Senate will proceed to dispose of that bill some way or other.

The PRESIDENT. The question is on postponing all prior orders, for the purpose of taking up the indigent insane bill.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. I understand that the Indian appropriation bill comes up as the unfinished business, and the motion made by the Senator from California is to postpone it. I hope the Senate will not agree to that motion. We have been discussing the Indian bill for several weeks by piecemeal; and I think that now when we have a fair prospect of finishing it to-day, we ought to proceed with it. I believe that, all other circumstances being equal, it is better to pursue one subject at a time. I do not see any pressing urgency for the discussion of the veto; but I do see a great deal of necessity for coming to an early determination on the Indian appropriation bill. There are, Mr. President, appropriations contained in that bill, which ought to have been passed, and the money expended; and the goods and annuities to be purchased under them ought to have been on the Missouri river at this very moment. The Indian service is absolutely suffering for want of the appropriations contained in the bill. I hope the Senate, therefore, will not consent to its postponement.

Mr. WELLER. My desire is that the Senate shall proceed to vote upon this question, and not consume, as we have been accustomed to consume, a whole day in discussing a question of the mere priority of business. Therefore I refrain from making any remarks, and hope we shall not consume the day in debating whether we shall do anything.

Mr. JOHNSON. Without expressing any opinion in regard to that, or in regard to what is involved in the abandonment of the Indian appropriation bill, I wish to say, that the amendment which is now pending has been before the body for days, and days, and days. Yesterday it seemed to be pretty well understood; but pass it over for two or three days, and it will not be understood at all. Unless you have the discussion fresh at the time, you cannot keep facts in the minds of Senators, in the midst of a thousand other things which they have to think of. This bill has never had a whole day's discussion, that I recollect, since it came up. On the contrary, when it has been taken up at the beginning of the day, it has been laid aside before the day passed; and when other things have been taken up in the beginning of the day, that has been taken up and considered at the heel of the day. It has been considered by piecemeal, as my colleague remarks—piece by piece, and his patience and courtesy have consented to give way whenever a Senator asked permission to go on with some other matter. Certainly, I think that his patience has exemplified itself here to an extraordinary extent; and it seems to me now, while there is yet something fresh upon the subject of this Indian appropriation bill upon the minds of the Senators from the debate which has taken place, it would be well to go on at least, and dispose of the pending amendment.

I therefore sincerely hope that the Senate will not postpone this bill for the consideration of the veto message, which is a mere outside discussion, for everybody knows that the debate on that cannot end in the passage of the indigent insane bill.

Mr. BROWN. My vote depends altogether upon circumstances. If any Senator is prepared to go on with the discussion of the indigent insane bill, I am prepared to vote to take it up, but unless there is an understanding that some Senator desires to address the Senate on that subject now, there can be no propriety in taking it up. We know that the discussion has not closed on it, and I do not myself know of any Senator who desires to be heard at this time. If the Senator from Virginia or any other Senator desires to be heard, I am willing to vote to take up the bill.

Mr. HUNTER. I understand the Senator from Michigan is prepared to go on.

Mr. BROWN. If the Senator desires to go on I will vote to take up the bill.

Mr. CASS. I have not the slightest desire to go on now. I intended to address the Senate this morning, if the question came up; but it is a matter of the most perfect indifference to me. I have no wish about it. I will, however, say it strikes me that there are some strong reasons why the Indian appropriation bill should be taken up.

Mr. BROWN. I think so too.

Mr. CASS. If the Senate desire to go on with the consideration of that bill, I am indifferent about addressing the Senate on the other.

Mr. SHIELDS. I hope we shall go on and finish one thing at a time. If the Senator from Michigan desires to address the Senate to-day upon the indigent insane bill, I hope it will be kept before the Senate until it is disposed of; or, if we go on with the Indian appropriation bill, that it will be kept before the Senate until it is passed. It is a very singular way of doing business to take up a bill and discuss it one day, and then lay it aside and take up another bill, and discuss it on the next day.

Mr. BUTLER. I want the judiciary bill taken up.

Mr. STUART. I wish to make a suggestion for the consideration of Senators. If we will take up the veto message and postpone it until Monday next, we shall be certain of disposing of the Indian appropriation bill in the mean time; and it seems to me that if, as has been suggested, we should take up one thing at a time, we should get along much better.

Mr. WELLER's motion was not agreed to.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the House bill "making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending June 30th, 1855;" the pending question being on the amendment reported by Mr. WALKER, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to insert:

To the Creek nation of Indians, in full for all demands against the United States, the sum of $500,000, in payment for eight million acres of land at six and a quarter cents per acre, taken from the friendly Creeks without compensation, by the treaty or capitulation of Fort Jackson, of August 8, 1814.

Mr. BELL. I made some remarks in support of this amendment, soon after it was presented by the honorable Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. WALKER,] from the Committee on Indian Affairs, and I do not propose now to enter into it at any length. I listened to the remarks of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. FITZPATRICK] yesterday, and I think that some consideration is due to the statements made and views advanced by him. The facts which he stated are of the most interesting character. They are historically connected with the condition of this tribe of Indians, both before and after the war. Every sentiment uttered by that honorable Senator, I know is founded in the perfect conviction of the rectitude of the opinions and judgment which he had formed in relation to the propriety of this amendment. I understood him to say that there were some one or two counties of very fine land lying between the Coosa and Tallapoosa rivers, which were reserved out of the country usually called the hostile Indian country.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. When I was up on yesterday I alluded to two counties lying between the borders of those rivers. I should have added, also, that there is the county of Coosa and a portion of Tallapoosa lying between those rivers. There are four other counties. The two counties which I first alluded to are the Coosa and Randolph counties.

Mr. BELL. I have understood from former investigations on this subject, that there were two or three hundred thousand acres of land reserved out of the country, that was commonly called the country of the hostile Indians, by the capitulation of 1814; and that it was these two or three hundred thousand acres which General Jackson considered at the time of that capitulation, and which has been relied upon by Senators who have opposed this amendment, as having been a compliance with what was promised the friendly Indians when they assembled in convention in 1814.

The argument of the honorable Senator from Alabama I have not considered conclusive against the reasoning upon which I brought my mind to conclude that something ought to be done to further indemnify the friendly Creek Indians, according to the promise made to them by the Government, in the instructions to the commanding general who was authorized to make that treaty. As I understand it now, even by the statement of the Senator from Alabama, this reservation was not made for the benefit of the friendly Creeks. It was only so much saved out of the whole country, which would otherwise have been taken from the hostiles. The friendly Indians at once said "that is no equivalent; it is no indemnity; we were promised that our fidelity to the Government and people of the United States, in the war with the Red Sticks, should be remembered, and that we should have indemnity out of the country of the hostiles." When they saw, by the lines proposed by that capitulation, that some eight or ten millions of acres of their own country, which had never been occupied by the hostiles—upon which, perhaps, a hostile foot had never trod—were to be taken, they thought it was a strange mode of complying with their expectations, and fulfilling the promise which had been made, that they should be indemnified out of the country reserved from the hostiles. Now, as I understood the remarks of the honorable Senator from Alabama yesterday, the hostiles did remain in the country, and did not flee into Florida, but continued to occupy as much as the commanding general thought proper to leave them for a home, out of the whole country taken from them. I understood the amount of country taken from the hostile Creeks on that occasion constituted the principal part of what is now the State of Alabama, amounting to some twenty-four millions of acres, and it was but a small evidence of mercy, of gratuity, on the part of the Government of the United States, to leave to the remnant of the hostiles that small proportion of the vast domain which was then wrested from them.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. In addition to the country lying between the two rivers, the Coosa and Tallapoosa, there was a large extent of country lying NE, E, and SE of the Tallapoosa river, including, if my memory serves me now, the counties of Randolph, Chambers, Macon, and I think a large portion of Barbour county beyond the Tallapoosa, and running down to the Chattahoochee, including a large portion of Barbour, Russell, Chambers, and Macon counties.

Mr. BELL. I am not sufficiently acquainted with the geography of the country to know the extent of those counties. I never before heard of any other county, except that lying between the Coosa and the Tallapoosa, as having been reserved in the territory of the hostile Indians. I hope the honorable chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs will explain how that is. This is the first time that I ever heard it stated that such an extent of country was reserved; an amount, perhaps, constituting the principal part of some three or four other counties, in addition to the territory lying between the Coosa and Tallapoosa. What I wish to know in reference to the matter is, whether this was a reservation for the benefit of the friendly Creeks, or of the hostiles?

Mr. FITZPATRICK. It was occupied by the nation in common, like the country between the two rivers.

Mr. BELL. That would not be a strict compliance with the understanding.

Mr. WALKER. The only answer which can be given to the inquiry propounded by the honorable Senator from Tennessee to the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, is simply that the Senator from Alabama is mistaken. From a thorough examination of all the documents in this case, from one end of it to the other, and of all the intermediate points, I can say that nothing whatever appears in them to show that there ever was any portion of country, either occupied by the friendly Creeks or the hostiles, set apart to them as a reservation outside of that lying between the Coosa and Tallapoosa rivers. If anything exists beyond the documents, I know nothing of it; but so far as appears from them, the Senator from Alabama is certainly mistaken.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. I am indebted to my friend from Wisconsin for his endeavor to put me right in regard to a matter about which I think I know something. I believe I have traveled over the greater portion of that country, and I have it as distinctly in my mind now as I have your face, sir. I undertake to say, that the country reserved under the treaty—not particularly for the hostiles or the friendly Indians, but to the Creek nation or Muscogee tribe of Indians—embraced the country lying between the Coosa and Tallapoosa, and the counties of Randolph, Chambers, Macon, Russell, and a large portion of Barbour county. Whether it was particularly set apart for this portion of the tribe or that, I will not undertake to say; but I will say that the settled portion of the Creek country was occupied by them after the treaty.

Mr. WALKER. I think I can explain this difficulty. If the Senator intends to assert that the Indians, after the treaty of 1814, claimed to own land in that region, I do not dispute it. The Government subsequently, from time to time, continued to buy from them, as from other Indian tribes, their lands lying both in Georgia and Alabama. But what is contended for here, is, that General Jackson set apart other country as a reservation to them beyond that included between the Coosa and the Tallapoosa. That will be found, on examination, not to be the case. He never pretended to set aside any other country than that for them, and but a very small portion of that. It will be found to be the case, too, that the Indians claimed to own—and the Government, by subsequent purchases, recognized their claim—and outside this district of country. I do not deny that there was country lying north as well as south of the line in Alabama and Georgia, which it is indisputable General Jackson did compel them to surrender by the capitulation of 1814. If it is simply contended, however, that they owned land and had claims to land outside of this tract, I do not dispute it.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. I never contended that, by the capitulation, the lands reserved west of the Chattahoochee were specifically set apart for any portion of the tribe. My impression is, and always has been, that a portion of that was hostile country.

Mr. WALKER. The question is, was the land which was said to be given, claimed to be an equivalent for the enormous confiscation which was made—an equivalent which, it is asserted, was given by General Jackson? All he ever pretended to be an equivalent was the small portion lying between the Coosa and Tallapoosa rivers. The Government subsequently bought the general claims of the Indians to land in other portions of Alabama and Georgia.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. The country to which I referred was hostile country, the same as that to which I alluded. General Jackson may have spoken to the Indians about the land between the two rivers, but the country to which I refer was a portion of the hostile country in 1813 and 1814.

Mr. BELL. I can only say that I never heard before that any other country was reserved to them, or considered at the time as an indemnity to the friendly Indians, except the small tract of country between the Coosa and Tallapoosa. That was the very battle-ground on which the hostile Indians met the whites; the heart of the country which they occupied; the center of their power. It has seemed to me that, unless they were driven out, or abandoned the country altogether, and the friendly Creeks were at liberty to go and occupy it exclusively, it could not be said in any sense to be an indemnity to them, or a compensation to them for their fidelity to the cause of the whites in the war.

I am only stating the grounds on which I formed my opinion from an examination of the case formerly. I have not examined it particularly at this session; but I did in former years. I remembered that there had been a tract of country between the Coosa and Tallapoosa which it was contended was an indemnity or equivalent for the land taken from the friendly Indians at the south.

Mr. JOHNSON. We have volume upon volume of record evidence in the State Papers, relying upon the authority of General Jackson and the President and heads of Departments of that day, and the agents of the Government there. We have the maps furnished by the Topographical Bureau. Are we to abandon these, and go to matters of surmise? Such a course, it seems to me, will not tend to the evolution of truth, nor enable us to discharge our duty properly.

I have declined to go into the discussion of this case heretofore; but I wish to say to the Senate, that the investigation of this claim, when it was first brought before Congress, was confided to me, as chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs in the other House. The committee discussed it and examined it. We went through all the volumes which have been produced here. We spent six or seven weeks in the investigation of them, and required the maps of the country to be made out; and I assert boldly that there is no record evidence whatever which shows that anything was given as an equivalent to these Indians, but the strip of land lying between the Coosa and Tallapoosa. If that was the only equivalent, what sort of a consideration was it? We must recollect that it was land taken from the hostile to be given to the friendly Indians; and when given to the friendly Indians as a satisfaction, and an indemnity, for what had been taken from them, our allies in the war, they were told, when they asked where the hostiles should go, "You have room in that strip to take them with you, and you shall do it."

We have in our possession the documents of all the transactions at the time. They were not as verbose at that day as we are in the habit of making them at the present time, when printing is easy and money is plentiful; but the documents clearly show that the friendly Indians, to whom this strip of country was given as indemnity, were required to take the hostiles in with them. The friendly Indians were the minority of the nation; and yet they were required to go in and live amidst the hostiles in that little strip of country, and this was called an equivalent!

Sir, that caps the climax, I will not say of our inhumanity to our friends and allies who had fought with us during that war, but it caps the climax of our faithlessness, our utter abandonment to all sense of right. It shows the perfidy to which a nation can be sunk when it acts without considering what is to be the result of its action. The result of that action of the Government was to say to the friendly Creeks, "You shall take this strip of country as an equivalent for the lands taken from you; you shall go and live there; and although three fourths of the nation are hostiles, and never will be at peace with you, there is plenty of room for them to live with you there, and they shall be with you." The friendly Creeks had been our allies. They had fought for us, and shed their blood upon every mile of ground through that country in every battle which was fought. This, then, in fact, was saying to them, "We will tie you hand and foot and deliver you up to the hostiles; you have no peace with them, but you shall be butchered by them." This was the consummation of the language which we used towards them at the outset. Is this what was meant when the commanding general was told—

"You may likewise inform them (the friendly Creek Indians) that the United States will not forget their fidelity, but in the arrangements which may be made of the lands to be retained as indemnity, their claims will be respected."

We respected them by taking eight millions of acres of their land for nothing!

"And such of their chiefs as have distinguished themselves by their exertion and valor in the common cause, will also receive indemnification in the ceded lands."

We pledged ourselves to respect their claims, and to recollect their fidelity; yet we took eight million acres of their lands without remuneration, and said to the friendly Indians, a minority of the Creeks, only about one third or one fourth of the whole nation, "You shall be bound hand and foot, and delivered over to the hostiles." We remunerated them for their valor and fidelity, by putting them in the midst of the hostiles to have their throats cut, and all of them exterminated. Of course they never obtained possession of this equivalent. The hostiles always held it.

That is the manner in which we fulfilled our promises; and I am sorry to say that many Senators here seem to regard this as a fulfillment of the promise of fidelity to these Indians for their good faith and devotion to the whites. It appears by record evidence, which no oral testimony can be permitted to come in and dispute, that you took eight million acres of their land. Record testimony is the highest that can be given; and when you go back to a transaction which occurred forty or fifty years ago, it is almost the only testimony of which the case is susceptible.

I had almost determined to vote against this amendment, and I will state the reason. I went through a long, tedious, and laborious investigation of this whole matter some time ago. The Committee on Indian Affairs of the other House, of which I was a member, examined the subject thoroughly. We unanimously came to the conclusion that the claim ought to be allowed. There was but one dissenting voice in the committee, and that was a member from the State of Texas, who refused to come to the committee and submit his objections to them, and let the committee have the light of his investigations. Those of the committee who did make the investigation decided unanimously that it was indisputable that eight millions of acres of land were taken from these Indians without consideration or compensation. Then there were lands occupied by the Cherokees, which we refused to pay the Creeks for, because there was a doubt as to the title of the Creeks. We also took lands, under similar circumstances, from some other tribe of Indians, whose name I do not now recollect, which did, in fact, belong to the Creeks. Taking these cases altogether, it appeared that we took from these Indians sixteen or seventeen millions of acres of land, their title to which was so strong that a white man never would have given it up. Laying aside these other matters, however, that committee admitted our obligation to pay for the eight millions of acres taken from them by the capitulation of 1814. We then called upon the Executive Department to report to us what lands had been sold by the Indians throughout the South to the United States from all the tribes, and the aggregate amounts which we had bought and paid for. We wished to ascertain the entire number of acres purchased, the quantity paid for each purchase, and the aggregate amount and number, so as to ascertain the pro rata amount which had been given for the several purchases per acre. The Department furnished us with a statement by which it appeared that the average price per acre was twenty cents; and the committee of the House of Representatives, acting with an eye singly to the justice of the case and the honor of the country—for the honor of the country is something—reported that that average price ought to be paid to the Creek nation of Indians; and we reported a provision for the payment, which amounted to $1,700,000. The committee of the Senate having charge of the subject now reports the claim for $500,000. Sir, if I were a Creek Indian, and you were to pass the appropriation of $500,000, I would say to you, "If this be the reward which our fidelity gets; if this be the faith which respects our right of ownership, go, take your $500,000; I scorn to touch your money." These are my feelings upon the subject, and this is the way I should look at it.

This transaction marks our records as preëminently beyond every other of the perfidious acts and infernal tyrannies which have been practiced against the various tribes of this misguided, ignorant, and defenseless race. I say this without fear of contradiction. It was my duty as chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs in the other House, to give to the case the full devotion of my whole mind during the time I investigated it. I did so, and I worked at it long and faithfully. Not a single member of the nine gentlemen on that committee, except the one who refused to investigate the case at all, ever entertained a doubt upon the subject. This was in the other House, where there are generally to be found upon every committee some who are as hard to satisfy, even on clear matters, as are to be found in any other collective body of men that I ever knew. After the investigation we gave the subject, we came to the conclusion which I have stated.

Now, the Committee on Indian Affairs of this body unanimously report, I understand, in favor of the recognition of the claim; but they cut it down to $500,000, on a ground which it seems to me is hardly tenable after fifty years. It is the ground spoken of by the Senator from Georgia, that the land in this country was not worth a cent an acre; and he cited as evidence of that the manner in which his own State government had disposed of her soil. If the value of our soil is to be judged of from the manner in which we dispose of it, it will be judged in many States to be worth nothing, for it is well known to be good policy to give away some lands when it is considered that national wealth depends upon the existence of a sound population, and not upon the money which is in the Treasury.

But, sir, to return to the point. The committee of this body, after mature investigation—and I know the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. WALKER,] who presented the amendment, investigated the case fully—has reported in favor of the allowance proposed. The committee of the House of Representatives of this Congress also reported favorably on this case. They both base their reports on no single authority, but what is found on the actual, indisputable records of the Government, with the seal of State marked upon every page. Now, we have been working at this matter for three or four days. It has been treated in a curious way. It has been taken up one day, handled a little while, a few facts evolved, and then laid over; and in two or three days afterwards it is taken up again, and so it goes on. Thus we have proceeded until the consideration of the matter has become an annoyance to the body, and the subject has sunk beneath disgust. If I were to vote against this appropriation, as I felt somewhat inclined to do, there is but one reason for it; and it is, that the amount proposed to be appropriated is a scandalous reduction from the amount justly due to the Indians. Both the committee of the Senate and the committee of the House, after full investigation, and on the faith of record evidence, were unanimous that the claim was right, and ought to be settled. Under these circumstances, I shall support the amendment.

Mr. BELL. I think, if my speech were to be printed by itself, the remarks of the Senator would be a somewhat unreasonable interpolation.

Mr. JOHNSON. I beg the Senator's pardon. The fact that he had the floor had escaped me entirely.

Mr. BELL. I did not intend to make a speech at all; but I wish simply to say to the honorable Senator from Arkansas, that I think he has rather misstated what the honorable Senator from Alabama undertook to state. I did not understand the Senator from Alabama as stating that the other country which he suggested was pointed out or assigned at the time of the treaty. He did not pretend to add anything to the record.

Mr. JOHNSON. Then I have totally misunderstood him.

Mr. BELL. I understood him distinctly to state that the country of which he spoke belonged to the hostiles, and that it ought to be taken into consideration as part of the reservation; but he did not undertake to state at all that it was pointed out, or was so considered at the time of the capitulation.

Mr. JOHNSON. If that be so, I was certainly mistaken as to the remarks of the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. My honorable friend from Tennessee has done me but bare justice in the statement which he has just made. I have not contended that lands south of the Tallapoosa river were set apart by General Jackson as a home for the friendly or the hostile Indians. I never alleged that any portion of that country was set apart for this or that portion of the tribe, but that it was a portion of the hostile country which perhaps General Jackson had stated the friendly Creeks might use in common with the others, if they saw proper.

Mr. BELL. I understood the honorable Senator to contend that other country besides that between the Coosa and Tallapoosa was left to the hostiles; but there, I think, is the defect of his statement. If he intended to affect the argument on which his amendment was supported, his statement is defective in this: that it appears this was not considered, at the time of the capitulation, as reserved as an indemnity to the friendly Creeks, but that only the country between the Coosa and Tallapoosa was so considered. I understand from the honorable Senator that there was other country occupied by them. He might have stated, I think, with more propriety, in regard to the nature of the transaction, as we see it detailed in the history of the capitulation, that there was other country which General Jackson might, according to his view of the subject, have taken as hostile country which he did not take.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. That is what I intended to say.

Mr. BELL. But General Jackson does not seem to have acted upon that idea himself. He left the other country to the friendly Creeks, as belonging to them naturally and by former claims and occupancy; and he assigned the country between the Coosa and Tallapoosa, which was undoubtedly hostile country, the very seat of war, for the occupation of the friendly Creeks.

Sir, I have never pretended that, in my judgment, this claim against the United States was founded stricti juris. I have not said we are under any obligation of that description to pay it; but I based my argument on the idea that I thought the promise held out by the Government to the friendly Creeks had not been complied with, and that hence the good faith and character of this Government, in dealing with an inferior people, like these Indians, was concerned, and that we should make them some indemnity, or give them some satisfaction at least, if not the whole amount that they thought themselves entitled to. I think it would be pretty extraordinary, under the circumstances, to say they should have $1,700,000, which I understand was formerly agreed to by a committee, or suggested in one of the reports of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs. But when the claim is narrowed down to $500,000, it occurs to me there is a great deal of equity in it. There is a great deal in regard to it which does not depend upon uncertain recollection. There is the statement of Colonel Hawkins; there are the instructions to General Pinckney, which were handed over to General Jackson. There was an acknowledged departure from the instructions in wresting from the friendly Creeks a large tract of country without any suggestion or instruction on the part of the Government. The General justified it, however, upon strong and sound political grounds.

It has been argued here that this was for the benefit of the friendly Creeks; but it was very natural that they should not think it was for their benefit. When this small tract of country between the Coosa and the Tallapoosa was pointed out to them as the compensation they were promised for their fidelity to the United States in that war, and they were told that the hostiles should continue to occupy it, it was very natural that the friendly Creeks should think, and say, that they could not regard that as any equivalent or compensation to them. It was only allowing to remain in the possession of the hostile Creeks a small portion of the whole country they had formerly occupied—almost an entire State being ceded by that convention. But, sir, they signed the treaty, and, therefore, I say it is not a claim stricti juris on this Government; though I think it is founded on considerations which ought to be considered here equally strong, and quite impregnable when assailed, unless there be other evidence than any I have yet seen or heard.

When I first examined this claim several years ago, the principal point which staggered my mind, and led me to doubt the propriety of the allowance, was the fact that it had not been mentioned in the various treaties which were made. We made a treaty with the Creeks in 1818 or 1819, another in 1821 and again in 1825 and 1826, and finally in 1832; and it struck me as singular that this claim had never been pressed in any of those treaties. This suggestion was made the other day by the honorable Senator from Georgia, [Mr. Dawson,] not now in his place, and it was the principal ground on which I doubted whether I could give this claim my support, some years ago, when I was a member of the Committee on Indian Affairs, and examined it with a good deal of care. But, sir, if the honorable Senator were here now, I would ask him to say whether at any time, when any of those subsequent treaties were made with these Indians, they could have been brought to agree upon it. We know their broken condition as a tribe. We know the rivalry or hostility of feeling which existed between different portions of the nation. It was suggested the other day, as a reason why they had not put forward the claim before, that owing to these circumstances, they could not agree upon the proper distribution of the amount. The friendly Creeks naturally thought they were entitled to the whole of it, if it was to go to them as compensation or indemnity, and those of the hostiles who continued to remain with the main tribe, and live on terms of friendship and harmony, probably considered that they were all one nation, and that they would be entitled to their proportion of the indemnity, if it should be granted. That suggestion, however, was only thrown out. I do not know whether there was any foundation for it in fact, except that I heard it mentioned as one of the causes.

But there was another cause. Was it not very natural, in the treaties which were made in the years referred to, that these Indians who were made, I will not say victims, because I do not care to use such language in reference to that capitulation, should have avoided mentioning this claim? I consider that General Jackson, upon that occasion, in departing from his instructions, acted on high political motives in taking the whole of this country away from the friendly Creeks, except this little strip, and what the Senator from Alabama now thinks might have been called hostile country, and, therefore, I will not go into that matter. I think it was showing very little leniency or mercy to a beaten and conquered people—an Indian tribe. It was certainly exorbitant indemnity for the expenses of the war. General Jackson was a man who acted on high feelings and impulses of patriotic public duty; but when he was pursuing those ideas, he was sometimes a pretty hard man in executing those purposes. But, so far as I learn from the history of the transactions, General Jackson had it in view to indemnify these Indians. He had kind feelings towards them; he must have had. It was not in his nature to have had other feelings towards the friendly portion of the Creeks. That, however, is neither here nor there. But in addition to this indemnity for their fidelity, out of the country that was to be taken from the hostile Creeks, there was a promise of indemnity for spoiliations for their property destroyed, their stock taken, and their houses destroyed and plundered by the hostile Creeks. Then, when in 1818, and in 1821, and again in 1825 and 1826, they came to make treaties, was it not the most natural thing in the world for these down-trodden people to imagine that if they could not even get that indemnity to the extent which they claimed, it was no use to present this other claim? I believe commissioners were sent down to ascertain the amount of the claims for spoiliations, and they reported in favor of allowing $200,000. They could not even get that; but two committees of Congress reported that it was understood $60,000 would have been full indemnity for all they suffered by the hostile Creeks—the Red Sticks—in that war. Then was it not the most natural thing in the world that they should conclude that it was not worth while to make any claim for the country taken from them on the southern border, in violation of instructions, and when they had been promised compensation for their fidelity, out of the lands wrested from the hostiles? They got none there which they considered an equivalent. The hostiles were permitted to remain on the country given to the friendly Creeks. They could not consider it—and they so expressed themselves at the time—as any equivalent for the country taken from them. However much they may have felt their weakness, however keenly they may have felt what they considered to be the oppression of the greater power of this Government upon them, it would be idle and vain, when they could not get the $180,000 or $190,000 which had been promised for their property destroyed, stock killed and driven off by the hostile Creeks, to present this claim. If they could not even get that from the United States Government, they might very well consider that it would be a bootless attempt to seek anything further.

In addition to this, I may state what the honorable Senator from Georgia [Mr. Toombs] knows, that in the deficiency bill which we have passed, or in this bill—I do not recollect which—there is an appropriation for the balance of the claim for indemnity for those spoiliations yet remaining to be paid; and only two or three years ago a considerable portion of it was paid.

Mr. TOOMBS. That appropriation is in this bill. I will state to the gentleman that there is nothing more liberal than the conduct of the Government in reference to those spoiliations. First $85,000 was appropriated, and most of it distributed by agent Hawkins; but he said that a few of the parties were out hunting, and there was a little balance due them. Mr. Hawkins died, and a new agent, General Mitchell, of my State, was sent, and he reported the amount unpaid to be $110,000, making, altogether, about $200,000, which amount we have since paid. That sum of $110,000, I have no doubt, was all ex gratia.

Mr. BELL. It was a long time back.

Mr. TOOMBS. It ought never to have been paid.

Mr. BELL. But they urged it, and a large portion of them believed that it was a well founded claim; and when they could not even get that, what was the use of prosecuting a claim for half a million, or a million, or a million and a half of dollars for land taken from them?

There is another reason to account for the delay. At the period when these treaties were made, our Treasury was not like it is now. We were pressed to pay off the debt contracted in the war with Great Britain; a heavy debt was pending upon us; and except in a flushed period, in 1817 and 1818, of over-trading, excessive importation, and of course excessive revenue, (all of which was ready to be absorbed, and was absorbed at once in the payment of the debt,) the whole course of Congress and the Government, in relation to the payment of claims of any description to the Indian tribes, or others, was a very rigid one. The most rigorous scrutiny was instituted, and I have no doubt that frequently some just claims were thrown aside.

Mr. TOOMBS. We were well off in 1832.

Mr. BELL. The public debt of the war had then been nearly paid off, I believe. I remember that it was a very great feature with the Administration just then being inaugurated, that the public debt was about being extinguished, and public prosperity beginning to revive. From the time when the war took place up to the period when the war debt was paid off, there was great stringency in the affairs of the Treasury, and a rigid scrutiny was instituted upon every demand on the Government which had to pass through the committees of Congress. Any person can see that by examining the reports of the committees, Congress did not suppose they had the ability to be liberal and generous, and what was not a claim originating in absolute treaty stipulations, and stricti juris in its nature, was, without any hesitation, thrown out. I merely suggest this as a probable reason; but the main consideration is, that when the Indians could not get their claim paid for spoiliations, it is not singular that they should never have brought forward this claim. Having made these remarks, I submit the question to the Senate.

Mr. CASS. I concur with the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. Brown,] in the opinion that this is a case involved in some doubt. It is not clear; but I agree with him that there are strong equitable considerations in support of the claim. If it were a claim between this Government and white citizens, I should vote against it; but the circumstances and considerations attending this case are such as present a very strong appeal to us. When we look to these people, when we know their condition, when we know how ignorant they are of our institutions, and how difficult it is for them to press their claims, when we look to all the equitable circumstances, I think we should treat them with great liberality. You know, Mr. President, and I know, that they have been borne forward on the great tide of civilization from the borders of the Atlantic almost to the Pacific ocean. We have extinguished their council fires and ploughed up the bones of their ancestors; and now, when they come to us for a little pittance for a reasonable allowance of part of the consideration to which they were entitled under former arrangements, I think we ought to yield to it.

The Senate are aware that I negotiated here, under General Jackson, the treaty of 1832 with the Creek Indians; and I have an indistinct recollection—though not enough to allow me to allude to specific facts—that this claim was then mentioned. The honorable Senators from Georgia, and others, well know that circumstances then prevailed which rendered it indispensable that the Indians should be removed out of the State of Georgia. Every effort was used with them, here to effect that object. It was necessary for the tranquillity of that portion of the country. And I think it is very probable—though I do not know it to be so—that it was said to them by General Jackson, as they now state, that if they postponed the claim, and urged it after they got west, it would be received more favorably. I repeat that I have an indistinct recollection that a claim like this was made.

Having been a contemporary of these transactions, I know all the circumstances relating to this matter, and I say no men could have behaved better than the friendly Creeks did. I know they were exposed to great trials. Allusion has already been made to the journey of Tecumseh among them. I have some knowledge of that circumstance. Here allow me to say, that in the history of our intercourse with the Indians, there have been two great men who have made their appearance among them, both animated with the same views, both instigated by the same objects, and both seeing that there was but one way to stop the progress of the white man, which was by a united effort among all the Indians. The object of their lives was to bring the Indians to that condition, to form them into a great union or confederation, to oppose the progress of the whites. One of these was Pontiac and the other Tecumseh, with an interval of half a century between them. In 1811 Tecumseh went to the South, to have an interview with these Creeks, in order to favor the project he then entertained. He was not present at the battle of Tippecanoe, in November. It may be that the result would have been different if he had been there; but he was among these Creeks at that time, with a view to instigate them to war. I know it, for I had a whole narrative of the circumstances from beginning to end, from the Shawnee Prophet, his brother. I know very well the strong inducements he held out, and I know these friendly Creeks were animated by the best feelings to the United States, or they would have yielded to his representations. Under these circumstances, I shall vote for the claim.

The question being taken by yeas and nays upon the amendment, resulted—yeas 12, nays 22; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Badger, Bell, Brown, Cass, Clayton, Foot, Johnson, Rusk, Sebastian, Smith, Thompson of Kentucky, and Walker—12.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Allen, Atchison, Bayard, Chase, Clay, Fish, Fitzpatrick, Hamlin, Hunter, Jones of Tennessee, Norris, Pearce, Pettit, Shields, Shidell, Stuart, Sumner, Toombs, Toucey, Wade, and Weller—22.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. I have some other amendments to offer from the Committee on Indian Affairs. The first is to insert:

For payment of the amount of his improvements to David Carter, an emigrant, under the treaty with the Cherokees in 1828, in pursuance of the sixth article thereof, $2,826 50.

Mr. HUNTER. Is that in pursuance of a law, or a treaty?

Mr. SEBASTIAN. It is in pursuance of the treaty of 1828. The amendment provides for the payment of over $2,800 to pay this claimant for his improvements, in pursuance of the sixth article of the treaty of 1828. There is a lengthy report on the subject, which I do not consider it necessary to read to the Senate, but which I have here in manuscript. I will merely state, that by the treaty of 1828 with the Cherokees, the Government of the United States offered to pay to any Cherokee who would enroll himself and go west, the valuation of his improvements which he abandoned in his old country. This was evidently a temptation which the Government, from policy, saw proper to hold out for emigration. David Carter enrolled himself, and had his improvements valued. The amount of the valuation was over $4,000; but in consequence of difficulties, which it is unnecessary to explain on the mere question of order, the Indian office has never paid the amount. After a thorough investigation of the case, I am satisfied there is no reason why it should not be paid; and, if just at all, it is in strict fulfillment of the treaty of 1828. I merely state this much of the claim to show that it is not excluded by the rule.

Mr. HUNTER. I should like to know, if this is in accordance with the treaty, why it was not paid at the Department?

Mr. SEBASTIAN. I will explain that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. ADAMS in the chair.) The Chair understood the Senator from Arkansas to reserve that explanation until the question of order shall be disposed of.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. I only explained before as much as was necessary, pending the question of order; but as the Senator from Virginia asks why it was not paid at the Department, I will state the reason very briefly; and this statement will answer just as well on the consideration of the merits of the case.

The enrollment was made in 1834. The valuation of these improvements in the same year was fixed at $4,200, and David Carter emigrated west under the terms of the treaty. When he arrived there he found that, by some mal-administration of the fund, there was no money to pay him. In the mean time, in 1835, the final treaty was made with the Cherokees, by which he became not only entitled to the value of his improvements, but to other claims under the treaty as a Cherokee. He came on for the purpose of attending to all of them. Under the ninth article of the Cherokee treaty of 1835, the commission allowed him, $4,200 for his claims for spoliation, and the amount was paid to him. In the mean time, upon the report of the superintendent of Indian affairs for that country, who suggested that there had been some very extravagant valuations under the treaty of 1828, this case, among others, was looked into, and referred to Mr. Return J. Meigs, who reduced the valuation from $4,200 down to $1,250, unless Carter could show there was some error in the report made by him, which Carter was to be allowed to do. The opportunity was afforded to him, and a subsequent investigation by Benjamin F. Curry, appointed to examine this particular claim, exonerated Carter from the charges of fraud; but, inasmuch as he thought some two or three other persons were entitled to a share of the improvements, he reduced the valuation down to the amount mentioned in the amendment, a little over $2,800.

Afterwards, when application was made to the Indian officer for the payment of this sum, the officers there took up a new idea in their heads. In consequence of the inaccurate use of a word in a letter of the Commissioner, in 1837, explaining the nature of the decree allowing him for spoliations, they took up the idea that the decree for spoliations embraced also the claim for improvements. That, after investigation, I found was an entire misconception on the part of the Indian office. By referring to the original decree of the Commissioners, I ascertained that the spoliation claim alone of David Carter was adjudged by them—not including the claim for improvements under the treaty of 1828. The claim for spoliations was under the treaty of 1835. That difficulty being surmounted, it leaves this claim as one that has been unadjusted, and which has been suspended and tied up heretofore in consequence of that state of facts. These, briefly, are the circumstances of the case, and I think they admit of no question.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. The next amendment of the committee is to insert:

For salaries of six agents, authorized by this act, at the rate of $1,500 per annum, the sum of $9,000.

This is put in, at the suggestion of the Indian office, to provide for the salaries of agents already authorized by other amendments which we have adopted.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. I have another amendment from the Committee on Indian Affairs, which I believe meets the approbation of the chairman of the Committee on Finance, to whom I have submitted it. It is to insert the following additional section:

Sec. —. And be it further enacted, That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized, by and with the assent of the Indian tribes respectively, to be obtained in due form, to redeem and extinguish the perpetual annuities or the payment of interest perpetually upon sums of money required to be held in trust or invested in stocks, by either paying to said tribes the par value or equivalent of the said annuities and perpetual interest in whole or in annuities for a term of years, as he, in his judgment, may deem most advantageous to the Indians respectively.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. The Committee on Indian Affairs also instruct me to offer the following amendment as an additional section:

Sec. —. And be it further enacted, That, to enable the Secretary of the Interior to settle and pay the claims on file for reservations, and for rents and improvements under the thirteenth and sixteenth articles of the Cherokee treaty of 29th of December, 1835, in pursuance of the stipulations of the third article of the treaty of August 8, 1846, the sum heretofore appropriated for this purpose, and carried to the surplus fund, is hereby reappropriated.

Mr. HUNTER. I believe I understood from the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs that these claims are ascertained to be good?

Mr. SEBASTIAN. Yes, sir; there is no doubt of that.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. I have another amendment:

To pay Andrew Taylor for his reservation of six hundred and forty acres at Sitico Old Town, on the waters of the Tennessee river, $14,720, with interest from the 23d day of August, 1843.

I offer this amendment at the request of the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. COOPER,] who offered it before, and who is not now in his seat. The Senate, I believe, are pretty familiar with the subject of this amendment. It was agreed to by the Senate once before, but was lost in the committee of conference. It was rejected the other day in consequence of the application of a rule which I understand is now so modified as to admit this amendment to be in order.

Mr. HUNTER. I do not recollect what was the decision of the Senate. Unless this comes under a treaty, it is clearly excluded by the rule.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. By the very terms of the amendment, it will be seen that it is to fulfill a treaty stipulation. It is to fulfill a stipulation of the treaty of 1835, by which the United States agreed to pay the Cherokees the value of the reservations secured to them under the old treaty of 1817, and expressly reaffirmed in that treaty of 1835.

The question being taken, there were, on a division—yeas 14, noes 12; no quorum voting.

Mr. BROWN. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. RUSK. I apprehend the Senate have forgotten the discussion which took place on this subject a few weeks ago. When it was discussed then, there was scarcely anybody against it. Similar claims have been paid under the same treaty. The amendment is to carry out the exact provision of that treaty—that the value of these reservations, which were lost to the parties by the operation of the laws of the State of Tennessee, should be paid out of the Treasury of the United States. There was no difficulty about the matter the other day, except as to the proposition being within the rule. That was the only difficulty about which there was any controversy then. This is a clear case. The money has been a long time withheld from the claimant, and various persons, precisely similarly situated, have been paid.

The question being taken by yeas and nays upon the amendment, resulted—yeas 23, nays 13; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Badger, Bell, Brodhead, Brown, Dodge of Wisconsin, Douglas, Fish, Fitzpatrick, Foot, Gwin, James, Johnson, Pettit, Rusk, Sebastian, Shields, Thompson of Kentucky, Toombs, Toucey, Wade, Walker, and Weller—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Atchison, Bayard, Cass, Chase, Clay, Hamlin, Hunter, Norris, Pearce, Shidell, Stuart, Sumner, and Williams—13.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. I have another amendment to offer from the Committee on Indian Affairs, which is the last one, I believe. I have no doubt the announcement is as gratifying to the Senate as it is to myself. It is to insert:

For the payment of the balance, per capita, due the Cherokee Indians residing in the States east of the Mississippi river, under the treaty of 1835, and the supplementary treaty of May, 1836, according to the stipulation of the tenth article of the treaty of August, 1846, the sum of $92,625 18.

Mr. HUNTER. I think I have been informed by the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs that this is a sum which was paid by mistake to the Cherokees west, a portion of which ought to have been reserved for the Cherokees east. If that be so, it would seem to follow that this money ought to be reserved out of the payments to the Cherokees west, and not be made a charge on the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. TOOMBS. I so understood it.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. That is the understanding of the committee; but, for a reason which I will state, the amendment does not place it on that footing. In the disbursement of the large appropriation which Senators will recollect was made two or three years ago to the Cherokees, it so happened that the Cherokees residing east of the Mississippi, in North Carolina and Georgia, were entitled to receive their per capita by a different rule from that which applied to the Ross Cherokees, or national party, west. This would have made the distribution unequal. The distribution to them was to be under two treaties—one the treaty of 1835, and the other the treaty of 1846, which adjusted the per capita of the two parties on very different rules and very different foundations.

In the administration of that fund, however, by the Indian department, they distributed the amount equally between all, the Cherokees west and those east; in that way giving to one class of Cherokees a larger amount than they were entitled to, and to the Cherokees remaining east a smaller amount than that to which they were entitled. Of course, therefore, the distribution fell short of the amount secured by the treaty to the North Carolina Cherokees, and there was a non-fulfillment of the treaty by not paying in full the money which had been appropriated, and which was due to the Indians under it. It was, therefore, a misapplication of funds consisting in the payment of too much money to the western Cherokees, and too little to the eastern Cherokees.

The amendment, as it now stands, stops, by its terms, with allowing the $92,000 to the eastern Cherokees. I have no objection at all to a declaration being inserted in the amendment that the President may, in such manner as he may deem just, reserve the amount out of the annuities or other funds of the western Cherokees. The committee did not insert that proviso in the amendment, because it was apprehended some difficulty might occur by an attempt at the present time to reserve it out of the annuities of the western Cherokees, a large proportion of which are trust funds for education and other purposes. But it is very obvious that in the course of events, which we cannot mistake, we may obtain the amount in some other way. The Cherokees have a large amount of country in the present boundaries of Kansas and Nebraska which they wish to sell; and it was believed by the committee to be an appropriate plan to take the amount out of the money which may be paid to them for that purchase; for when purchases are made, of course the Government gives them a certain price for the land. The committee thought that, instead of requiring them to pay the whole amount at one time, it was better to enable the President to give them some easy terms, rather than take the amount out of their annuities at this time, which are most of them trust funds. That is the reason why the committee did not express in their amendment, what was the unanimous opinion among them, that the amount ought to be taken out of the Cherokee funds.

Mr. HUNTER. I will suggest to the Senator to attach a proviso, saying that the amount shall be taken out in such sums, and in such manner, as the President of the United States shall deem proper.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. I will accept that amendment.

Mr. HUNTER. To meet the view of the Senator from Arkansas, I propose to add the following proviso:

Provided, That the same shall be reserved from the sums of money hereafter to be paid to the Western Cherokees, in such manner, and in such amounts, as the President of the United States may direct.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. I would suggest to the Senator that it would be better not to use the term "reserved," for it looks as if the United States were not primarily to pay the amount. My wish is that the Government should first pay it, because it is a small amount to be distributed among so large a nation as the Cherokees, and then to reserve it hereafter, out of the funds of the Cherokees west, so that the North Carolina Indians may now get the $92,000, and the Government indemnify itself hereafter.

Mr. HUNTER. I think that is the effect of the proviso as it now stands.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. If so, I am satisfied.

Mr. HUNTER. This touches only the amount to be reserved. But instead of using the term "reserved," I will say "reimbursed," so as to express the idea exactly.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. That will accomplish the object.

The amendment to the amendment, as modified, was agreed to; and the amendment, as amended, was adopted.

Mr. GWIN. I offer the following amendment:
For a clerk to the superintendent of Indian affairs in the Territory of Washington, $1,800.

Mr. President, I understand that the superintendent of Indian affairs for every one of the superintendencies has a clerk, except the superintendent in Washington Territory. This amendment is in pursuance of an estimate from the Department allowing $1,800 for this clerk. The papers have come to the committee, but they could not lay their hands on them at this time. I hope the amendment will be adopted. It is indispensably necessary for the discharge of the duties of this officer.

Mr. WALKER. I do not rise for the purpose of making objection to this appropriation, but to correct the Senator from California in one particular, and upon that to make a remark. He is mistaken when he says each of the superintendents is allowed a clerk. I believe that when you get out of the region of Wisconsin, a little more liberality is pursued by the Government than ever has been pursued there. The northern superintendent had a clerk under the last Administration; but when this Administration came into power, his clerk was respectfully taken from him.

Mr. BROWN. Respectfully! [Laughter.]

Mr. WELER. It could not have been done any other way. [Renewed laughter.]

Mr. WALKER. Yes, sir, the superintendent was "very respectfully" deprived of his clerk; while the local Indian agent in Detroit, Michigan, is allowed a messenger, who acts in the capacity of clerk, and discharges all the duties of the agency besides, for the agent himself does not live at Detroit, but lives on the line of the Southern Michigan and Northern Indiana railroad, and does not attend to his duties at all. He is allowed a clerk, or what is the same thing, a messenger, who discharges the duties. I have never taken occasion to volunteer remarks when the subject of them was not legitimately before the Senate; but I feel that on this occasion I can, with propriety and with justice to the northern superintendent, complain that, while his compensation is no greater than that of any other superintendent, and while his duties are extended over a very considerable region of country, he has been deprived of his clerk and messenger, and nothing in the world is allowed him as furniture for his office but a pine table and an old desk.

Mr. BROWN. Move an amendment to give him a clerk. Put him in with the other superintendent.

Mr. GWIN. I do not controvert the position of the Senator from Wisconsin; but we have made a large appropriation in this bill to enable Governor Stevens, who is the superintendent of Indian affairs in Washington, to make a number of treaties with the Blackfeet, and others, and it is indispensable that he should have a clerk to enable him to discharge his duties. I hope we shall dispose of this proposition without bringing up the question in regard to other superintendents.

Mr. STUART. I do not wish to oppose this amendment, but I rise simply to correct the Senator from Wisconsin in what he supposes to be a very great delinquency on the part of the Indian agent at Detroit. He is entirely mistaken in respect to the attention of that agent to the duties of his office. It is true that his chief residence is in the southern part of the State; but it is equally true that almost all of his time is spent in discharging the duties of his office at Detroit and elsewhere. I do not wish to say anything in respect to the superintendent resident in Wisconsin, as to the character of the furniture in his office, or anything of that sort. It may be very inadequate; but it is a mistake to suppose that the agent at Detroit does not attend to his business.

Mr. TOOMBS. I hope the amendment will not be entertained. It is creating a new office. It has not been brought before any of the committees, and I, for one, am not prepared to create additional offices for these superintendents without knowing something as to the necessity for them. I think, if there be any necessity for the rule which is so frequently applied to amendments to appropriation bills, this is a case where we are called upon to apply it. It is a proposition to create a new office, and to make an appropriation for it, in a case where none now exists by law. If the rule be worth anything, except to be applied to cases which you do not like, it seems to me that this is one of these cases where it ought to operate to exclude the amendment.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. I feel it due to state that I have just at this moment received a communication from the Indian office, which has, I know, for some time, had under consideration the propriety of allowing a clerk to the superintendents of Washington and New Mexico. I take it for granted, therefore, without reading them, that these papers are recommendations of that project. They are letters from the Department and from Governor Stevens, in relation to the superintendency embraced in the amendment. I had a conference with Governor Stevens but a few moments since, and he earnestly recommended this proposition. The objection which I had to it, and which I stated to him, was the fact that the Governors of these Territories where they were superintendents, had a Secretary of State provided for, who could hold both offices. He stated the fact that it was physically impossible for the Secretary of State, at least during half the year, to do the business of clerk to the Superintendent of Indian affairs. He said that there were about fifty tribes of Indians in Washington Territory speaking different languages; that he expected the correspondence, the taking of repeated census, and one thing and another would employ the time of that clerk in such a manner that the office would not be a sinecure; and that it was utterly impossible either that he or the Secretary of State could perform the duties of that office. The salary which is proposed to pay the clerk—$1,800—I believe is reasonable.

Mr. GWIN. Some of these tribes are a thousand miles off from the seat of government of the Territory where the secretary must be during the absence of the Governor.

Mr. HUNTER. The honorable Senator from Arkansas, as he informs us, has the estimate of the Secretary of the Interior. If so, the amendment is certainly in order; but I think we ought to hesitate in regard to creating these offices. I understand from the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, that the only superintendents who at present have a clerk, are the superintendent in California, and the superintendent at St. Louis. Then, it would seem to follow, that if we give a clerk to this superintendency, we must go on and create the same office in regard to the others. This I am not prepared to do.

Mr. WALKER. It may be well to remark, that heretofore, by a departmental arrangement, these clerks have been allowed, and the superintendents have been deprived of them when the Indian Bureau or the Department of the Interior deemed it proper. In this instance, it seems to me a little strange that a clerk should not be allowed to this superintendent, if one be necessary. It has seemed equally strange that the northern superintendent should be deprived of his clerk, and be left with neither clerk nor messenger, and required himself to discharge all the duties, make payments, keep his accounts, make his reports, take charge of the office, and transact everything of that kind, without any other assistance than what he derives from the local agents, who are removed at very considerable distances from him.

I wish, however, while I am up, to offer an amendment to the amendment proposed by the Senator from California, to add:

And for a clerk to the superintendent of Indian affairs for the northern superintendency, $800.

I think that superintendent can employ one there for that small sum, which is $200 less than is allowed to the messenger for the local agent at Detroit.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. I observe that the Secretary of the Interior, in making the recommendation which he has done as to the superintendency embraced in this amendment, has extended it to a clerk for the superintendency in the Territory of New Mexico at an annual salary of $1,000. He recommends, in the same letter, the allowance of a clerk to the superintendent of Washington Territory and of New Mexico Territory. I suppose the Senator from California will accept the amendment which I suggest to include New Mexico, as it was estimated for and recommended by the Department at the same time that the other was.

Mr. GWIN. I accept the amendment suggested by the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. HUNTER. Those amendments for which there are estimates are in order; but the others are manifestly not.

Mr. WALKER. I presume it is in the power of a member of the Senate to offer an amendment to an amendment.

Mr. HUNTER. Not to add a new appropriation, unless it come within the provisions of the rule.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. ADAMS.) The 30th rule provides that "no amendment proposing additional appropriations shall be received to any general appropriation bill, unless it be made to carry out the provisions of some existing law, or some act or resolution previously passed by the Senate during that session, or moved by direction of a standing committee of the Senate, or in pursuance of an estimate from the head of some of the Departments." No proposed appropriation of money, in the opinion of the Chair, is in order as an amendment, unless it comes within these provisions, and the Chair holds that the same rule applies to an amendment to an amendment as to an original amendment.

Mr. WALKER. Then the Chair decides my amendment to be out of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Yes, sir.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. I ask that the amendment be modified by adding to it, "to be allowed in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior." I do so for the purpose of enabling the Secretary to dispense with the additional assistance, if he thinks the service of the Department will admit of it. I know that heretofore a clerk was allowed, and an appropriation was made for one for the southern superintendency, but the Department has been able to dispense with the services of that clerk, and consequently the office was abolished.

I think it a very wise provision to insert in this case.

Mr. TOOMBS. I would ask the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, if the propriety of agreeing to these estimates has ever been submitted to the committee?

Mr. SEBASTIAN. No, sir, I received them this morning, and I did not state that they had received the approbation of the committee.

Mr. TOOMBS. I trust that these recommendations will not be adopted. I think it proper that they should go before some committee to see whether the amounts should be appropriated or not. It is a very extraordinary proceeding to bring in estimates from a Department when a bill is on its passage, and when the facts connected with the case are not before us, and to call upon us to create half a dozen offices, on the single recommendation of this officer, without the propriety of granting the estimates being submitted to any committee of the Senate, or any information whatever given to the Senate. I think it is a most extraordinary and loose mode of transacting the public business, without the least regard to economy, or even to ordinary care and vigilance.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. In reply to my colleague upon the Committee on Indian Affairs, I will state that I did not offer the amendment from the committee. I received the recommendation, and offered it as a member of this body, and not in my character as a member of the committee at all.

Mr. TOOMBS. I knew that.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. I offered it without the sanction of the committee for just what it was worth upon that recommendation, as any Senator upon this floor has a right to do. I believe it is the best, when we have time, that everything should go to the committee and be scrutinized by it. This amendment should have been before them, but it was received too late for that purpose.

Mr. GWIN. It is well known that the Governors of the Territories of New Mexico and Washington have recently reached this city; and that the fact of the necessity of these clerks has recently been brought before the Department of the Interior, and has been investigated by that Department. The Secretary of the Interior has investigated the question and has recommended the appropriation. I have not a doubt that the Senator from Georgia, if the question should go before the Committee on Indian Affairs, would, for the reasons given by the Secretary of the Interior, not object to the appointment of these officers, and to giving the discretion to the Secretary to discontinue them if the public service does not require them. This bill is now on the eve of its passage, and it is impossible, unless they are provided for now, that they can be appointed at all. I hope, therefore, that the amendment will be agreed to.

Mr. TOOMBS. I might concur in it, after I had examined into the subject, but I would leave nothing to discretion that I could regulate by law, and though I might do it there, I will not do it here, because I am without any information. I have nothing upon which to form an opinion; and it is an improper way of appropriating the public money.

Mr. GWIN. In answer to the remark of the honorable Senator, permit me to say that the bill is about to pass. Another question was expected to occupy the attention of the Senate to-day, or the subject of these appointments would have been before the Committee on Indian Affairs in their regular order.

Mr. BELL. The Senator from California knows me well enough to know that if I thought it important, I would vote for his proposition; but I wish to call to his memory, and to that of the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, a few facts. It was only a year or two ago that all the Territory of Washington was a part of Oregon; and, before the former was organized, it was thought that a superintendent and three Indian agents, if I am not mistaken, were sufficient for the whole. In that were included not only the Indian tribes in what is now the Territory of Oregon, but those in what is also the Territory of Washington. I do not remember how many tribes the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs stated there were in that Territory.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. Fifty.

Mr. BELL. I suppose two or three families now and then constitute a tribe.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. Very often.

Mr. BELL. Then, I think, with perfect respect to the gentlemen who use this language, it is ridiculous to use such arguments, and to rely upon such statements as those which he has furnished as any sufficient ground for a proposition of this description. There are perhaps fifty tribes, as the Senator has stated, but as I heard long since—and I have not heard much to the contrary of late—there can scarcely be said to be any Indian tribes between the Cascade range and the ocean coast. It is stated also that there are some very considerable tribes who range chiefly on this side of the mountains. We heard the other day about the Blackheads. How many constitute that great tribe? I believe it is one of the most formidable which you meet after you pass the Rocky Mountains; yet it does not exceed, in all, some four or five or six hundred souls—men, women, and children, and when you come to enumerate the other tribes, you will find that two, or three, or four families sometimes constitute them, because they speak a dialect different from some other tribes. Some of them live on fish as the Indians do in California. I do not know any Indians who live there on roots and worms, but I think it is very likely that they do.

Now, sir, as I stated before, and I called the attention of the Senate to it when we acted on some former amendments to this bill, before we organized the Territory of Washington, three Indian agents were supposed to be entirely competent for the management, or to attend to the interests of the Indian tribes in what is now Washington as well as Oregon, and the tribes about Vancouver's Island, and in the settlements which now constitute the only white settlement in Washington, which, I believe, amounted to from three hundred to five hundred inhabitants at the time the Territory was organized. I imagine there are not more than five hundred or a thousand now; but whether it be the one or the other, the Indians have not increased. When our settlements were forming there was a detailed statement of some two or three hundred persons at the place which is now the seat of interest in Washington Territory. For these, three agents and one superintendent were supposed to be sufficient; but the moment you drew an imaginary line between the two Territories and organized a new one, it was insisted that as Oregon has three Indian agents, Washington ought to have three, or else there will be jealousy, and rivalry, and bad feeling. That was alluded to as a ground on which we ought to vote for the three additional agents. The honorable Senator from Arkansas, I admit, said he was informed, and he relied on the information that three were required in the new Territory; but the argument further was that it would make it equal to the number in Oregon. The honorable Senator will remember that I thought the argument was not a very solid one; but that one of two additional, at all events, would be competent for the two Territories. There is a new superintendent now, because there is a new Governor, and it is claimed that a clerk to the superintendent will be necessary. If I saw sufficient information to satisfy me that that was so, I would agree to it at once.

In regard to Indian treaties, where are they proposed to be made? There is to be one with the Blackfeet. I believe there is an appropriation in the bill for that purpose. The superintendent will take a clerk with him to attend to that treaty. What other great treaty is there? And what is there in a treaty with eight or ten Indian heads of families—for I suppose they amount sometimes to eight or ten—that requires the services of a clerk for the superintendent? What great "talk" is to be held? What protocols are to be discussed and considered? What variety of forms are to be entered into?

Mr. HUNTER. I hope we shall not multiply offices in this way. We are carrying that quite too far. I am afraid we have authorized the appointment of more Indian agents than ought to be allowed; and here is a salary of $1,800 for a mere clerk to the superintendent in Washington Territory. That is too much. Then there is $1,000, I believe, for the clerk in New Mexico. Why that difference?

Mr. GWIN. Mr. President, how many Indian agents are there on the Pacific coast? The Senator says we have too many. How many have we there?

Mr. BELL. There are six authorized in these two Territories.

Mr. GWIN. And that is all there is on the whole Pacific coast. There is not one in California.

Mr. BELL. You have greater machinery there.

Mr. GWIN. We have nothing but a superintendent. These salaries have been estimated by the two superintendents—one in New Mexico and the other in Washington. It is well known that the prices of everything in Washington and Oregon are very much governed by the prices in California. It is different in regard to New Mexico. I have no interest in regard to this matter; but I know that the superintendents in Washington and New Mexico look upon these appointments as necessary for the discharge of their duties. The Senator from Tennessee referred to the population of Washington. He says it is about one thousand.

Mr. BELL. I said it was that when the Territory was organized.

Mr. GWIN. Where are the Blackfeet Indians with whom we propose to treat? We have appropriated $75,000 to defray the expenses of making a treaty with them. Are they in this superintendency?

Mr. BELL. They are on this side the mountains.

Mr. GWIN. Governor Stevens is to make the treaty with them.

Mr. BELL. They go and rob the Blackheads sometimes, and that is about all the mischief they do.

Mr. GWIN. An appropriation of $75,000 or $100,000 has been put in this bill on the recommendation of this superintendency; and, as he recommended it, of course he expects to make the treaties, and redeem his pledge.

The question was taken; and the amendment declared to be rejected.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. I attempted to attract the attention of the Chair before the question was put; and my object was to afford to the Senate the information which I possess by having the documents read which are in my possession.

Mr. BROWN. If the Senator desires to have the letters read, I will move a reconsideration.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. I do not care about it now. I will move the amendment again in the Senate.

Mr. BROWN. The memorial of the Bro'hertson Indians was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, but came into my hands yesterday morning for the first time; consequently, I have had no opportunity of examining it. I understand, from a verbal conversation with the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. WALKER,] that it contains a very meritorious claim, which ought to be moved as an amendment to this bill; but if the final vote on the bill is pressed this evening, of course I cannot propose the amendment, for I have had no opportunity of examining the memorial. I suppose this will be the only amendment that will be offered to-morrow morning, if, on examining the paper, I should find an amendment providing for it proper. If I had drawn up an amendment, I have had no opportunity of presenting it to the committee, of which I am a member; and I therefore move to postpone the further consideration of the bill until to-morrow, so that I may have an opportunity of examining this memorial, and submitting my own conclusion upon it.

Mr. STUART. Let the bill be reported to the Senate now.

Mr. BROWN. If the bill shall not be passed, and I shall not be cut off from offering the amendment, I agree to let it be reported.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended; and the question was on concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. STUART. There is one amendment in regard to the reservation of the Sioux Indians in Minnesota, which I wish to have modified. Let that be excepted from the question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. By unanimous consent the various amendments reported will be considered at the same time, except such as any Senator may desire to be separately voted upon.

Mr. HUNTER. A Senator can except any particular amendment. There is no necessity for reading them.

All the amendments but the one excepted by Mr. STUART were then concurred in.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is now on the excepted amendment.

Mr. STUART. The whole amendment, as I understand it, is this:

"That the President be authorized to confirm to the Sioux of Minnesota for ever the reserve on the Minnesota river now occupied by them, and to embrace the country lying between the Little Maraga and the St. Peter's rivers, upon such conditions as he may deem just. And, further, that it be agreed between the United States and the Sioux band of Indians, that, should it at any time hereafter be considered by the United States as a proper policy to establish farms among them, and for the benefit of said Indians, it shall be discretionary with the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to change the annuities herein provided for, or any part thereof, into a fund for that purpose."

I simply propose to strike out the words "and to embrace the country lying between the Little Maraga and the St. Peter's rivers." It is an extension of their reservation which is not necessary, and which, I am informed, will do great injustice to white settlers upon the land, and will also make useless a fort which is now erected there. I understand from the chairman of the committee that, on subsequent information which has reached him, there will be no objection to my proposition.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to, and the amendment, as amended, was concurred in.

Mr. HUNTER. I would ask the Senator from Mississippi, as we seem to be approaching so near to land, whether he will not allow us to take the question on the bill. He can bring in a separate report on that isolated case. We need not keep the bill back for that.

Mr. BROWN. I know nothing about the merits of the case; for, as I said before, I have had no time to examine it; but the Senator from Virginia very well knows that, to bring in a separate bill, would amount to a denial of the claim, if there be merit in it; because, if it were passed here, there would be no chance of getting it through the House this session. There may be merit in it. The Senator from Wisconsin knows more about it than I do.

Mr. WALKER. I will state what I know about the matter. The memorial was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, by whom it was sub-committed to the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. COOPER.] Yesterday morning he brought the matter before the committee, stating that he was satisfied the appropriation ought to be made, but that he should not be here when the bill was taken up for consideration again. Being from the State in which the Indians are, I did not desire to take the case and draw up the report and amendment myself; and, upon my suggestion, the committee submitted the report to the Senator from Mississippi. Since then, as he informs the Senate, he has not had an opportunity to look into it. I believe, so far as any member of the committee expressed his opinion on the subject at the time, there was a general concurrence in the merit of the claim. The Senator from Mississippi was to look at it and satisfy his own mind, and when he became satisfied, to draw up an amendment.

I will state that we cannot take a vote on the bill this evening for another reason. I have an amendment to offer, which is known to the Senate since last session as the Menomonee claim. It is a large one. I offered it at the last session; but, on the request of the Senator from Tennessee, the report—a lengthy and detailed one—then being printed, I withdrew the amendment to give an opportunity for further examination into that report. I shall have to offer it, and shall do so before the bill passes. It is one which, to say the least, will require the report to be read, if nothing should be said upon it. I shall ask for its reading when I offer the amendment. I am confident we cannot take the question on the bill to-day. I therefore renew the motion to postpone it until to-morrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Chair understand the Senator to move a postponement or an adjournment?

Mr. WALKER. It is the usual hour of adjournment; and, that the bill may come up to-morrow as the unfinished business, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. HUNTER. I thought it was the opinion of the Committee on Indian Affairs that we could get through with the bill to-day. If we have but one more amendment, let us sit here and dispose of it.

Mr. WALKER. It has already been announced that there are two, and one of them is not ready. I can say, for my part, that I expected that we should get through with the bill to-day; but the lengthy discussion of this morning, in addition to that which took place heretofore, in reference to the Creek claim, has postponed us to this hour.

Mr. WELLER. I hope we shall go on with the bill. My friend from Virginia has had a very difficult road to travel, and he begs so hard that I cannot refuse him. I shall, therefore, vote against the adjournment, though it will be departing from my usual practice.

Mr. BADGER. I do hope that something will be done for the Committee on Finance in general, and my friend from Virginia in particular. We have had enough of this bill. It has lagged on here at a slow dragging pace, and for my own part I feel the strongest disposition to support the chairman of the committee now against all postponement by way of making some apology and some reparation to him for having in several instances, upon this bill, deserted my leader and gone against him.

Mr. WALKER. I do not know, on account of any personal consideration, that I ever asked the Senate before either to postpone a measure or to adjourn. Here is the first matter in relation to the Indian appropriation bill to which I desire to call the attention of the Senate that has reference to the State which I represent; and, under the circumstances, an honorable Senator from another State saying he has not had an opportunity to investigate the case, and I stating that I have another amendment, which will require discussion, or at least the reading of a long report, it would seem to me it might superinduce this act of courtesy, to say the least of it, on the part of the Senate.

Mr. WELLER. I will vote for the adjournment after that statement.

Mr. BADGER. So will I.

Mr. WALKER's motion was agreed to; and The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, May 24, 1854.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. WILLIAM H. MILBURN.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

The SPEAKER stated that the business first in order was the consideration of a bill (H. R. No. 330) further to amend the act entitled "An act to reduce and modify the rates of postage in the United States, and for other purposes," passed March 3, 1851, and the act amendatory thereto, passed August 30, 1852; and that the pending question was on the motion of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. OLDS,] to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. PHELPS. I rise to ask the unanimous consent of the House that an order may be made postponing the Pacific railroad bill, which is the special order in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for to-day, until to-morrow, or until the deficiency bill shall have been disposed of. I believe that is the general wish of the House.

Mr. MORGAN. No, sir; not the general wish. I take it for granted, from the fact that a majority of the members of the Committee of Ways and Means voted to postpone the deficiency bill the other day, that its passage can be of no immediate consequence.

Mr. PHELPS. Then the gentleman from New York objects.

Mr. MORGAN. I do.

Mr. PERKINS, of New York. I move to suspend the rules, that that order may be made.

The SPEAKER. It is not in order to suspend the rules, except on Mondays.

Mr. HOUSTON. I hold in my hand a memorial from the Legislature of Alabama in relation to some claims in that State. I ask that it may be printed, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

It was so ordered.

Mr. PHELPS. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. CHANDLER in the chair.)

The CHAIRMAN stated that the business in order before the committee was the consideration of the special order, being the Pacific railroad bill.

Mr. PHELPS. With the consent of the gentleman from California, who is entitled to the floor upon this question, I submit the motion that the further consideration of the special order be postponed until to-morrow, or until the deficiency bill shall have been disposed of.

Mr. McDUGALL. I am not willing to postpone the consideration of the Pacific railroad bill until the deficiency bill is disposed of.

Mr. PHELPS. Say then until to-morrow.

Mr. McDUGALL. I have no objection to that.

The question was then taken; and the consideration of the Pacific railroad bill was postponed until to-morrow.

THE DEFICIENCY BILL.

The CHAIRMAN. When the committee rose on yesterday, they had under consideration the twenty-fifth amendment, which reads as follows:

For continuing the works for bringing water into the city of Washington, $500,000.

—to which an amendment had been offered by the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. BARRY,] to increase the appropriation $100.

Mr. PERKINS, of New York. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say but a word.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that no further debate can be allowed.

Mr. HIBBARD. I wish to say to the committee, that I desired to obtain the floor on yesterday, for the purpose of making an explanation of some remarks which I made in a previous debate; and I now propose, with the consent of the committee, to print what I desire to say.

The CHAIRMAN. There being no objection, leave will be granted the gentleman from New Hampshire to do so.

Mr. PERKINS, of New York. Is it in order to move to strike out the amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. It is in order to move to strike out the amount in the amendment.

Mr. PERKINS. That motion, I believe, has not been made; I move, therefore, to strike out the amount named in the pending amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. That motion is now pending before the committee.

Mr. PERKINS. As debate is exhausted upon that motion, I will move to raise the amount to one million of dollars. I think that either the motion to strike out, or to raise the amount to one million ought to prevail; for the engineer who has furnished the estimates for this work, has estimated the amount necessary at $2,500,000. At seats of government everywhere—at Boston, New York, Philadelphia—the result has been, in carrying on works of this character, that the expenses have always been double the estimates furnished by the engineers having them in charge; and we may safely conclude that the same result will be seen here at the city of Washington. We may safely set down the expense at three times the estimate made by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. STANTON.] I believe that the expense of bringing water from the Great Falls will be about seven or eight millions of dollars. Persons holding offices under the Government, and members of Congress, will be obliged to pay the interest upon this money. That this will be the case I can demonstrate beyond all controversy. The rents of a place are in proportion to the value of the property. If a piece of property is worth half a million of dollars, and it is to be rented, the rent to be charged upon it will be in proportion to its value. If the improvement now under consideration will add seven millions of dollars to the value of the property in the city of Washington, the tenants who hire houses here, and the members of Congress who are obliged to hire rooms, will have to pay interest upon that money. The people have got lamps along Pennsylvania avenue which are furnished by this Government. This adds to the rent of houses and apartments. And we cannot get a room short of the fourth story in any respectable public house big enough for a fair-sized coffin [laughter] without paying somewhere from twenty to thirty dollars a week for board and room, or from about fifteen to twenty dollars a week for room independent of board. Now, Mr. Chairman, these exorbitant charges are all owing to the immense sums of money that are expended here, making property so valuable; and we have got to pay these charges. Whoever, therefore, votes for this improvement, votes to have the interest of these seven millions of dollars paid out of the pockets of members of Congress and the office-holders in the city.

Mr. Chairman, there is not a dollar of money that I have ever seen earned in the city of Washington that has not come, directly or indirectly, from the Government or its officers. You can find no business under heaven carried on here—at least I cannot—except that which is done for, and the cost of which is to come out of the pockets of the officers of the Government. And the more you add to the value of property here, the more interest you have to pay.

Mr. PHELPS took the floor.

Mr. SAGE. Will the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. PHELPS] allow me to make a remark?

Mr. PHELPS. I will yield the floor for a moment.

Mr. SAGE. In opposing this amendment I merely want to say, in addition to what I said yesterday, that I can see no good reason why the Government should make appropriations for this work, more than the State of New York should pay for water for the city of Albany. I believe that the value of property in the city of Albany is fully equal to the value of property in the city of Washington. This enterprise, if carried out, only inures to the benefit of the few property owners of the city. For one, I am opposed to it in toto, and hope that the committee will defeat the whole thing.

Mr. PHELPS. I desire to appeal to the committee, as it is now known that the special order of the Pacific railroad bill is only postponed for one day, to let us vote upon these matters at once, and not consume time in discussion. I hope, therefore, the gentleman from New York [Mr. PERKINS] will withdraw his amendment, and let the vote be taken on the Senate amendments.

Mr. PERKINS. I have no objection to withdraw my amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was accordingly withdrawn.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Notwithstanding the appeal of the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. PHELPS,] I beg leave to offer the amendment to the amendment which I send up to the Clerk's desk.

The amendment to the amendment was read, as follows:

Provided, That previous to the expenditure of any part of this appropriation, the Secretary of War shall enter into a contract with some responsible contractor, to finish and complete said work on the plan heretofore adopted, for a sum not exceeding $2,300,000. And it shall be the duty of the said Secretary to take from the contractor good and sufficient security for the completion of the contract according to the plan and specifications determined upon by the said Secretary.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky. If the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SMITH] will allow me, I would make a suggestion to him, for the purpose of having the amendment which he has offered modified.

Mr. SMITH. Certainly.

Mr. STANTON. The modification which I would suggest is simply this: The law places this work specially under the direction of the President of the United States. The contracts which may be made upon it are made by the President, and not by the Secretary of War; and therefore I suggest that the amendment submitted by the gentleman from Virginia be so modified by striking out the words "Secretary of War," and inserting in lieu thereof the words "President of the United States."

Mr. SMITH. I will accept the amendment suggested by the gentleman, and modify my amendment accordingly.

Mr. Chairman, I would be very glad to get the attention of the committee for a moment or two upon this subject. From the course of remark which was indulged in on yesterday by several members upon this floor, I am induced to call the attention of the committee to the fact that, by the Constitution of the United States, the District of Columbia is placed under the exclusive jurisdiction of the Federal Government. I repeat, that by the Constitution of the United States, this District is placed under the exclusive jurisdiction of Congress; and, as a consequence, that very fact imposes upon the Government an obligation to take care of the interests of this District.

Gentlemen have remarked that there is no obligation upon the Federal Government to provide water for the citizens of this District. Now gentlemen must remember that this city is a city literally created by the Federal Government, and by the officials connected with that Government, and those brought here in consequence of this being the Federal city. If there ever was a city which has a right to claim the aid of the Government, under which it has its existence, in its works of improvements, it is this very city.

But it was said yesterday by a gentleman from Ohio, that, independent of this consideration, the Federal Government has a large interest within the limits of this city—an interest which requires to be looked after and protected by the Government itself.

Having made these remarks, I proceed to the consideration of another objection or two. It was said yesterday, and various speculations were indulged in in reference to it, that a very large expenditure would be incurred in the prosecution of this work. I say, in reply to that, and I wish to call the attention of the committee to it, that there is no fitness, that there is no power in this body to undertake to adjust a system for the prosecution of this improvement. The subject was referred to yesterday by the gentleman from Ohio; and the law authorizing the prosecution of this work expressly directs the plan to be adopted which may be selected by the President of the United States. The power, without qualification, was given to him to select the plan; and when he has selected that plan, it is to come before this body, and this body is to carry it out. True, Congress may abolish the enterprise; but the plan has been settled, and the work commenced. Appropriations have already been made, and a large sum of money expended upon it, and I presume that the committee and the House will not depart from it.

A great deal has been said about the enormous expenditure involved. We have estimates of the expenses of the work from the War Department, and my amendment has been offered for the purpose of meeting the objection upon that head, and I stipulate in my amendment that the work shall not cost more than the estimate of the War Department. I am willing to leave the matter to the head of that Department, and to his discretion. He is to make the contract, and the contract is not to exceed the estimates.

Well, sir, that does not make any difference from the fact—and I ask the gentleman from New York to look to it—that not a dollar is to be expended until a contract for the completion of the work shall be made; and the contractor or contractors are to give bonds, with good security, that he will complete the job for the sum specified. These are all the precautions which can possibly be necessary, it seems to me. You are not to go on with the work, and a dollar is not to be expended upon it, until this preliminary requirement is complied with.

Mr. HAVEN. I do not rise for the purpose of answering the suggestions made by gentlemen over the way. I rise simply to say, that if we get afloat again to-day upon these deep waters, we shall hardly touch bottom during the whole day. I therefore hope that the committee will proceed to vote upon concurring or non-concurring in the Senate amendment. It is, I presume, a matter of indifference with the Committee of Ways and Means whether the committee vote the amendment in or out. The matter must be settled in the House by a vote by yeas and nays. I trust the vote will be taken immediately.

Mr. SMITH. I will insert in my amendment the word "contractors," so that it shall read "contractor or contractors."

Mr. LETCHER. I desire to have the amendment read. Nobody in this part of the Hall has heard it.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. PARKER. I have an amendment which I desire to offer.

The CHAIRMAN. No further amendments are in order.

Mr. PARKER. Then I will read my amendment, and ask the gentleman from Virginia to accept it as a modification of his own. It is the following:

Provided, That a forfeiture of the contract shall take place whenever the work is not strictly in accordance with the plans and specifications.

Mr. SMITH. I will accept the modification with pleasure.

Mr. FLORENCE. I will suggest to the gentleman from Virginia, that he also further modify his amendment by inserting the following:

The proposals to be advertised, and bids to be invited, by advertising in the newspapers of the United States.

Mr. SMITH. I will accept that modification also.

The question was then taken upon the adoption of Mr. SMITH's amendment, as modified; and it was not agreed to.

Mr. GREENWOOD. I move the following as a proviso to the Senate amendment:

Provided, That the amount heretofore appropriated shall not be applied, unless the corporations of Georgetown and Washington shall appropriate and pay an amount equal to one fourth the sum to aid in the construction of the work.

I offer this amendment in good faith, and leave it for the committee to decide upon it without remark.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky. I move to amend by adding the following at the end of the Senate amendment:

Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be expended, unless in pursuance of a contract to be made within the engineer's estimate ($2,500,000) after sixty days notice in the journals of the United States, inviting contractors to propose for the whole of the materials and work complete, agreeably to the plan adopted by the President of the United States. The bids to be opened in the presence of the bidders who may attend, and the contract awarded to the lowest bidder, upon his or their giving reliable guarantees and security to the United States that the whole work shall be completed in two years, and its permanency and efficiency guaranteed for five years after its completion.

Mr. Chairman, the amendment which I offer is similar to the one offered by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. SMITH,] and voted down but a minute ago. There is some little difference, however. It provides that the work shall be completed within two years. I understand the engineer, in his report, to propose to limit the time to be expended in the construction of the work to that period. I hope, if this appropriation is to be passed by the House, that amendment, or something similar, will be attached to it. I am satisfied, that if this work continues to be executed under the direction of the Government officers, and especially under the direction of the officers of the War Department, our worst fears as to the ultimate cost of the work will be realized.

I had this morning in my room an experienced, practical bricklayer, from the city of Philadelphia, who has been engaged in the construction of the culvert, or conduit, so far as it has been constructed; and he has given me some practical facts which will give us some indication of what the work will cost.

He says that there were eleven days' work on the culvert, and five thousand seven hundred and twenty bricks were laid, at $2 75 per day to the bricklayer, and $1 25 per day to the laborer, making the bricklayers' wages $30 25, and the laborers' $13 75—a total of $44 for laying five thousand seven hundred and twenty bricks, and equal to $7 89 per thousand. The bricks calculated at $10 per thousand, which they are now paying for those they are using in the culvert, will cost the Government for furnishing and laying them $17 89 per thousand, to which must be added $2 per barrel for cement and sand. That will make $20 per thousand brick. A thousand brick will make a foot and a half, lineal measure, of the tunnel.

Now, that is exclusive of the excavation; and the excavation, which I showed yesterday, and in the truth of which I have been since confirmed, will cost at the rate of $7 per cubic yard. It will take three and a half cubic yards to one foot of lineal measure of the tunnel, which will be equal to $24 50, to which must be added the cost of the brick work. That is the mere excavation and brick work.

Now, the Croton aqueduct, which is of smaller dimensions, averaging about seven feet in diameter, cost thirty-five dollars per foot, instead of ten dollars per foot, as the gentleman from New Jersey said yesterday. It cost at the rate of $200,000 per mile; it is forty-four miles long, and the whole cost is $8,500,000, and something over.

Mr. VANSANT. With the gentleman's permission, does he pretend to say the construction of the Croton aqueduct alone cost $8,000,000?

Mr. STANTON. So I understand from Appleton's Dictionary of Mechanics, which I have just examined.

Mr. VANSANT. I undertake to say that it did not cost one third of that amount.

Mr. STANTON. One million, eight hundred thousand dollars was expended for other purposes. It went to the construction of reservoirs, and the laying of the distributing pipes. The construction of the aqueduct is set down at $8,500,000. At this rate, for the construction of the tunnel alone from here to the Great Falls, provided we can construct it on as economical terms as the people of New York did their aqueduct, we shall have to pay at least $4,000,000. The area, however, covered by the mere conduit, is only about one third of the surface of the whole work. There is to be laid masonry on which the tunnel is to rest. The aqueduct must rest upon solid masonry, or concrete, to protect it from the weather. Captain Meigs, in his report, says that some parts of this aqueduct will be twenty feet under water. If the geological character of the country be such, any man of practical knowledge of this thing must see that the masonry must be massive and solid.

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Chairman, I regret that the discussion of this question has again been renewed. I came here in hope that the committee would have voted on the amendment, and that we would have gone on to the consideration of the others. I sincerely trust that I shall not be called on to again address the committee on the subject, at all events. I cannot now, however, refrain from replying to certain statements of gentlemen made yesterday, and to correct one or two mistakes. I care not what persons say who come here and make statements upon the subject. One gentleman rises here and endeavors to create the impression that there will be an immense expenditure of money upon this work, because the excavation costs $7 50 a cubic yard. Well, that statement is true; but the estimate submitted to this House by the engineer provided for the expenditure of fifteen dollars a yard on that work; so that it only costs one half what it was estimated to cost.

With regard to the Rock Creek aqueduct, I desire to say that Colonel Hughes never made provision in his estimates for the mains within the city. But, sir, this is a very small matter. If the United States undertake to build a work of this description at all, they should build a right one.

I have deemed it my duty to say thus much. I hope we shall now have a vote on the Senate's amendment. This work will be built. It has a substantial basis sufficient to justify members to vote for it. If it does not pass now, it will pass before the end of the session; and it would be a matter of economy to pass it now.

Mr. FLORENCE. I would suggest to the gentleman from Kentucky, that he should modify his amendment so as to have the advertisements for proposals inserted in the newspapers of the United States, instead of in the newspapers of this city.

Mr. STANTON. I will accept of that modification.

The question was then taken on Mr. STANTON's amendment; and it was rejected.

The question recurred on the amendment of the Senate, as amended.

Mr. WHEELER. I ask for tellers. Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. KURTZ and WHEELER were appointed.

The question was then taken, and the tellers reported—ayes 51; noes not counted.

The CHAIRMAN. A majority of a quorum not voting, the amendment is rejected.

The twenty-sixth amendment was then read, as follows:

For the payment of Richard H. Weightman for mileage and per diem compensation as an agent claiming to be a Senator elect from New Mexico, $2,464.

Mr. PHELPS. The Committee of Ways and Means recommend a non-concurrence in this amendment.

The question was then taken; and the amendment was non-concurred in.

The twenty-seventh amendment of the Senate was read, as follows:

Page thirteen, after line two hundred and ninety-three: For the purchase of Spanish and Mexican law books for the library of Congress, $1,700.

Mr. PHELPS. The Committee of Ways and Means recommend a concurrence in that amendment.

The question was then taken; and the amendment was concurred in.

The twenty-eighth amendment was read, as follows:

Page thirteen, after line two hundred and ninety-four, insert as follows:

For the contingent expenses of the Senate, viz: For lithographing and engraving, $20,000.

Mr. PHELPS. I would suggest that the Clerk read all down to, and embracing, the thirty-third amendment, as the amendments all pertain to the contingent expenses of the Senate.

Mr. LETCHER. I object to it. We have a parcel of custom-houses which may come in the same way.

Mr. PHELPS. The Committee of Ways and Means recommend a concurrence in the amendment.

The question was then taken; and the amendment of the Senate was concurred in.

The twenty-ninth amendment was then read, as follows:

For binding, $30,000.

Mr. PHELPS. The Committee of Ways and Means recommend a concurrence in that amendment.

The question was then taken; and the amendment was concurred in.

The thirtieth amendment was then read, as follows:

For books, $12,691.

Mr. PHELPS. The Committee of Ways and Means recommend a concurrence in that amendment.

The question was taken; and the amendment of the Senate was concurred in.

The thirty-first amendment was then read, as follows:

For clerks to committees and President pro tempore, draughtsman, messengers, pages, laborers, police, horses, and carry-alls, $4,400.

Mr. PHELPS. The Committee of Ways and Means recommend a concurrence in that amendment.

The question was then taken; and the amendment was concurred in.

The thirty-second amendment was then read, as follows:

For miscellaneous items: To replace this amount, drawn by order of the Senate from that head of appropriation, in a payment to R. M. Young, as commissioner to investigate charges against Hon. A. Ramsay, late superintendent of Indian affairs, Minnesota, $924 20.

Mr. PHELPS. I will make a brief explanation of the amendment now under consideration. At the extra session of the Senate, commencing the 4th day of March of the last year, the Committee on Indian Affairs in that body reported a resolution asking an investigation of certain charges which had been made against Governor Ramsay while acting as superintendent of Indian affairs in the Territory of Minnesota. The Committee on Indian Affairs had, prior to that time, been engaged some time in the investigation of this matter, and they concluded to transfer this investigation to an agent who should proceed to the Territory of Minnesota, and there conduct it. A resolution to that effect was adopted by the Senate; and Judge Young, of this city, was appointed the commissioner. He proceeded to the Territory of Minnesota, made an investigation of the charges preferred against Governor Ramsay, made a report to the Senate, and the compensation for his services must be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate, it being a deficiency to be paid out of that fund. The Secretary of the Senate made a special estimate of this amount as being due to Judge Young for the services performed.

Mr. LETCHER. I want to have that estimate read.

Mr. PHELPS. There are no items given. It merely states the amount. It is in these words:

For miscellaneous items: To replace this amount, drawn by order of the Senate from that head of appropriation, in a payment to R. M. Young, as commissioner to investigate charges against Hon. A. Ramsay, late superintendent of Indian affairs, Minnesota, $924 20.

Judge Young was allowed six dollars a day during the time he was employed in the investigation, including traveling expenses and stationery.

The question was taken; and the amendment was concurred in.

The thirty-third amendment was then reported, as follows:

To enable the Secretary of the Senate to pay for the maps of the public lands authorized by the resolution of the Senate of the 3d March, 1853, to be printed under the direction of the Committee on Public Lands, $5,150.

Mr. PHELPS. The Committee of Ways and Means recommend concurrence in this amendment. I hold in my hand a copy of the resolution adopted by the Senate, directing these maps to be printed. I will read the resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands be, and they are hereby, authorized to have printed the maps now prepared, and in course of preparation.

That resolution was adopted March 3, 1853.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. What is the necessity for these maps?

Mr. HOUSTON. I was going, Mr. Chairman, to ask a question from the gentleman who is at the head of the Committee on Public Lands. It is this: Whether this appropriation is intended to cover the same kind of service for which we made an appropriation in this bill a few days ago? If it is true, Mr. Chairman, that the House employs half a dozen or more clerks to prepare these maps for Congress, it seems to me that it would be certainly a waste of money for us to make that appropriation if the Senate do the same thing. My impression is, that the two items are meant to cover the same thing, as the same kind of maps which are being made for the House are also being made for the Senate. That is my opinion; but I would like information upon it. If it be true, which I do not dispute, that this appropriation is correct, then I would desire to call the attention of the gentleman at the head of the Committee on Public Lands to it, so that when the other bill comes up he may have some system devised on this subject.

Mr. PHELPS. I would remark that, as to the maps which are being prepared for the House, there has been no direction given that they should be printed. The Senate directed these maps to be printed; and this appropriation is for the purpose of defraying the expense of the printing and publishing.

The question was taken; and the amendment was concurred in.

The thirty-fourth amendment was then read, as follows:

Page thirteen, line three hundred and two, after the word "items," strike out "ten," and insert in lieu thereof "twenty."

—so as to make it read:

For miscellaneous items, $20,000.

Mr. PHELPS. Mr. Chairman, this is a proposition to increase the appropriation for miscellaneous items in the contingent expenses of the House of Representatives. In the original bill we appropriated $7,000, under the head of miscellaneous items, for the contingent expenses of this House. In consequence of the investigation of charges that are now going on by several committees of this House, and in consequence of the number of witnesses that have been in attendance, it has become necessary to increase this estimate. The Clerk of the House of Representatives thinks it necessary to increase the estimate by $10,000; and the Committee of Ways and Means recommend a concurrence in that amendment.

The question was put; and the amendment was concurred in.

The thirty-fifth amendment was read, as follows:

Page thirteen, after line three hundred and seven, insert as follows: For continuing the preparation and publication of a stereotyped catalogue of the library of Congress, $5,000.

Mr. PHELPS. The Committee of Ways and Means recommend a concurrence in this amendment.

The question was taken; and the amendment was concurred in.

The thirty-sixth amendment was read, as follows:

Page fourteen, after line three hundred and twenty-one, insert as follows: For rent of paper wareroom from the 1st of January to 30th of June, 1854, at $250 per annum $125.

Mr. PHELPS. I suggest that this amendment, and also the thirty-seventh, may be considered simultaneously, as they appertain to the same subject-matter; and the Committee of Ways and Means, recommend a non-concurrence in both of them.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the course suggested by the gentleman from Missouri will be pursued.

No objection being made, the thirty-seventh amendment was reported, as follows:

For cartage of printing paper from warehouse and office of the Superintendent of Public Printing to the printing offices, and labor, from the 1st of January to the 30th of June, 1854, at $550 per annum, $275.

Mr. ROWE. I would like to hear from the Committee of Ways and Means an explanation of the reasons which induced them to recommend a non-concurrence in these Senate amendments.

Mr. HAVEN. As a member of the committee, I will say, that the reason which controlled the committee in coming to their conclusion was, that the contract with the person who furnishes the paper requires him to deliver it where the Superintendent of Printing directs.

Mr. HENN. I would ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. HAVEN] whether, in the published proposals for the contracts which were made last for the supply of paper, that provision, as to the place of delivery, was inserted?

Mr. HAVEN. The Committee of Ways and Means know nothing about notices in the published proposals. They know what the contract itself was, and that is enough.

Mr. ROWE. I desire to make another inquiry, and that is, whether the contract specifies the rent of the room for storing the paper?

Mr. HAVEN. It does not. It makes no specification, except that the contractor shall deliver the paper at such times, and in such quantities, as the Superintendent of Printing shall direct.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky. I desire to have a letter from the Superintendent of Public Printing, in reference to this subject, directed to the chairman of the Committee on Printing, read by the Clerk.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, it will be read.

Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia. I object to its reading.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky. For the purpose, then, of saying a few words, and of having the letter read, I move to amend by striking out of the appropriation five dollars.

I desire to say, for the information of the committee, that notwithstanding the contract requires that the contractors shall furnish the materials at the places designated by the Superintendent of Public Printing, yet it is not always convenient to send a ship or a schooner load of paper directly to the printing office. The printers will not receive, store, and take charge of it, and incur the responsibility of keeping it in safety. It would be unreasonable for us to require that they should do it.

Besides this, the public printer is required to superintend all the printing done for the Executive Departments of the Government. The execution of that work requires a great variety of paper, which must always be on hand. The Superintendent cannot tell beforehand what quantity and quality will be required for the work. It becomes necessary, therefore, that he should have a storehouse, in which he may keep in safety a sufficient quantity at all times.

I now ask that the letter to which I referred may be read:

OFFICE SUPERINTENDENT PUBLIC PRINTING, }
WASHINGTON, March 19, 1854. }

To the Chairman of the Joint Committee on Printing:

SIR: I have the honor to request that you will submit to the Committee on Finance of the Senate the following items of appropriation to be placed upon the deficiency bill for this session, viz:

For rent of warehouse for paper from the 1st of January to 30th of June, 1854, at $250 per annum, $125.

For cartage of printing paper from the warehouse and the office of the Superintendent of the Public Printing to the printing offices, and labor, from the 1st of January to the 30th of June, 1854, at $550 per annum, $275.

These appropriations were submitted by me to the Committee of Ways and Means of the House, but were not placed by them in that bill. The reasons why they are necessary, are briefly these:

At the last session of Congress there was but one public printer for both Houses, and consequently all the paper required for the public printing could be delivered directly at his office from on shipboard, without expense of cartage, (although at great inconvenience, and cost to him for storage,) as the contracts with our paper manufacturers require them to deliver it at such places as shall be designated by me, free of expense. There are now two printers, and I have been obliged, (with your sanction,) to establish a warehouse between the two offices, where all the printing paper is received, inspected, weighed; and then deliver it to each office, upon their requisitions, as the law requires.

Another reason is, that to prevent the possibility of delay in the execution of the public printing, from closure of navigation or other cause, our orders upon the contractors, who reside at different and distant points, are necessarily very large, and we are often in the receipt of three or four cargoes at the same time, which renders it necessary that we should have some secure place where so large an amount of the public property can be stored.

Besides this, we are obliged to receive, inspect, and weigh at this office all the paper used for the printing of the Executive Departments, as also all maps, plates, &c., and to deliver the same as they may be required for the public service.

These several duties necessarily require much labor in handling boxes, &c., as well as expense for transportation. It has, thus far, been paid out of the appropriation for the contingent expenses of this office, but as that appropriation does not exceed a hundred dollars over and above the cost of advertising, and as this business is daily expanding, I feel compelled to ask the small additional appropriation above detailed.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

A. G. SEAMAN, Superintendent.

Mr. HAVEN. I desire to say simply this: Heretofore, as a member of the Committee of Ways and Means, and of the Committee on Printing, as well as a member of this House, I have gone to what I regarded as the very verge of liberality in granting clerks to the Superintendent of Public Printing; but the Committee of Ways and Means were of the opinion that this would be opening a new field of expenditure, which might be carried to an extent which this House would be unwilling to go. If you are to provide for warehouses now, other expenses incidental to the carrying out of such a system could be carried to almost an unlimited extent. The Committee of Ways and Means could see no reason why the Superintendent of Public Printing could not contract to have the paper delivered this year to the two printing offices, as well as he could last year to the one office? This is all I have to say. I hope the amendment will not be concurred in.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky. With the consent of the committee, I will withdraw my amendment.

There was no objection, and the amendment was accordingly withdrawn.

Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia. I move to make the appropriation six dollars less.

Mr. Chairman, I have not examined into the merits of this case. The Committee of Ways and Means have, and it seems to me the exposition given by the gentleman from New York [Mr. HAVEN] is perfectly conclusive in reference to it.

In reply to the gentleman from Kentucky, who has just taken his seat, I have nothing to say. I have great confidence in his judgment, so far as he has given his own judgment play in the matter. I cannot say the same, however, with regard to that of the Superintendent of Public Printing. I happen to know that in the construction of laws this Superintendent is not only not reliable, but a great deal worse than not reliable.

Mr. PENNINGTON. I wish to ask the gentleman from New York whether this appropriation is for a deficiency? I desire to know whether it is prospective or retrospective in its application?

Mr. HAVEN. I understand it to be prospective.

Mr. PENNINGTON. If it is prospective, then I think the gentleman from New York is perfectly correct in his conclusions, and that the appropriation should not be made, at least in this bill. But if it is to be retrospective, then I have another question to ask. If that is the fact, then I desire to know whether it is in pursuance of contracts already made? If there is a contract actually existing, made by the Superintendent, which calls for this appropriation, then I do not see why it should not be made.

Mr. HAVEN. I do not know whether any such contract has been made. If it has, it has been without my knowledge. I have no desire to do injustice to any one in this matter, and I will therefore say that, early in the past winter, the Superintendent made application to me as a member of the Committee on Printing for authority to procure these warehouses. I then took great pains to ascertain whether they were necessary; I went to the former Superintendent of the Public Printing; I went to the Union office; I obtained all the information I could that would lead me to a correct conclusion, and the result was, that I told the Committee of Ways and Means that, in my judgment, it ought not to be granted. The committee were of the same opinion, and they therefore refused to recommend the appropriation. What has been done since that time by the Superintendent I am not able to say, but if he has made any such contracts, they have been made upon the authority of the Superintendent alone.

Mr. HOUSTON. Yes, and in violation of law.

Mr. PENNINGTON. It seems to me that the whole question in regard to this provision turns upon the point whether or not the contractor has actually performed his contract with the Government? If he has delivered the paper to the Superintendent of Public Printing, the latter acquiescing in its receipt under the contract, providing himself a warehouse for its storage and safety, it appears to me that we should not now refuse to appropriate this deficiency. But if that has not been the fact; if this is prospective only in its character, then it is perfectly clear that the gentleman from New York [Mr. HAVEN] is right.

Now, as the whole matter turns on that point, in my judgment the Committee on the Public Printing ought to be able to tell us whether the contract has or has not been complied with. That is the whole question. I understand that the paper has been delivered under the contract; and I am unwilling to refuse the appropriation now under consideration.

Mr. HAVEN. I have never heard of any complaint of delivery of paper. The question is, where shall they keep it after they have received it? The paper has been delivered.

Mr. PENNINGTON. Then the question is, whether, when that paper came here, and went into this warehouse, it was delivered under the contract, and received as such by the Superintendent of the Public Printing? If that be so, the appropriation ought to be made. Clearly, it ought to be paid. That is the whole question.

Is it for this committee to recommend a non-concurrence in this amendment until it knows whether it is possible for the Committee of Ways and Means to tell whether the paper has been delivered under the contract or not? Now, I want to know.

Mr. HAVEN. It is possible for the committee to tell, but I do not know whether it is possible for the gentleman to hear.

Mr. PENNINGTON. Go on; I hear.

Mr. HAVEN. Before any warehouse was engaged, the committee had the action which I have already mentioned. It communicated its action to the Superintendent of Public Printing. What he has done since it is impossible for the committee to tell. If he has done anything, he has done it without authority of law, and in the face and eyes of the law. We do not profess to know what is going on contrary to law.

Mr. PENNINGTON. Has not the Superintendent of the Public Printing the right, under law, to receive the paper from the contractor for furnishing it to the Government? If he has that right, then the question is, has he done so?

Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. LETCHER. I propose to reduce the appropriation to one cent.

When this printing superintendency was established, Mr. Chairman, we were told that it would be an economical arrangement. We were to have one Superintendent. He was the only officer to be connected with this new bureau of the Government, as it now seems to be growing to one. Some time after the Superintendent was appointed, there was a recommendation that we should have a batch of clerks assigned to his office. After a scuffle, they went through the House. Now it is proposed to give the Superintendent still further patronage, although there is an express contract to regulate his conduct. Instead of regulating his conduct by that contract, the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PENNINGTON] wants this body to decide that he shall be the judge as to its interpretation; and that he shall be allowed to employ warehouses, and every other conceivable means, for the purpose of receiving and transporting paper here and there and everywhere.

Now, why were not this warehouse and these other things necessary during the last Congress? Why is it that no necessity for them has ever been found until the Senate of the United States chose to elect a printer of their own? That strikes me as somewhat remarkable. Last year the paper could be received, the Superintendent could dispose of it, he could place it where he thought it ought to go, and yet there was nothing asked under the Superintendent then for carrying, or storage, or anything else. Since the 1st of January last all these things are to be provided for.

Now, I have an objection to all this thing. I think that there is a growing disposition in this House, as well as in the other, to multiply officers of the country. We find now various schemes for the multiplication of officers. For example: the Governors of Territories heretofore have performed the duties of Governor as well as those of superintendent of Indian affairs. It is now proposed to separate those duties, and to make the Governor and superintendent perfectly independent. So it is with various other things going on here; and it does seem to me that this body ought to look into this matter, and, instead of multiplying officers, increasing patronage, that it should reduce some of these officers, if possible, or, at any rate, it should not go on to increase the number, and thereby to increase the patronage to be bestowed.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky. I desire only to say, that under the new law the printing costs comparatively nothing to what it did before. The law provided that the paper should be of a better quality. It has been so, and it necessarily costs more. It is true, however, that the aggregate cost of the printing and paper will not be more, in proportion to the amount of work ordered by Congress, than it was some time ago. But in consequence of the accumulation of material on hand this warehouse was absolutely necessary to be employed, and the Superintendent employed it under the direction of the Joint Committee on Printing. He has only occupied the warehouse for four months, and there are now on hand six thousand reams of paper, which are being daily distributed to the various printing offices. There must be some safe place in which to keep the paper provided by the Government, because the printers cannot keep it.

Mr. LETCHER. I understood from the Committee of Ways and Means that when this claim was presented, as far back as January last, they decided that it could not be allowed under the contract for furnishing paper. Now, I understand from the gentleman from Kentucky that the Committee on Printing have authorized the Superintendent to occupy these warehouses.

Mr. STANTON. The law places the Superintendent of Public Printing immediately under the supervision of the Joint Committee on Printing; and before the Superintendent acted in this matter, he came into the committee room and asked the advice and assent of that committee; and the committee, "seeing the necessity of it, granted that assent."

Mr. LETCHER. What authority had the committee to give that assent, under any law?

Mr. STANTON. We gave our advice when he asked it.

Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia. Let me ask the gentleman another question?

Mr. STANTON. Certainly.

Mr. BAYLY. I would ask the gentleman if there have not been some other cases in which the Superintendent has not been disposed to take the advice of the committee?

Mr. STANTON. None that I know of.

Mr. BAYLY. Well, I do.

Mr. LETCHER. I withdraw my amendment.

The question was then taken on concurring in the amendment of the Senate; and it was decided in the negative.

So the amendment was not concurred in.

The thirty-eighth amendment of the Senate was read, as follows:

Page fourteen, after line three hundred and twenty-five, insert as follows:

And the limitations imposed by the provisions contained in the act of 15th May, 1850, entitled "An act to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1850;" and the act of 3d March, 1853, entitled "An act making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1854," be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

Mr. PHELPS. I am instructed by the Committee of Ways and Means to offer the following amendment:

Strike out all of the thirty-eighth amendment, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

And that the period limited for the appointment of commissioner, surveyor, and chief astronomer, by the act of May, 1850, shall be, and the same is hereby, extended to the 30th of June, 1855.

Mr. PHELPS. The amendment of the Senate is to extend the period in which the Boundary Commission are to run the boundary between the United States and Mexico. By the civil and diplomatic act, passed at the last session of Congress, the period of this commission was extended to the 1st April, 1854. The Secretary of the Interior, in his annual report, makes use of the following language upon this subject:

"Nothing further has been done with that part of the Mexican boundary survey which is west of the (so termed) initial point on the Rio Grande. The appropriation did not apply to it, nor was any portion of it intended to be so expended."

"The question of the southern boundary of New Mexico having become a subject of negotiation between the two Governments, has been transferred to the State Department."

"The work in the field, on the undisputed portion of the boundary, has been completed, and nothing remains to be done but the office work. Much progress has been made in this, and with an adequate appropriation it can be finished in the course of the next eighteen months, if the data necessary to compare and reduce the observations for longitude, made by the surveyor and his assistants, can be obtained."

"The maps, after they are completed, are to be compared with the Mexican maps, and signed by the commissioner and surveyor. As the Mexican commission has progressed less rapidly, and it is uncertain when its work will be finished, our commission should not expire before the maps are fully completed and signed, agreeably to the stipulations of the treaty. The act of 1853 should be modified accordingly."

The Committee of Ways and Means object to the amendment of the Senate, believing that it would disturb the provisions already made by law regulating the salaries of the military officers who may be engaged upon that commission. Believing that it would be a desirable object to extend the period of time for this commission to complete its work, according to the treaty stipulation with Mexico, the committee recommend the adoption of the amendment already reported by the Clerk in lieu of the amendment by the Senate.

The question was then taken upon the amendment to the Senate amendment; and it was agreed to.

The question was then taken upon concurring in the amendment, as amended; and it was agreed to.

The thirty-ninth amendment of the Senate was then read. Insert:

For engraving maps, views, sections, and natural history of the survey of the boundary between the United States and Mexico, $10,000; to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. PHELPS. I am instructed by the Committee of Ways and Means to offer an amendment, to strike out the following words:

"Views, sections, and natural history."

The appropriation asked for in this amendment is needed for the purpose of completing the engraving of the maps of the survey between the United States and Mexico. In the letter of the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting the report from the chief surveyor of the Boundary Commission, it is said that $20,000 will be needed for the purpose of completing these maps, and also the views, sections, and natural history, but that only $10,000 can be advantageously used during this year. The committee therefore recommend the adoption of the amendment I have offered.

But if these maps shall be completed; if they shall be engraved, the Congress of the United States is called upon to publish a large edition of these views, sections, and of these engravings of the various specimens of natural history collected by the Boundary Commission.

Mr. KEITT. I trust the committee will not concur in that amendment. The committee will perceive that the provision of $10,000 is for engraving maps, views, sections, and natural history. Now, if, as is proposed, we strike out the words "views, sections, and natural history," it will leave nothing but the engraving of maps.

Mr. PHELPS, (interrupting.) I wish to state to the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. KEITT,] that $12,000 was estimated for the purpose of completing the work as here specified. But the Boundary Commission thought that they could only advantageously use the sum of $10,000 at the time, and the committee thought that that sum was sufficient to complete the engraving of maps.

Mr. KEITT. I have only this to say in the matter: The gentleman who was at the head of that committee informed me this morning that $10,000 was quite sufficient for all the purposes mentioned in this clause—for engraving maps, views, sections, and natural history. And he said—what I submit to this committee—that the $10,000 here asked to be appropriated will cover everything recited in the clause; and if we strike out the words "views, sections, and natural history," we will apply $10,000 to the engraving of maps, and we will derive no more advantage from this appropriation than if we kept in the remaining words.

Mr. PHELPS. Will the gentleman from South Carolina permit me to set him right in the matter?

Mr. KEITT. Certainly.

Mr. PHELPS. I will now read the estimate. It has been estimated that the whole work would cost $20,000; but I understood the gentleman from Virginia to remark that the whole work would only amount to $10,000.

Mr. KEITT. I have only stated what I understood this morning, from the head of the Boundary Commission, that $10,000 was all that was necessary to carry out this entire proposition.

Mr. PHELPS. Then why has not that gentleman submitted this estimate; and why did he permit any of his inferior officers to make an estimate different from that which he made?

Mr. KEITT. I do not know. I only make this statement in accordance with the information I have received.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I wish to ask the gentleman acting for the Committee of Ways and Means [Mr. PHELPS] one question. What is the use of having these maps made of the boundary, when it is probable that the boundary is about to be changed?

Mr. PHELPS. In reply to that question, I will say, that this House, or the Committee of Ways and Means, knows nothing definite of the change of boundary. We are aware that there is a negotiation pending about it; that we know from rumor. But whatever action may be taken on it, I believe that, whether there be a different boundary established or not, the publication of these maps would add much to the geographical knowledge of the country. That is the reason why the proposition is recommended.

The question was taken on the amendment to the amendment; and it was not agreed to.

Mr. RIDDLE. I offer the following amendment:

For wood cuts purchased by the Commissioner of Patents for illustrating the mechanical part of the Patent Office Report of 1853-'54, ordered by the House of Representatives, $1,500.

Mr. PHELPS. I was about to rise to a question of order with respect to this proposition. But still I am willing to hear the explanation of the gentleman from Delaware, [Mr. RIDDLE.]

Mr. RIDDLE. The Commissioner of Patents not being aware of the course usually pursued by the House of Representatives, entered into a contract with a gentleman in New York for the wood cuts necessary to illustrate the mechanical part of the Patent Office Report.

The whole amount is $2,000. The Committee on Accounts in the Senate claimed twenty-five per cent. of that as properly chargeable to the Senate, leaving, thereby, three quarters to be paid for by the House. But, as the question was never submitted to the Committee on Engraving, the House has never authorized the money to be paid, while there is a surplus in the possession of the committee. The House will have to pay it; and this is the only plan by which, as far as I can see, the money will be paid, as the Commissioner requests.

Mr. ROWE. As there has been so much noise here, I do not know what the pending amendment is. I ask that it may be read again.

The amendment was accordingly again reported.

The question was then put; and the amendment was adopted.

The question recurring upon the Senate amendment, as amended, it was put; and decided in the affirmative.

The fortieth amendment was then read, as follows:

For the completion of the bridge across the Potomac river at Little Falls, and painting thereof, agreeably to the plan adopted under the direction of the President of the United States, $75,000.

Mr. PHELPS. The Committee of Ways and Means recommend a non-concurrence in the Senate amendment. At the last session of Congress $30,000 were appropriated for the construction of a bridge across the Potomac at Little Falls. The work was progressing, under a contract, I believe, but the Committee of Ways and Means did not feel disposed to justify the course of making expenditures beyond the amount of the appropriation. They believe that when Congress appropriates a sum of money for a specific purpose or object, the expenditure should be confined within that amount, and if it should be found insufficient to accomplish the purpose for which it was appropriated, then that it is the duty of the persons making the disbursement to come to Congress, and ask a further appropriation to carry out the work intended.

Since this report was made, an accident has happened to the bridge, and I deem it an act of justice to the gentleman who is engaged upon the work, to make a statement in reference to the matter. I learn that it was estimated that $75,000 would be sufficient to complete this bridge. The work was progressing; the iron work was partially raised, when an accident happened by which the bridge was precipitated into the river. I learn that the contractor comes forward at this time, and proposes to finish that bridge for the sum of $75,000, if Congress will appropriate that amount, notwithstanding a loss to him by the accident of $8,000 or $10,000 upon the work already made. I make this statement as a matter of justice to the contractor.

But the view taken by the Committee of Ways and Means was, that here the expenditures to be made upon the bridge exceeded the appropriation made by Congress, and they did not feel disposed to sanction such a course of proceeding.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I beg leave to state to the committee, that the Committee of Ways and Means are laboring under an erroneous impression, decidedly erroneous impression, in reference to the matter of exceeding the purposes of Congress. Nobody pretended, at the time the appropriation was made, that $30,000 would finish this bridge. On the contrary, the very act appropriating the money shows that it was not expected that that sum would do it. Fifty thousand dollars were asked for in the first instance—

Mr. PHELPS. I will read the gentleman precisely what the law says upon the subject. Here it is:

"For a bridge across the Potomac at the Little Falls, to be expended under the direction of the President of the United States, $30,000."

Mr. SMITH. Well, sir, read the next paragraph.

Mr. PHELPS. That is all in reference to this bridge. I will read the next appropriation, if the gentleman desires it.

Mr. SMITH. I do not. That is not the paragraph I referred to. But, sir, the gentleman has read the appropriation, and from that it will be seen that it is not pretended that this is to be all that will be required—that it is the only appropriation to be made for that purpose. The appropriation was made for the commencement of the work, and the President or the Secretary—I do not recollect which—was authorized to select the plan upon which the bridge was to be constructed. I say that $50,000 were asked in the first instance, but it was then thought best to allow $20,000 to go for the Long Bridge, and the remaining $30,000 to go for the construction of this bridge at the Little Falls.

However, the contract was made with a worthy mechanic in this city, Mr. Rider, to undertake the erection of this superstructure. He has sustained a loss of some $8,000 or $10,000 by the accident which has occurred in the fall of the bridge; yet he is still willing to go on and finish the work for $75,000. He is willing to enter into bond and security to complete it for that sum.

Some gentlemen may think that this is a Virginia bridge. Sir, such is not the fact. It is true that the abutment rests upon the southern shore of the Potomac, but the jurisdiction of the District extends to the southern shore. I do not say that we in Virginia are not interested in having this bridge constructed. We are deeply interested. Most of the people who have settled upon the opposite side of the river—and, by-the-by, a large part of those who have settled there recently are from the North; most of them, I say—have settled there for the purpose of supplying the markets of this city, and nobly do they supply them, as anybody who will visit the markets three times a week can testify. But I do not propose to detain the committee longer by any remarks of mine. I desire, with the consent of the committee, to have the following paper, which I send to the Clerk's desk, read:

The Clerk read, as follows:

To the Honorable the Members of the House of Representatives:

The undersigned, contractor for the erection of the iron bridge at the Little Falls, with the view of inducing your honorable body to pass the item of $75,000, inserted in the Senate's amendments to the deficiency bill, now before the House of Representatives, would respectfully beg leave to refer to the accompanying report of Captain George Thom, in charge of the construction of said bridge, the letter of the Mayors of Georgetown and Washington, and that of the honorable the Secretary of the Interior, as setting forth the cause of the accident which has recently occurred, and the urgency of prompt steps towards the continuation of that important work.

That if your honorable body will pass the item of $75,000, contained in the deficiency bill from the Senate, not only will a large amount of money be saved to the Government, and the deplorable results of the late unavoidable accident be, in a great degree, modified and diminished, but that the contractor will be enabled, and will bind himself by satisfactory security, to complete the entire work for the said sum of $75,000, thus bearing the Government harmless, and saving himself from serious loss and damage.

The undersigned would further respectfully remark, that should the appropriation now asked for, and so urgently pressed by the Mayors of Georgetown and Washington, and the Secretary of the Interior, be postponed for any length of time, it might be entirely out of his power to undertake the completion of the work on the terms he has already agreed to, it being now the season when he can secure workmen and material on such conditions as will enable him to prepare the bridge for use, within about three months from the time the appropriation may be made.

Respectfully submitted,

GEORGE F. RIDER.

WASHINGTON, May 11, 1854.

Mr. SMITH. That is from the gentleman who proposes to construct this bridge. I now ask to have a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, in respect to this subject, read.

The communication was read, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
WASHINGTON, May 1, 1854.

SIR: For your information, I have the honor to transmit, herewith, copies of communications received at this Department from the Mayors of the cities of Washington and Georgetown, and from Captain George Thom, of the United States Army, in relation to the destruction of the bridge which was in the course of erection over the Potomac river, at the Little Falls, on the 24th ultimo.

It is important that this bridge should be completed at an early day, and Captain Thom, who has charge of the work, informs the Department that he is authorized by the contractor to state that he will enter into bond and security to make good the loss which he has sustained in the recent accident to the bridge, and finish the whole of the structure, according to Captain Thom's plans, including the iron work, masonry, &c., under the superintendence of Captain Thom, or such other person as may be designated, and the whole work shall be completed under the additional appropriation of $75,000 asked for in the deficiency bill.

It would then appear that if the appropriation of $75,000 asked for is made, no loss will accrue to the Government from the accident which has happened to the bridge.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

R. McCELLAND, Secretary.

Hon. WM. T. HAMILTON, Chairman Committee for the District of Columbia, House of Representatives.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky. I propose the following amendment:

Provided, That the work shall be done under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, and by competent civil engineers, and according to a plan, the whole cost of which shall in no event exceed the sum appropriated.

Mr. SMITH. I agree to that amendment.

Mr. STANTON. Mr. Chairman, I think that the amendment is a very important one. I am opposed to the manner in which the money heretofore appropriated for the bridge has been expended, and for that reason I wish to attach a restriction to this appropriation by which the Government will be protected in the future. The bridge is a very important means of communication between this city and a large portion of the State of Virginia, and I shall most cheerfully vote for the appropriation, if suitably guarded, as this amendment proposes. Indeed, I should regret to see it defeated, for a bridge at that point is greatly needed, and must be erected.

When the appropriation of $30,000 was made last session for this bridge, a topographical engineer was detailed by the War Department to superintend its construction. This engineer, though accomplished in his particular line of duty, I understand, never had the slightest experience in works of this kind, until placed in charge of the bridge. It is not his fault that he had no experience, and I cannot blame him for what he never had the means of acquiring. But blame rests somewhere; for a man of no experience ought never to have been detailed for such a duty, when the country is full of civil engineers of great ability and long-trying experience. The falling of the bridge and the loss of $10,000 or $12,000, with the sacrifice of one or two lives, will I trust teach an effective lesson to those who persist in placing military men over works of this kind.

Twenty-three thousand dollars of the appropriation, I understand, were consumed in erecting two stone piers and repairing the old abutment. The work upon the piers could not have cost less than ten dollars per perch, perhaps more. Now, will any man say that the piers and these repairs to the old abutment, if done under other management, could not have been built for much less money? I will venture to say, that any civilian in charge of the work who would have consumed that much money for that purpose, would have been instantly dismissed. Half the amount expended was ample for the purpose.

Sir, I went to the ground immediately after the late disaster, and witnessed the wreck as it lay in a confused mass between the piers. In my whole experience I have never seen so shameful an exhibition. I brought to the Capitol a part of the iron castings of which the bridge was built, and more rotten stuff I never saw in my life. No wonder the bridge fell; no wonder the thing came down a mass of ruins. Why, sir, the duty of the engineer was to inspect and test every piece of iron which went into that structure; and if he had done so, I am sure such miserable defects as I saw in that material could never have escaped his observation. The castings were full of flaws and defects. In some places there were holes as big as my fist, and these were filled up with lead, and that painted over, to conceal the defects from the eye of the engineer. A vigilant, competent engineer, would never have permitted such work to escape him. The spans of the structure were one hundred and sixty feet each, and it was utter folly to expect cast-iron work to stand over such spaces. The plan was radically defective as well as the work. Why, sir, a blacksmith of twenty or thirty years experience, who had worked upon the bridge, but left it because he feared the result which has followed, told me that he warned the engineer against the defects in the work; but was not heeded. The falling of the structure confirmed his apprehensions, and illustrates the difference between military engineers and practical men. A bridge built upon the same wretched plan, and of the same character of materials, fell a few days ago between this city and Georgetown while two omnibuses were passing over filled with passengers, and by which several persons were seriously injured, and one drowned.

Now, sir, it seems to me it is time to stop this policy of constructing every work ordered by Congress by military engineers. It is not done by authority of this body, but by the officers of Government who have control of the appropriations. I am sometimes blamed for the zeal I manifest upon this subject; but I am conscientious in my purpose, and nothing shall deter me from pursuing the course I have marked out until this evil is corrected. I believe thousands of dollars are sunk and wasted each day we live by persisting in the policy of thrusting military officers into civil positions, and placing them over works which ought to be constructed by the civilians of the country. However competent and experienced they may be in the line for which they were educated, they know nothing of economy, and are generally found wholly incompetent in other respects for many of the positions in which they are placed.

For these reasons, sir, I think it important that my proviso should be attached to the appropriation; and if it succeeds, then I trust, in view of the importance of the work, that the recommendation of the Committee of Ways and Means will be overruled, and the appropriation passed.

Mr. LETCHER. It seems to me that, after the developments which have been made by the gentleman from Kentucky, the first thing this House ought to do would be to appoint a committee to go to the spot and ascertain what is the real character of the materials which are being employed in this work, before we undertake to appropriate $75,000 to put up a bridge which seems to be thus defective in materials and in construction. It seems to me that it would be a practical, common sense course to ascertain whether the materials are such that there is any probability that the bridge will stand. Because why go on here appropriating first $30,000, and then $75,000, if there is any probability that when the bridge is raised a second time its own weight will sink it again? The fall of this bridge, taken in connection with the experience we have had in the case of the second bridge, where the same sort of casting was employed, ought to admonish us that we should take precautionary steps before we spend a single dollar more upon it.

Mr. HOUSTON. I would suggest to the gentleman from Kentucky, that I do not think his proviso will apply very properly to the entire bridge. I understand that there is a contract for building a bridge across the main channel of the river, and that contract has been made under the authority conferred to make it at the time the original appropriation was made. The proposition is now with the contractor that he shall complete that contract, and then he expects to get a contract for the extension of the bridge over the road on the other side.

Mr. STANTON. I am willing to make any modification.

Mr. HOUSTON. The gentleman's proviso, it seems to me, would conflict with the contract now existing.

Mr. STANTON. I understand that the present contract is merely for the iron work, according to the old plan, which has proved defective. My object is to let the Secretary adopt a new plan, and make a new contract.

Mr. HOUSTON. Would not that cause the waste of all the materials there?

Mr. STANTON. Not at all. The materials that broke down are not worth one cent.

Mr. HOUSTON. Oh, yes; a great many of them are.

The question was then taken on Mr. STANTON's amendment; and it was agreed to.

Mr. BANKS. I move to add $5,000 to the appropriation. I desire to say to the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. LETCHER,] that upon a full and correct understanding of the circumstances of this case, there would be no difficulty. This bridge will have to be built from the beginning. It is competent for those officers of the Government having the matter in charge to make any change in the plan that may be necessary. Nor is it necessary to alter the contract, because the contractor himself desires that the plan shall be changed, at least so far as the material is concerned. So that if this appropriation is made, the bridge will be completed, and there will be no loss to the Government from the accident which occurred.

I desire to say to the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. PHELPS,] that I do not think the objection of the Committee of Ways and Means is well taken. It cannot be said that the appropriation of $30,000 to which he alludes was intended to complete the bridge. It is not so expressed, but it is an appropriation so far for a bridge over the river. The bridge has fallen, owing to no act or negligence upon the part of the contractor, because it was raised for the purpose of placing upon the river bed the plates which ought to have been placed there by the Government before.

Mr. PHELPS. No bridge had been commenced before the $30,000 were appropriated for a bridge across the Potomac.

Mr. BANKS. The language of the amendment does not require that $30,000 shall complete this bridge, but it is only so much for a bridge. There is an expression in the report of the Department of the Interior which will cover this matter entirely. It is not an appropriation to complete the bridge. I only desire to say, that the accident to this bridge has not occurred from the fault of the contractor, because the Government ought to have provided for laying the bed-plates. But they were not laid. The bridge was completed, and the contractor was required, at the expense of extra time and extra service, to raise the bridge, so that he might lay the bed-plates. In raising them a piece of the iron gave way, and the whole bridge was precipitated into the river, causing a loss of some $10,000 or $12,000. The report of the engineer throws this loss upon the contractor; but he does not understand it to be his loss, because it was not through any negligence upon his part. If the appropriation of $75,000 is made, the contractor will be enabled to complete the bridge without loss to the Government. If the appropriation fails, then there will be a loss of $10,000 or $12,000.

Mr. LILLY. I am opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BANKS,] because I believe that a good, substantial bridge can be built for $75,000. I am anxious to have this bridge completed, and that speedily. I was invited by some gentlemen the other day to visit the bridge, and make an examination; and the result of that visit fully convinced me of the necessity that existed for a speedy completion of this work; and I am satisfied that a similar visit there would convince any man of the propriety of making the appropriation asked for. I am in favor of the proviso offered by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. STANTON,] providing for the appointment of a civil engineer, to make and carry out a plan for building a bridge at this point. I desire that no man-trap should be built, such, for instance, as the one at Rock Creek, which gave way the other day. I am opposed to the idea of placing works of such importance under the control and direction of inexperienced men. I do not think that army officers who graduate at West Point are educated to build bridges, although they may be educated to build forts, and works of that description. Civil engineers are educated especially for the purpose of building bridges, and works of a similar character, and to them should be intrusted the care of such a work as the one now under consideration. If the bridge is to be built anew, under a plan made by a competent civil engineer, then I would be perfectly willing to vote for the whole of the appropriation asked for; but if it is to remain under the charge of gentlemen inexperienced in such matters, then I shall be opposed to the appropriation.

Mr. BANKS. I withdraw the amendment I offered.

Mr. FLORENCE. I propose a pro forma amendment to reduce the appropriation to one dollar.

There is, Mr. Chairman, just now a prevailing epidemic in relation to the destruction or falling down of bridges in the District of Columbia, and adopting the nomenclature of the day, it appears that of all the causes of the difficulty, the most astute in giving reasons therefor really know nothing. It seems to me there must be a radical error in the superintendence of the construction of these bridges, as well as worthlessness in the material used in building them. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] remarked that the addition of the bed-plates was the cause of this difficulty in one of these structures. I do not so understand it. I have had the opinion of a number of practical gentlemen of experience and judgment, who visited me at my room, and they say that the worst iron castings they ever laid their eyes upon were used in building the bridge to which the gentleman has alluded. We have this evidence in addition to that given by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. STANTON,] If the material of which this bridge was being constructed had been of a good quality, the mere placing of the bed-plates by careful, practical workmen, would not have toppled it over into the waters of the Potomac.

I agree with the gentleman from Virginia, that it is time a stop was put to all of these proceedings. Hence, sir, I am in favor of striking out the whole appropriation, and of beginning anew; and adopting such a plan of bridge, under the control and direction of persons who know something about the business of building them, as will stand. Thus we will be able, if we are to construct bridges for the people of the District of Columbia communicating with Virginia, or over the different creeks and canals, which, I was going to say, infest the District: yes, sir, that is it—infests the District. We will be thus able to get a structure worth the money we may give for it.

Hence, Mr. Chairman, I am in favor—from a conscientious conviction of duty—of striking out the whole of this appropriation, and of pursuing such a course and adopting such a plan as I have here indicated. For, sir, there are thousands of good plans, and plenty of good bridges; and there are plenty of good bridge-builders, and thousands of competent superintendents, who can be had to effect this purpose, and who know something about the business. It is high time that we had an assurance of a perfect structure in bridges and building them, or any other public work, when we appropriate an amount, that will, anywhere else than here, be ample to secure that object.

I withdraw my amendment, if there be no objection.

The amendment was accordingly withdrawn.

The question was then taken on the Senate amendment, and it was concurred in.

The Clerk then reported the forty-first and forty-second amendments of the Senate, as follows:

Page fourteen, line three hundred and twenty-eight, after the word "California," strike out "$37,500," and insert in lieu thereof "$42,000," and that $5,000 of said sum be paid to Robert Greenhow, assistant law agent to said board, for services performed during the absence of the law agent; and the marshals of the northern and southern districts of California shall have the same mileage and compensation for serving processes issuing from said commission as are allowed to the sheriffs for serving similar processes by the higher courts of California; and the same mileage and per diem shall be made to witnesses as are allowed to witnesses by the State of California.

Mr. LATHAM. There are two propositions in the first clause of that amendment, though they are both embraced in the one amendment. I desire to have these propositions read separately, so that we can have a separate vote upon them.

The Clerk reported a portion of the amendment, as follows:

Page fourteen, line three hundred and twenty-eight, after the word "California," strike out "$37,500," and insert in lieu thereof "$42,000."

—so as to make the appropriation read:

For salaries and incidental expenses of the commission appointed under the act of March 3, 1851, for settling land claims in California, $42,500.

Mr. PHELPS. Mr. Chairman, the Committee of Ways and Means recommend a non-concurrence in that amendment. In the bill reported to the House, there is an appropriation of $35,000 for salaries and incidental expenses to the commission appointed under the act of March 3, 1851, for settling land claims in California. The Senate have proposed to amend that section of the bill by inserting that which has just been read at the desk. In the estimate submitted by the Secretary of the Interior for the amount necessary to defray the expenses of the land commission in California, the total amount was only $37,500, which amount the House of Representatives has so appropriated. The second proposition in the amendment is, that $5,000 of said sum be paid to Robert Greenhow, assistant law agent to said board, for services performed during the absence of the law agent. Now, Mr. Chairman, by the act fixing the salaries of the law agent and the assistant law agent, the salary of each of these officers was fixed at $5,000. I refer to the act passed in 1852—the civil and diplomatic appropriation act—which provides that the President of the United States shall appoint an assistant law agent in California, learned in the law and skilled in the Spanish and English languages, whose duties and compensation shall be the same as those of the law agent; provided, that the compensation of the agent and associate agent shall not exceed $5,000 each.

During a part of the time that Mr. Greenhow held the office of assistant law agent in California, the law agent was not present, and Mr. Greenhow discharged the duty incumbent on the office of the law agent, for which it is proposed to give him this extra compensation. I can regard this amendment of the Senate in no other light than as giving to Mr. Greenhow a double salary. Instead of paying $5,000 you are to pay $10,000, if you adopt the Senate amendment. I suppose that $5,000 would be sufficient to command all the time and all the energy of an assistant law agent; and that was the contract he made with the Government when he accepted the office. He agreed to give his whole time and energies to the performance of the duties of the office which he filled, and that, too, for $5,000. You have paid those law agents during that time, though some of them for a portion of the time were traveling in the Atlantic States; and now it is proposed to increase those salaries.

A MEMBER. Has this agent been paid?

Mr. PHELPS. This law agent has received his salary at the rate of $5,000 a year. For the reasons which I have stated, the Committee of Ways and Means recommend a rejection of the Senate amendment.

Mr. LATHAM. I desire to say, that so far as the gentleman's statement goes, relative to the discharge by Mr. Greenhow of the duties of assistant law agent, it is correct. But he does not go quite far enough to show the equity of the case, and to show the reasons which induced the committee to recommend a non-concurrence in the amendment of the Senate.

The duties of those two offices were specifically set forth in the law which created them. The duty of the assistant law agent was to take testimony for the commission, which was an onerous and responsible duty; and the duty of the law agent was to take charge of the proceedings and argument before the court.

Mr. PHELPS. Will the gentleman allow me to correct an error into which he has fallen?

Mr. LATHAM. Of course.

Mr. PHELPS. The law creating these officers says:

"The President of this United States shall appoint an associate law agent for the State of California, learned in the law and skilled in the Spanish and English languages, whose duties and compensation shall be the same with those of the law agent."

Their duties were all the same.

Mr. LATHAM. But it is not reasonable to suppose that when Congress here created these two officers they expected them to discharge the same duties. On the contrary, the law itself specifies that the assistant law agent shall be skilled in the Spanish language, in order that he may be able to take the testimony of Spanish witnesses; and I know that his duties were exclusively confined to the taking of testimony to be used before the commission. But upon the law agent devolved the duty of going before the commission and arguing the causes.

Now, Mr. Greenhow for fourteen months, and not for the short period of time which the gentleman states, but for fourteen months, discharged the duties which devolved upon both of those officers. He not only took the requisite testimony, but conducted the proceedings before the court, and at last fell a victim to the arduous labors which were devolved upon him. I say these things for the purpose of justifying the action of the Senate in giving to him the compensation to which both of those officers were entitled under the law. If the law agent received his compensation, he did so wrongfully, and without being in the slightest degree entitled to it, because he failed, for a period of fourteen months, to discharge a part of the duties, and during which time they were discharged by Mr. Greenhow. This amendment was introduced for the purpose of giving a compensation for the performance of double services.

Mr. McDUGALL. I move to amend the amendment by inserting between the word "to" and the word "Robert" the words, "the widow of," so that it shall read:

And that $5,000 of said sum shall be paid to the widow of Robert Greenhow, &c.

When this amendment was adopted by the Senate, we were not advised that Robert Greenhow was deceased; and I offer this amendment now, in order that, should this amendment pass, the money may go directly to the widow, who is now in the city of Washington.

I will state that a law agent was appointed, and afterwards an associate agent appointed, for the reason that the duties of that office had been exceedingly onerous. For fourteen months Mr. Greenhow has been not only the assistant law agent, and, as such, has performed faithfully the duties imposed upon him as such, but he has also discharged the duties of principal law agent. He has performed duplicate, and more than duplicate, duties as assistant agent, because the principal law agent would take upon himself all the responsibilities of the office.

Now, I understand that if a man does double service, he is entitled to double pay. Even if he does get $5,000 or $10,000 for his services, it is not an enormous compensation in the State of California. There is not a lawyer in the State, of respectable position, whose income is not more. Some of the officers of the United States Government in that State receive as much. The commissioners for settling land claims in that State receive a salary of $8,000 each. Mr. Greenhow discharged faithfully the duties of both these offices; and it seems to me the allowance which is proposed is but a reasonable one.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I desire to ask the gentleman from California what is the amendment which he proposes?

Mr. McDUGALL. It is simply that the amount shall be paid to his widow. Mr. Greenhow is dead.

Mr. SMITH. I would suggest to the gentleman that he modify his amendment so as to make the money payable to his legal representatives.

Mr. McDUGALL. I will say to the gentleman, that the effect, practically, will be the same. His widow is now in the city, and I desire that the money shall be paid directly to her, without going through the forms of law, which would be necessary if the form the gentleman has suggested were adopted.

Mr. PHELPS. I desire to say that this amendment proposes to pay this officer double pay.

Mr. McDUGALL. For performing double service.

Mr. PHELPS. Very well; for discharging double duty, if the gentleman pleases. Sir, this law agent was appointed to take testimony before the commission, and then to argue the cases before them. I do not understand that more than one can be employed at the same time. An assistant, however, was appointed, to provide that the business might go on in case of the absence of the principal agent. It was not, however, with the understanding that if only one was employed a portion of the time, that he should receive the pay of both.

The gentleman says other officers of the Government in that State receive as large a compensation, and refers to the commissioners to settle these land claims. The law originally fixed the salaries of these commissioners at $5,000 per annum, but the amount was raised at the close of the last session to $8,000. But, sir, the compensation of the law agent was fixed at $5,000, and that of the associate agent at the same amount, and now to allow one the salary of both officers, I think would be setting a bad precedent. When Mr. Greenhow was appointed to this office, it was with the understanding that he was to devote his whole time to the service of the Government, should the business in his office require it. It was not supposed, as I understand it, when the assistant law agent was appointed, that there would be business sufficient to employ two; but he was appointed in order that in case of the absence from any cause of the principal, that the business before the commission might not be suspended.

Mr. McDUGALL. With the consent of the committee, I will withdraw my amendment.

There was no objection, and the amendment was accordingly withdrawn.

Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia. I move to increase the appropriation $500. Mr. Chairman, I beg leave to say that I have always been of the opinion that the laborer is worthy of his hire. And, sir, the gentleman from Missouri is mistaken in supposing that in this case we are establishing a precedent. I recollect, within my experience, many precedents, where the same thing has been done; where officers, having performed double duty, Congress gave them additional pay for it. I refer to one case particularly. When the law passed authorizing the issue of Treasury notes, it was required that they should be countersigned by the Treasurer and the register. It was not a designatio persona, but it was a reference to them as public officers. Yet, because it was out of the line of their usual duties, this House, as I know of my own recollection, made to both of these gentlemen compensation for that extra service.

My friend suggests the case of judges of Territories. I recollect another case, still more palpable. Until we legislated on the subject, where an officer of the Cabinet filled more than one position, he got both salaries. And it is true that the patriotic Benjamin F. Butler at one time drew the salaries of three Cabinet officers.

So far from settling, in this case, a new precedent, my recollection is that the practice of the Government has been otherwise; and that where a man, not in the Army or Navy, but in civil employment, was required to do duties out of the line of those particularly prescribed, Congress has made compensation. They always give extra pay.

This is a case in which I feel an interest, on account of the condition of the family of a most worthy man, who sacrificed his life in the discharge of these very extra duties. Gentlemen seem unwilling now to make compensation for his extra employment. That family is deprived of its support by his sacrifice; and, in my judgment, it is a great wrong to withhold almost the price of his blood from his helpless wife and children.

Mr. MORGAN. I object, Mr. Chairman, to this amendment, unless a similar application, which I have in charge, be placed on the same ground. When this deficiency bill was up before, I applied for extra compensation for a gentleman who was placed at the head of the Census Department during the absence of Mr. Kennedy. I was told that the application must go before the Committee of Claims; that it was fair; but I must go there. This is precisely a similar case. If it were proper that my case should go before that committee, it is equally proper that this one should take the same course. If this amendment be adopted, I shall ask the same favor for the one to which I refer.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I would ask my colleague to withdraw his amendment.

Mr. BAYLY. With pleasure, sir.

Mr. SMITH. I move, in good faith, to increase the appropriation $500.

Mr. Chairman, Robert Greenhow, it is perhaps known to many gentlemen of this House, was for many years translator to the State Department in the city of Washington. While here, he established a character for fidelity, diligence, and true-heartedness in the performance of all his duties, that has given him a high place in the memories of those who knew him. While thus situated he formed an attachment—and I think myself that every man who neglects to form such an attachment is a just subject of censure—he attached himself to a lady who is as lovely as a houri, and the result of that connection was a cluster of little ones growing up in loveliness around him. Thus circumstanced, he soon found that the salary which he received from the Government would not furnish means for the education and establishment of his children in the society in which they had been born, and in which they might expect to move. He therefore voluntarily resigned his place in the State Department. He cut himself loose from the strong ties of official position. He did this under a sense of duty to his family, and made his way to the golden land of California for the purpose of amassing his "pile." On his way thither he spent some months in the city of Mexico, where he devoted himself studiously to the acquisition of a knowledge of the Spanish laws and titles in California, with his wife, who had followed him in his peregrinations, by his side. He then settled down in California with that wife who had abandoned her home for the purpose of cheering and comforting him in his labors. He there engaged in the duties of his profession as a lawyer, and ultimately became assistant law agent to this commission.

Now, here let me say, by way of argument, that the very fact that an assistant was considered necessary, is evidence that the duties of the office were more than one man could perform. Well, the principal having resigned, the assistant was called upon to perform the duties. What duties? I ask the honorable gentleman from Missouri [Mr. PHELPS] what duties? He was not only called upon to perform his own duties as assistant, but the duties of his principal. The law provided for two officers, thereby recognizing the necessity of two officers to perform those duties. He undertook to perform the duties of both; and every man who knew Robert Greenhow and the labors of that commission, knows that he performed them well. The principal had resigned, cleared out, and thrown all the labor on a man who knew nothing but his duty, and dedicated his time and constitution to the service. He was never paid. He died there in the discharge of those double duties, and in the employment of the Government, with his family here. The committee will excuse me for mentioning, that the very day before the sad intelligence of his death reached this city, his wife was manifesting a deep anxiety in the success of this very claim and in its speedy passage, in order that she might join her husband in California. The very day after, the news came upon her like a clap of thunder, that the husband with whom she so deeply sympathized was no more. The question for the committee now to decide is, whether the man who performed double duty, under circumstances that address themselves so strongly to our sense of justice and sympathy, shall be paid? I do not hesitate to say that we ought to pay to the last farthing. Five thousand dollars is nothing but the salary he would be entitled to for a year, and he performed the duties for fourteen months. If you pay at all, why not pay for the fourteen months?

Mr. HOUSTON. I have not much to say about this amendment, further than to express my opinion in relation to the practice, as stated by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. BAYLY,] who first addressed the committee. I do not think that this case is one that comes within the rule, or within the practice even, as stated by the gentleman himself. I know it has been the case, where a head of the bureau has been called away, or has been absent from his post, that the officer next below him, who discharged his duties, has received, under certain circumstances, the salary of the higher officer. But the duties in such a case are of a different character. The duties of a chief clerk are not the same duties that are performed by the head of a bureau. If the head of a bureau should be absent, the chief clerk would perform his duties; but they would be of a different character from those which he had been in the habit of performing. The chief clerk would not draw his own salary and also that of the head of the bureau.

The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BAYLY] stated that Mr. Butler at one time drew the salaries of three Cabinet officers. I think he is mistaken. I do not believe the gentleman can show a solitary case upon record where any Secretary has drawn a dime above his salary for double service. I know there are cases where a chief clerk has drawn the salary of the head of a bureau for performing the duties appropriate to that place; but he did not, at the same time, draw the salary of his own office. There is a case now before Congress precisely in point—that of Mr. Dickinson. He was at one time chief clerk in the State Department, and performed the duties of Secretary of State in the absence of that officer. A bill is now before the House, or Committee of Claims, providing for the difference between his salary as chief clerk and that of Secretary of State. I cannot of course assert positively that the gentleman from Virginia is mistaken in the position he has assumed, but he has not shown a case where a Secretary, although he may have performed the duties of two Departments, drew the salary attached to both.

I listened to the appeal of my friend from Virginia [Mr. SMITH] with a great deal of interest. I have no doubt that the eulogy he pronounced upon Mr. Greenhow and his family was just and well deserved. But then, if we make an appropriation for every man who has left a lovely wife and children, and for every widow who has children to support, we shall be entering upon a course of very loose legislation, which, for one, I do not desire to see introduced here. If my friend from Virginia is disposed to legislate in this way, I have no objection; but, for myself, I cannot consent to it. I am perfectly willing, whenever a case is presented where there is any semblance of propriety in making an appropriation, to listen to these appeals to my sympathies, and they would have their influence when sustained by law and the facts of the case. In the case under consideration, Mr. Greenhow was the assistant law agent, and in the absence of the principal, he performed the duties of the law agent—

Mr. BOCOCK took the floor.

Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia. I hope my colleague will yield me the floor for a moment, to offer an amendment.

Mr. BOCOCK. Certainly, sir.

Mr. BAYLY. Then I move to reduce the appropriation to $499.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Will the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BAYLY] allow me to ask the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOUSTON] a question?

Mr. BAYLY. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH, (to Mr. HOUSTON.) Is not the clerk to the Committee of Ways and Means a clerk in the State Department, and is he not drawing salary for both offices?

Mr. HOUSTON. The clerk to the Committee of Ways and Means is a clerk in the First Comptroller's office, and my understanding is that he has a substitute there aiding in the performance of his duties in that office. The duties which he performs for the Committee of Ways and Means are very generally transacted out of office hours, both at night and in the morning, while others are asleep.

Mr. BAYLY. The gentleman from Alabama says that I am mistaken in the case which I put.

Mr. HOUSTON. Well, I think so.

Mr. BAYLY. I think this committee will do me the justice to say that I am not much in the habit of making statements in this House loosely, and without some knowledge of the facts. I do know the fact that I have stated; and if the gentleman thinks that instances of the kind cannot be found, I will refer him to his industrious clerk, and he will hunt him up plenty of cases. Or, if the gentleman will take the trouble himself, he will find that there are plenty of cases, which I could specify; but I do not choose to be invidious in that respect. But as to the other case I refer to, which is more immediately in point, where the Comptroller and Treasurer were required to countersign Treasury warrants, and where they were allowed extra compensation for it, I stated that here without a possibility of being in error. I cannot be mistaken in this, because I defended the thing on this floor, standing just where Mr. LATHAM is now.

Here, Mr. Chairman, is a man who has done the duties of two offices. Well, this is not the ordinary case where a man discharges the duty of an officer who is absent, and where he draws the difference between that officer's salary and his own. But, as my colleague [Mr. SMITH] says, the Government paid for the service of but one officer, and that officer did the duties of two officers. It cannot be possible that where Congress has decided that two officers are necessary, and where one, by over-diligence, does the duty of both, that he should not have the proper compensation for his labor. I do not mean to say that it is strictly a legal claim; but I say that it is one which ought to be allowed and granted—under the precise circumstances in which this man died—broken down by these extra labors. Even supposing he was performing them in the line of his duty, as my friend from Alabama [Mr. HOUSTON] maintains he was, if he had been in the Army or Navy his widow would have been entitled to a pension. I say, that under circumstances of this sort, we are not, as we are asked, to put the case under the iron rule of the pound of flesh, because it is nominated in the bond. I will not legislate on this plan.

Mr. BOCOCK. I propose to ask my colleague [Mr. BAYLY] for the proper understanding of the question. Would not the Government allow $10,000 for the discharge of these duties? Were they not all discharged by one man? And is there any case where Government allows a particular amount for discharging a particular species of duties, that such amount is not paid?

Mr. BAYLY. I believe not.

Mr. McDUGALL. Mr. Chairman—

Mr. HOUSTON, (interrupting.) I want a minute to reply to the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. BOCOCK.] The gentleman asks his colleague whether Government did not allow $10,000 for this service; and if there is any case where Government allows a certain specified amount to be paid for a particular species of work, that this sum is not all paid up? I did not hear what his colleague's answer was.

Mr. BAYLY. It was, that I believed not.

Mr. HOUSTON. It may be that I am mistaken in this thing; but if I am, the law is most wretchedly and improperly administered. I say there are cases, and thousands of cases, where money is appropriated to pay for services, and in which the offices become vacant, and there is no expenditure of the money.

Mr. BOCOCK. That was because the services were not performed.

Mr. HOUSTON. The officer who discharged the services for which this appropriation is asked, was employed to perform this kind of service, and he could do no more than what would entitle him to his salary of $5,000 a year, unless he did it out of ordinary business hours, and under extraordinary circumstances, which show that he devoted a portion of his own time to its accomplishment:

for that is not expected from an officer of the Government.

Mr. LATHAM. That is just what he did do in this case. He worked out of office hours, before breakfast, and at late hours of the night.

Mr. HOUSTON. Then the gentleman from California should be obliged to me for touching upon this subject; for this is the first time that such a circumstance has been mentioned during this debate; and it is the only point which gives to this case any claim upon the Congress of the United States.

Now, the idea of appropriating $10,000 to two officers—$5,000 apiece—and because one of them resigns, or does not discharge his duties, giving the whole of it to one, is most extraordinary. Suppose that a clerkship should become vacant in one of the bureaus of a Department of the Government, or that half a dozen clerks should resign, according to the doctrine here contended for, the remaining clerks should draw the salaries of those whose offices are vacant—

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia, (interrupting.) There is, in this very bill, an appropriation of $6,000 recommended by the committee for the purpose of paying clerks who have performed duties beyond their regular services. It is in these words:

To pay clerks for services performed on Chickasaw Indian business, in pursuance of the regulations of the President of the United States, and in conformity with the decision of the late Secretary of the Interior, $6,187 50.

Mr. HOUSTON. That is true; but there the services were rendered out of office hours; and such was the proof before the House and before the committee. And another thing, the sum of $250, which was to be paid to each of the clerks employed in that business, was fixed by law, and the clerks, under that agreement, ought to have been paid long ago. But that case does not affect the matter now under consideration.

I did not expect, Mr. Chairman, to take part in this discussion, but I believed that my friend from Virginia [Mr. BAYLY] had committed an error in his statement. He says to the committee that he is not in the habit of doing so. I did not charge him with habitually committing errors. I have not said that his statements are not correct. I simply said—for I have not had time to examine them—that I did not think they were correct.

Mr. BAYLY. Permit me to say to the gentleman, that I know I am not mistaken.

Mr. HOUSTON. Will the gentleman cite a single case, and I will look into it?

Mr. BAYLY. I will refer the gentleman to the case of Judge Mason.

The question then recurring upon the amendment of Mr. BAYLY, he withdrew it?

Mr. McDUGALL. I move an amendment, to take the place of the amendment which I offered some time since. It is to insert between the word "to" and the word "Robert" the words, "the legal representatives of," so that it shall read:

And that $5,000 of said sum be paid to the legal representatives of Robert Greenhow, &c.

I wish to say, in reply to the remark, that, as a matter of strict right and law, a party who performs the duties of two offices is not entitled to be compensated for both, that directly the contrary is true, and that it was so held by Judge Taney, in the circuit court of Maryland. Chief Justice Taney, in the case of the United States vs. White, decided that where an officer of the Government performed two duties, the salaries of which were fixed by law, he was entitled to the compensation of both.

Mr. BARRY. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that if the precedents which the gentleman states are all correct, it is no reason for the adoption of this amendment. Because Congress has done wrong once in allowing double pay, is no reason why it should do the same wrong again. It has been said that this man performed double duties, and that has been assigned as a reason for allowing him a double compensation. Now, sir, the salary under which he was appointed was amply sufficient to compensate him for employing all his time in the service of the Government. There are many men as competent as he who would be glad of the appointment, with all the duties which he has performed, at the salary which, under law, he is to receive.

Gentlemen talk about precedents for receiving double pay for performing the duties of two offices. Why, sir, is it not for the same thing that we hear so much complaint in this House in reference to those who superintend the construction of the wings of our Capitol? Is not the complaint being continually made, that men who are receiving regular pay as Army officers, are allowed to be employed in the construction of civil works, and receive the compensation of civil officers in addition? It has been urged that it is wrong that the practice should be allowed; and I think it is wrong; but I think this case is included in the same category.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Mr. Greenhow was a lawyer.

Mr. BARRY. That makes the case all the stronger.

Mr. SMITH. The military officers to whom you refer do not perform the duties of both the offices for which they receive compensation.

Mr. BARRY. That does not necessarily follow. An officer may be stationed at a garrison with all the duties of a military officer to perform. He may, nevertheless, accept the office of superintending the construction of some building or work, and attend to his duties as such, and then at night repair to the garrison, drill his men, and go through all the duties required of him as a military officer. He may perform faithfully the duties of both offices, and yet, because he receives the pay of the two offices, we hear all this complaint. I do not understand that this assistant law agent was appointed because there was a sufficient amount of business to employ two officers. But it was necessary, in order that the business should progress, that one should always be present, and to provide against any accident, two were appointed. This is my understanding of the reason of this appointment, and not with the understanding that one should receive the pay of both when only one was present.

Mr. McDUGALL. I will state to the gentleman, that the assistant law agent was appointed because the duties of the office were too onerous to be performed by one person.

Mr. BARRY. I take it for granted that they could be performed by one person, because they have been discharged properly, as I understand, by Mr. Greenhow. I understand that he has discharged those duties well, and that justice has been done to the Government in every respect. The gentleman says that Mr. Greenhow died while there. Well, sir, there have been many persons who have gone to California to seek for gold and have found a grave. But because he went to California, and died there, you propose to grant a pension. Sir, if you undertake to grant pensions for all who have gone there, and have there found their graves, I will venture to say you will find your pension list full to overflowing, involving an expense beyond anything you have yet provided for.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I desire to refer the gentleman to the office of the Attorney General, for instance. He receives a salary from the Government, and yet does private business as a lawyer.

Mr. BARRY. I take it for granted that he does not devote time to private business which a proper attention to public business requires. In this case the agent is appointed to discharge the duties of his office. He is paid for discharging those duties, whatever they may be; and if they require him to devote his whole time, he has nothing to complain of.

The question was taken upon Mr. McDUGALL's amendment; and it was rejected.

Mr. HAVEN. I do not wish to propose an amendment, if the committee will permit me to have a section of the law read.

Several MEMBERS. Read it.

Mr. HAVEN. There is one section on page 370, vol. 9, of the United States Statutes, which is as follows:

"That no clerk or other officer shall receive the salary of any Secretary or head of bureau for acting or having acted in his place or office, while said Secretary or head of bureau receives such salary."

Then there is another proviso to a section on page 542 of the same volume, which is as follows:

"Provided, however, That hereafter the proper accounting officers of the Treasury, or other officers of the United States, shall in no case allow to one individual the salaries of two different officers on account of having performed the duties thereof at the same time. But this prohibition shall not extend to the Executive buildings."

I do not desire to make any remarks upon the subject; but as so much has been said in relation to officers receiving double pay for performing the duties of two offices, I have read these sections of the law for the purpose of settling some of these matters.

The question was taken on Mr. LATHAM's amendment; and it was decided in the affirmative.

The question was then put on the Senate amendment, as amended.

Mr. MEACHAM. I demand a division.

Mr. PHELPS. I would appeal to the gentleman to withdraw his call for a division; for if it be persisted in, it may break up the committee. When we get to the House we can have the question fully decided, and by the yeas and nays, if gentlemen desire.

[Cries of "Division!"]

Mr. MEACHAM. I desire to see the question settled.

The question was again put; and there were—ayes forty-two—

Mr. ORR. I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. TAYLOR, of Tennessee, and PECKHAM were appointed.

The question was then taken; and the tellers reported—ayes 48, noes 42; no quorum voting.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will call the roll.

The roll was accordingly called, and one hundred and thirty-four members answered to their names.

The committee then rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the Chairman reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had the Union generally under consideration, and particularly the deficiency bill and the amendments of the Senate thereto, and finding itself without a quorum, had caused the roll to be called, and the names of the absentees to be noted, and had directed him to report the same to the House.

A quorum being now present, the committee resumed its session.

The CHAIRMAN. When the committee found itself without a quorum, we were dividing upon the amendment of the Senate, as amended; upon which tellers had been ordered.

The tellers resumed their places; and the question being again put, the reported—ayes forty, noes not counted.

The CHAIRMAN. A majority of a quorum not voting, the amendment is rejected.

The forty-second amendment of the Senate was then read, as follows:

And the marshals of the northern and southern districts of California shall have the same mileage and compensation for serving processes issuing from said commission as are allowed to the sheriffs for serving similar processes by the higher courts of California; and the same mileage and per diem shall be made to witnesses as are allowed to witnesses by the State of California.

Mr. WALSH. I move that the committee rise.

Mr. PHELPS. I hope the gentleman from New York will withdraw that motion.

Mr. WALSH. I will not withdraw the motion. There has evidently been a drumming up here to get members enough to make a quorum on the last vote. There are provisions in the bill which ought not to pass without a full vote.

The question was then taken; and a division being had, there were—ayes 37, noes 64; no quorum voting.

Mr. HAMILTON. I ask that the roll be called.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Pennsylvania. I call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky. Does it require a quorum to rise?

The CHAIRMAN. It is not necessary to have a quorum to rise, but there must be a majority of a quorum to rise.

Messrs. WHEELER and ROBBINS were appointed tellers.

The question was taken, and the tellers reported—ayes 34, noes 67.

After the tellers had reported, several other votes were given on both sides, about which there was some disagreement.

Mr. WHEELER. Call the roll.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Ohio. I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, I think it is better to have a recount.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the tellers will take the count again.

Mr. WALSH. I object.

Mr. WHEELER. The tellers have already reported once.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee have a right to have a recount.

The tellers resumed their places; and the question being again put, the tellers reported—ayes 36, noes 70; no quorum voting.

[Cries of "Call the roll!" "Call the roll!"]

Mr. WRIGHT. I move that the committee do now rise.

The CHAIRMAN. That motion cannot be made, as the committee has found itself without a quorum.

Mr. EDMANDS. I would like to inquire of the Chair, whether a quorum is necessary to enable the committee to rise?

The CHAIRMAN. A quorum is not necessary for that purpose, but a majority of those present is necessary. The rules are imperative that the committee, finding itself without a quorum, shall cause the roll to be called.

Mr. FLORENCE. Will it be in order to move that the committee take a recess?

The CHAIRMAN. No motion is in order.

Mr. PECKHAM. The committee can rise by unanimous consent.

[Cries of "Call the roll!"]

The roll was then called, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the Chairman of the committee [Mr. CHANDLER] reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had the Union generally under consideration, and especially the Senate amendments to the deficiency bill, and finding itself without a quorum, had ordered the roll of the committee to be called, and had directed him to report the facts to the House, together with the names of the absentees.

The following are the names of the absentees:

Messrs. Aiken, James C. Allen, Willis Allen, Appleton, Ashe, Ball, Barksdale, Bennett, Benson, Benton, Bissell, Bliss, Cocke, Bridges, Brooks, Bugg, Campbell, Carpenter, Caskey, Chamberlain, Chase, Chrisman, Churchwell, Clark, Clingman, Colquitt, Cook, Corwin, Cox, Craige, Crocker, Cullom, Curtis, John G. Davis, Dent, De Witt, Dick, Dickinson, Disney, Dowdell, Dunham, Eastman, John M. Elliott, English, Ewing, Faulkner, Fenton, Franklin, Goode, Greenwood, Grey, Grow, Andrew J. Harlan, Wiley P. Harris, Hendricks, Hiester, Hillyer, Howe, Hunt, Ingersoll, Kelitt, Kerr, Kittredge, Lamb, Lane, Lindley, Macdonald, McMullin, McNair, McQueen, Mace, Mackey, May, Mayall, Murray, Noble, Andrew Oliver, Parker, Phillips, Preston, Ready, Reese, Richardson, Thos. Ritchey, Seward, Shannon, Simmons, Gerrit Smith, Solers, Alexander H. Stephens, Restor L. Stevens, Tweed, Warren, Israel Washburn, John Wentworth, Westbrook, Daniel B. Wright, and Yates.

The SPEAKER. One hundred and thirty-three members (more than a quorum) having answered to their names, the Chairman will resume the chair.

The committee accordingly resumed its session.

Mr. WHEELER. I move that the committee do now rise.

The CHAIRMAN. That was the last motion made in committee before it rose.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. And a majority voted against it.

Mr. PHELPS. I believe the question is upon the forty-second amendment. I have but a word more to say in explanation of it. In the first place, this amendment should have no place in an appropriation bill. It provides that the marshals of the northern and southern districts of California shall have the same mileage and compensation for serving processes issued from the commission for adjudicating land claims as are allowed to the sheriffs for serving similar processes issued from the higher courts of California, and that the same mileage and per diem shall be made to witnesses as are allowed to witnesses by the State of California. Such a provision should have no place in an appropriation bill, and the Committee of Ways and Means accordingly recommend a non-concurrence therein.

Several MEMBERS. We will vote it down without any further explanation.

Mr. PHELPS. Very well; then I will say nothing more.

Mr. LETCHER. I shall vote against this amendment, for the reason that I want a general law passed upon the subject which will reach other cases as well as this. The last Congress passed a law regulating the fees of the district attorneys and marshals, and other officers in the Federal courts, and they have regulated them in such a way that every marshal in my State who has to go one hundred and fifty miles away from home cannot defray his expenses from his fees. Now, sir, I want a general law passed that will reach other cases besides this one. I do not want special legislation which will provide for the wants of California, or that will provide for the wants of Michigan, and not for those of the other States. Let a general law be passed, by which all these officers shall receive a reasonable compensation for their services.

Mr. McDUGALL. I desire to say a word.

The CHAIRMAN. No further discussion is in order, unless the gentleman offers an amendment.

Mr. McDUGALL. Is it not in order to show why the Senate amendment should be concurred in?

The CHAIRMAN. It is not, unless the gentleman offers an amendment.

Mr. McDUGALL. I move, then, to strike out the last word in the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, before the vote is taken, I desire to state one or two facts to the committee. We have a commission in California for the purpose of settling land claims in that State. The witnesses upon the part of the claimants are brought there by the interest of the claimants themselves; but the Government have an important duty to perform, in resisting unfounded and fraudulent claims. Witnesses, in many instances, must be brought from the extreme portions of the State. Now, under the present law, the fees of the marshals will not pay their traveling expenses.

Mr. LETCHER. Then let a general law be passed raising the fees of other marshals as well as yours.

Mr. McDUGALL. Why, sir, this commission is to last only until the 3d of March next; and if the officers of the Federal Government, whose duty it is to protect the interest of the Federal Government, are to perform that duty, you must furnish them with the necessary means. Now, sir, it is impossible to defend the Government against these claimants; they must have witnesses brought, and you must pay your marshals a compensation that will enable them to bring such witnesses as may be required. Now, sir, this is a subject which requires immediate attention. It will not do to wait the slow process of passing a general law. I said this commission is to expire in March next, and unless some provision is passed very soon, it will be too late. It will not do to wait until next winter for the passage of such a law. The Government have important interests to protect in preventing its lands from being taken by those who have no legitimate claim upon them. It is important that such measures should be taken as will prevent the Government from being robbed of its lands; and I hope this amendment will be concurred in.

Mr. LETCHER. If I understand correctly, the Federal officers in the State of California, for serving the process of this commission, get what the officers get for serving the process of the courts.

Mr. PHELPS. Double the amount.

Mr. LETCHER. It is, then, that much worse than I thought it was.

The question was taken; and the amendment of the Senate was non-concurred in.

The forty-third amendment of the Senate was next read by the Clerk, as follows:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to examine the claims presented by certain counties of the late Territory of Iowa for expenses of the United States district court which were paid by said counties prior to the admission of said Territory into the Union as a State; and if, upon such examination, he is satisfied that, prior to said time, the said counties have paid money which, in accordance with the instructions of the First Comptroller of the Treasury, dated December 19, 1843, should have been paid by the marshal of the United States for said Territory, he is directed to audit and allow the same.

Mr. PHELPS. The Committee of Ways and Means propose the following as a substitute for that amendment:

That the First Comptroller of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to examine the claims presented by certain counties of the late Territory of Iowa for expenses of the United States district court, which were paid by said counties prior to the admission of said Territory into the Union as a State; and if, upon such examination, he is satisfied that prior to said time the said counties have paid money which, in accordance with the instructions of the First Comptroller of the Treasury, dated 19th of December, 1843, as construed in the report of said First Comptroller to the Secretary of the Interior under date of 13th of October, 1853, in reference to said subject, should have been paid by the marshal of the United States for said Territory, he is directed to audit and settle the same.

The question was taken; and the substitute was adopted.

The amendment of the Senate, as amended, was then agreed to.

Mr. WHEELER. I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. PHELPS. I would beg of the gentleman to withdraw his motion for a short time.

Mr. WHEELER. There does not seem to be any hurry about the public business. It was postponed lately for a week and better. I insist on my motion, and demand tellers on it.

Tellers were not ordered.

The question was then taken on Mr. WHEELER's motion; and, on a division, there were—ayes 34, noes 58; no quorum voting.

[Cries of "Call the roll!"]

The roll was called, and one hundred and seventeen members answered to their names, being less than a quorum.

The committee then rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the Chairman (Mr. CHANDLER) reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had the Union generally under consideration, and particularly the deficiency bill and the amendments of the Senate thereto, and finding itself without a quorum, had caused the roll to be called, and the names of the absentees to be noted, and had directed him to report the same to the House.

Mr. LETCHER. As there is no quorum here, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and thereupon (at twenty minutes before four o'clock, p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow at twelve o'clock, p. m.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, May 24, 1854.

Prayer by Rev. WILLIAM H. MILBURN.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Mr. SEWARD presented a petition of inhabitants of Jamestown, New York, and a petition of citizens of Wellsville, New York, praying a reduction in the rates of ocean postage; which were referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Also, three petitions of citizens of Niagara county, New York, and a petition of citizens of East Saginaw, Michigan, praying for the construction of a ship canal around the Falls of Niagara; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Also, the following petitions, &c., against the passage of the bill for organizing the Territories of Nebraska and Kansas; which were ordered to lie on the table:

Petition of citizens of Brandon, Vermont;

Petition of ministers of the Gospel of New York, Massachusetts, and Vermont;

Petition of Stephen T. Wheeler, of Columbia county, New York;

Petition of clergymen of different denominations in the State of Michigan;

Two petitions of citizens of Pennsylvania; and Petition of citizens of Livingston county, Michigan.

REPORT FROM A STANDING COMMITTEE.

Mr. SEBASTIAN, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred a resolution of the Senate, directing that committee to inquire into the case of David Carter and Nancy Thornton, and, also, documents relating thereto, submitted a report on the subject; which was ordered to be printed.

AFRICANIZATION OF CUBA.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I desire to present resolutions of the Legislature of the State of Louisiana, which I ask may be read.

The resolutions were read. They declare that the Legislature of Louisiana view with regret and alarm the policy recently inaugurated by the Spanish Government in the Island of Cuba, the manifest object and effect of which must be the abolition of slavery in that colony, to the sacrifice of the white race, with its arts, commerce, and civilization, to a barbarous and inferior race; and also that the consummation of this policy will exercise a most pernicious influence upon the social, commercial, and political interests and institutions of the United States; and that the time has arrived when the Federal Government should adopt most decisive and energetic measures to thwart and defeat a policy conceived in hatred to this Republic, and calculated to retard its progress and prosperity.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I move that these resolutions be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, who have now this subject under consideration, and that they be printed. I do not desire to say a single word by way of discussion on this subject, nor to call upon me the reproach of the present occupant of the chair, [Mr. WHEELER,] for bringing forward any matter of this kind at an improper moment before the Senate. I wish, however, to state that I agree with every word of these resolutions, both as regards their statement of the policy of this Government, and as to the facts which are now taking place in the Island of Cuba, and to express my regret that a gentleman so distinguished as the Senator from Delaware [Mr. CLAYTON] should call in question, as he did the day before yesterday, without better grounds to question than he could have had, the facts placed before the Senate and the country by my colleague, [Mr. SLIDELL.] I believe that the facts as stated by my colleague can be thoroughly substantiated. I am in possession of further facts and further evidence, which it is my intention to lay before the Senate, as soon as the Committee on Foreign Relations shall have made their report. With this simple statement I move the reference.

Mr. CLAYTON. I did not hear the first part of the honorable Senator's remarks; but I understand him now to say that he will be prepared, on some future occasion, to show us that the Spanish Government has a deliberate design to emancipate the slaves in Cuba, for the purpose of preventing us from either purchasing or taking the island by violence. Do I rightly understand the honorable Senator to mean so?

Mr. BENJAMIN. I do not pretend to say that I shall be able to make a mathematical demonstration of a proposition of that kind; but I think I shall be able to adduce such facts and such evidence as will satisfy every unprejudiced mind, so far as it can be satisfied on a political subject of this kind, that such is the intention of that Government.

Mr. CLAYTON. That it is their intention to emancipate those slaves now, at this time?

Mr. BENJAMIN. At the earliest possible moment, and now that the measures which have been taken are aimed at that very object, or, in other words, that the design is now in progress of execution.

Mr. CLAYTON. Then I understand the honorable Senator to say that it is now actually in progress of execution. Now, sir, I wish to say that I shall be most happy to be instructed on this subject; but I must express, at the same time, my perfect conviction that the honorable Senator will never be able to make out the facts he has stated. I have no belief in them whatever; and the more I look into the matter, the more I inquire in regard to it, the more perfectly am I satisfied that it is not true that the Spanish Government intends to destroy this island, except in this con-tendency: They will act precisely as you, sir, would act, or any other man might act, without being censured so much, who should find that a piratical vessel was about to seize his ship and crew. You might blow up your powder magazine in such a case as that, without incurring the censure of the world. That is all, in my opinion, which the Spanish Government contemplates. If they find that, from any quarter of this Union, there is a piratical expedition set on foot, with a view to take the island from them, and that there is a certainty that the island will be taken from their possession and custody by that means, they will blow up their powder magazine.

The Spanish Government has given us notice of that for many years back. It has never been concealed by them. They have declared over and over again, more than ten years ago, to the various gentlemen who occupied stations at the head of the State Department, that if such a thing as that should be done they would ruin the island, rather than permit us to take it in that manner. Now, then, let the honorable Senator understand just precisely the difference between us. If he brings proof forward for the purpose of showing that, he only brings forward proof to show what I concede; but I deny, from the evidence before me, that the honorable Senator can produce any proof whatever to show that the Spanish Government, in the present condition of affairs, intends to emancipate the slaves in Cuba, or, to use the honorable Senator's own language, that such a scheme as that is in progress of execution.

Mr. GWIN. Mr. President, I did not hear the remarks of the honorable Senator from Louisiana, but if I understand them as commented on by the Senator from Delaware, he made a statement that the Spanish Government has it in contemplation to set free the negroes in Cuba in the event of an invasion of that island, or an insurrection on the island.

Mr. CLAYTON. No, sir; that was not his statement.

Mr. GWIN. If it is denied that it is in contemplation by the Spanish Government to set the negroes there free, in the event of an insurrection, I undertake to say that it can be readily established.

Mr. CLAYTON. The honorable Senator will please not to understand me as denying any such thing as that. I have not said that, in the event of an insurrection in the island, an insurrection which should take the government of the country out of the hands of Spain, her civil authorities in the island might not proceed to this extremity. I have not denied that; I have not said that would not be done. What I have said is, that the position taken by the honorable Senator from Louisiana, in my humble judgment, cannot be substantiated, and that position is, that there is, at this time, in progress of execution, a scheme to emancipate the slaves in Cuba.

Mr. GWIN. For several years back, on my way to take my seat in the Senate, I have stopped in Havana, and I was distinctly informed, and papers were shown to me in which the threat was held out to the inhabitants of that island by the authorities, that if they did attempt an insurrection, the negroes would be turned loose upon them. This has been known to be the policy of that Government, and it has deterred the inhabitants of the island from resisting the oppression under which they have been groaning for years. They have been deterred by the apprehension that their negroes would be turned loose upon them, and armed for the purpose of a servile insurrection, in the event of a revolution in the island. I have not a solitary doubt that there is, and has been for years, a power reposed in the authorities there, by Spain, to free every negro on the island, and arm them in case of a revolution.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I said before that I do not wish to enter into the discussion of this subject, and I am very loth to be drawn into saying anything on a matter which I consider now to be properly before the Committee on Foreign Relations of this body. But I am surprised, sir, in view of the recent developments, in view of the information which has just reached us from Cuba, that a gentleman of the experience of the Senator from Delaware can say he unhesitatingly expresses his disbelief in the assertions which have been repeatedly made by different Senators upon this floor.

Now, sir, those of us who are aware of the system by which the Island of Cuba is now governed—those of us who are aware of the fact, that there is not a single inhabitant of that island who is allowed to have a pointed knife in his family—those of us who are aware of the system of espionage which now prevails in the island—those of us who are aware of the threats that have been repeatedly made by the Captain General of the island, that at the first indication of an attempt on the part of the people to recover their freedom, their own slaves shall be armed against them—and those of us who have followed up these indications and these facts, and who are aware of the system, by which the registry of slaves upon the island is conducted, and who have looked at the late proclamation of the Captain General in relation to the registry, who can see the fact that that proclamation will produce a change in the status of the black population of that island, can by no possibility entertain a doubt of the scheme which has been deliberately formed, and which, I repeat, is now in progress of execution upon the island.

Sir, we all know, or at least those of us who have paid any attention to that subject know, that for a long series of years past, by reason of the very heavy duties which have been imposed upon the transfer of slaves from one proprietor to another, these slaves have passed from hand to hand by parol. The money has been given, and the slave thus passed to a new owner. According to a recent proclamation, every slave in the possession of an individual who cannot show a registered title to him, is to be made free now upon the spot. If I am not misinformed, nearly one fourth of those who are really slaves upon the island will be made free, under the operation of this proclamation. There, sir, is the very first step towards what the Legislature of Louisiana has termed the Africanization of the Island of Cuba. This is the last piece of information that has come to us from that island.

In addition to this, we have the statements made by the honorable Senator himself the other morning, in which he assured us that for a series of years past the black population of the island has been increasing in a rapid ratio. Now, every one of these slaves in fact—not, I believe, slaves legally, according to the institutions and laws of Cuba, but slaves now in fact—are to be set free. All those who are actually slaves, but who have been passed from hand to hand, without the formality of a notarial seal, will also be set free under this proclamation in relation to registration. These will form a body of black troops to assist the Spanish troops against the white population of the island.

My colleague, in the speech which he made a short time ago, that attracted so much attention in the country, demonstrated to the Senate that the intention of the British Government—and it has been fully shown in its correspondence and negotiations with the Spanish Government—is to induce the latter Government to consider the blacks and whites, upon the island, as one common population, to be taken care of, and protected by one common set of regulations applicable to both classes of the population.

I shall not go further into this subject now, sir; but I refer to these facts for the purpose of showing that this is not an idle apprehension, that it is not one without foundation; and when the discussion comes up I think we shall be able to show the Senator such facts and such proofs as will shake even his well-formed conviction to the contrary.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I rise to ask what is the pending question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. WELLER in the chair.) The question is on referring the resolutions which have been presented by the Senator from Louisiana to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. HUNTER. I hope the question will be taken without further debate. It will be much better to have the debate come up on the report of the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I rise to express the hope that this debate will not be continued. I do not think that the discussion at this time, under the circumstances, is calculated to lead to any valuable result.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. President, I said before, that I did not propose at this time to go extensively into the discussion of this subject; but I know that the remarks made from so distinguished a source as my honorable friend from Louisiana, will be calculated to make a deep impression upon the minds of the American people; and as I do verily believe that that impression will be erroneous, it is my duty to arrest it now. It is my duty, so far as I have light and knowledge, to explain the transactions to which the honorable Senator has referred, and which he thinks are conclusive evidence of a design now to emancipate the slaves in Cuba.

Sir, I do not stand here now—I have never stood here or anywhere—as the apologist for the oppressions or exactions of the Spanish Government, or its corruptions. I know as much, perhaps, on that subject as most gentlemen here; and whenever it shall become the interest of my country to expose them, I will do it fully. Sir, it is all important that the Senate of the United States should not be misled on this subject; but that, when we do strike, we should strike justly, that we should not misconceive either our own position or that of a foreign Government.

I say again that I deny that my honorable friend can show a tittle of evidence to justify the assertion that Spain intends now to emancipate the slaves in Cuba, and that such a scheme is in progress of execution. Now is the time that the true and just impression should go forth to the American people. Sir, there are those at the other end of the avenue whose duty it is to investigate this subject, and who will be under a fearful responsibility both to God and to their country, if they suffer a wrong opinion on this subject to go forth, and the minds of the American people to be poisoned with untruth in regard to it. I will do this with the honorable Senator, knowing nothing, of my own knowledge, of the opinions of the Secretary of State on this subject. I will risk the whole issue upon the opinion he will give the Senate of the United States or the country about it. If he will say to me, or to the Senate of the United States, that he believes this story, I will yield up my convictions. I do not believe that he credits the story at all, and I cannot think that the President and the Cabinet credit it. They are the proper persons to investigate the matter. They have time to do it. We here on this floor can make declarations which will inflame the public mind. The people, supposing that we understand the matter, will take our statements as correct, when perhaps we are not so thoroughly acquainted with the subject as those gentlemen at the other end of the avenue, whose duty it is to acquire light and give it to the people. I wish to wait for them. I wish the State Department to give up all its secrets upon this subject, and with that very view I moved, in the Committee on Foreign Relations, the resolution which my honorable friend, the chairman, [Mr. MASON,] introduced yesterday, and which was adopted, calling on the State Department for the information that will give us light on the subject.

With regard to the fact that slaves have increased within a few years past in the Island of Cuba, I explained the reason the day before yesterday, in a short speech to the Senate. I showed that our own countrymen were the men who had thus far Africanized Cuba, by building slavers and sending them and selling them at Havana, and navigating the vessels to the coast of Africa.

I think my honorable friend is mistaken in regard to the numbers. I have not yet learned of more than five thousand being imported there within the last sixteen months, though there may be, and probably there are many more. I have been apprised of the cases of the vessels, called the Jasper, the Silenas, the General de Kalb, and the Lady Suffolk, notorious piratical slavers. There are doubtless many others, but I cannot believe that anything like a hundred thousand, or one half, or one fourth of that number has been imported into Cuba. But here lies the mischief, towards which the attention of the American Senate ought to be drawn. If we are ever to have this island, and I have expressed the opinion and entertained it for many years back, that it will one day be ours, how I do not pretend to say, we are deeply interested in having this business of introducing negroes and free negroes from Africa stopped. The most effective way of stopping it, is by stopping the slave trade with our own vessels.

There is the place to strike. That is the spot at which I propose to strike; and desire Congress to strike.

But, sir, the negroes brought from Africa are detected by the very means to which my honorable friend has alluded—by the registries of the true slaves, the real native-born slaves, on every estate. The police officers visit the estate, and, by calling the roll, and examining the negroes, detect whether there are any recent importations. If so, they declare them free, and they are bound to declare them free, under the treaties which Spain has made with foreign Governments. Then I explained further, that they apprenticed these slaves for one year, merely for the purpose of enabling these miserable creatures to live. They are unable to procure their own subsistence. They are utterly ignorant. They cannot speak a word of any language in which they can be understood, and nobody can understand them. They know not how to labor, and they would starve if they were not apprenticed.

Well, for the purpose of preserving the existence of these wretched beings, the local authorities in Cuba have been compelled to apprentice them for a year. It is my opinion that, at this very moment, these negroes are felt to be a great evil by the Spanish authorities in Cuba, and they would gladly get rid of them, but they cannot. They would probably be very thankful to us if we would take them away.

But, sir, my honorable friend, in the indulgence of his imagination, tells us that he thinks these negroes will be enlisted, and form a black corps of soldiers for the purpose of preventing any attack made on the island, or any insurrection in the island. Now, sir, I would ask you, [Mr. WELLES in the chair,] who have been somewhat of a military man, and who have acquired some military knowledge, to tell me what sort of soldiers these would make? They are wild negroes from Africa, who have not been in the country a year. Would they not make a splendid regiment! I should like to know how you or anybody else would proceed to drill them, and make them stand up in a fight.

Sir, I lament, I lament deeply, that the impression has gone abroad, and from such distinguished sources, that this evil is in progress of execution. May we not wait until our own Government, until the President has spoken on the subject? I shall now close what I have to say to-day, with the repetition of the expression, that I am willing to yield up the whole subject if you will show me that the American Secretary of State, or any other man who ever was in that office, acting under the high responsibilities of that position, will say to the Senate and the world, that he believes this story of the emancipation of the slaves in Cuba.

Mr. SEWARD. Mr. President, when this subject was introduced to the Senate two or three weeks since, by the honorable Senator from Louisiana, [Mr. SLIDELL,] I thought a very general desire was manifested by all parties to have it referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations unembarrassed by discussion previous to its reference; though the consent given to the reference, without protest, would convey the idea that the Senate generally admitted there was grave cause for such an inquiry. But since that time other resolutions of inquiry have been introduced upon the subject, and led to more or less debate; and to-day the resolutions of the State of Louisiana have been presented to us. I certainly agree with the honorable Senator from Louisiana, [Mr. BENJAMIN,] that the most appropriate time to discuss the matter will be when the committee shall have made a report.

The discussion of this subject by those who entertain apprehensions for the peace of the country, going out from this place without opposition, except so far as it was made by the Senator from Delaware, is calculated to produce very serious effects. It produces alarm in mercantile circles, certainly premature and unnecessary now, even if it be not without sufficient cause. There is no necessity for Senators to give way to their imaginations, until the grounds for their fears have been exhibited by the Committee on Foreign Relations or the Executive authority.

For one, whenever a crisis in Cuba may come, I shall be prepared to meet it; but it is impossible for me to see that the circumstances alluded to by the honorable Senator from Louisiana form any ground for apprehending that a crisis is at hand. I do not now look merely at the facts relied upon by the Senator from Louisiana; but I look at the condition of Spain, at the condition of the United States, and of the European nations, and I see nothing to warrant any such apprehension. For ourselves, we have a claim unsettled against Spain; and we are expecting the answer of the Spanish Government to that claim. We are expecting the arrival of an officer prepared to treat on that subject and on all subjects whatever. Why should Spain, deriving $1,000,000 income from Cuba, desire to renounce it? Why should she bury in the ocean her colony in America, the last relic of the New World given to her by Columbus? Her exigencies are as great now as in former times. Then, it is supposed that the British Government is concerned in this movement. Sir, I entertain no doubt that it may be safely said that if Great Britain occupies any position in regard to this question now, it is a position which inclines her to prevent the extremities which are dreaded by the honorable Senators from Louisiana. Engaged in a war which is almost certain to become a continental war in Europe, which is to be a short war only in the case that Austria and Prussia shall join their standards to those of Great Britain and France, and which is to be an interminable war, a ruinous and disastrous war, in the other event, it seems to me that Great Britain is now under bonds to keep the peace with our Government on this question. I see no reason, therefore, to impair the confidence of the commercial part of the community, and spread over them the dread of evils which may never come.

I hope, then, that this question may rest in tranquillity for the present. It strikes me that it is calculated to produce apprehensions in this country in relation to our claims on Spain, on Europe, and on the nations of the world; for we know, and the world knows, that this is regarded by some as the favored time to strike at the interests of Spain in Cuba, and at the interests of Great Britain.

If this question is one of the rising of the inhabitants of Cuba to assert their liberty, that is one thing. I shall desire to know from the Committee on Foreign Relations, when they do report on this subject, on what ground, and to what extent they propose to intervene. If they propose to exert the influence of this country, as it has heretofore been exerted, in favor of efforts for constitutional freedom, that will be one question; but if they propose to control, interfere with, or direct, or supervise, the local matters of Cuba, then, for one, I am decidedly against any such intervention. I have no doubt that the general popular sentiment, and any action that may be adopted on this subject, will turn upon the question whether what is proposed is a simple and moral influence felt, and necessary and justly excited in favor of freedom, or an attempted regulation and control of the Government of Spain in Cuba, in its lawful exercise of a right to meliorate the condition of its people.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I move to postpone all prior orders.

Mr. MASON. Let the resolutions be referred. The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. WELLES in the chair.) If there be no objection the resolutions will be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

There was no objection.

NEBRASKA AND KANSAS.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I move to postpone all prior orders for the purpose of having the Nebraska and Kansas bill read a second time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will now have its second reading.

It was accordingly read a second time by its title: "A bill to organize the Territories of Nebraska and Kansas."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is now under consideration as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I have no desire to engage in any debate upon the bill. It is sufficient to state that it is precisely the bill which passed the Senate some time ago, with the exception of the amendment adopted upon the motion of the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. CLAYTON.] It being the Senate bill, with that isolated exception, it presents no new issue, no new question, and I therefore ask that the Senate may proceed to vote upon it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no proposition to amend, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

Mr. PEARCE. I desire to renew the amendment which was offered by my friend from Delaware, when the Senate bill was under our consideration. It is to amend the proviso which is in the fifth section, as follows:

Provided, That the right of suffrage and of holding office shall be exercised only by citizens of the United States, and those who have declared on oath their intention to become such, and shall have taken an oath to support the Constitution of the United States, and the provisions of this act."

—By striking out the words:

"And those who shall have declared on oath their intention to become such, and shall have taken an oath to support the Constitution of the United States, and the provisions of this act."

Mr. PEARCE. Mr. President, my object in moving the amendment is obvious. I did not hear the debate in the Senate on the night when the amendment of the Senator from Delaware was adopted; but I take it for granted that the reason for that amendment was the conviction, on the part of the majority of the Senate, that the elective franchise should be conferred, within the Territories, upon citizens of the United States only. For my own part, I cannot conceive any reason why this privilege, which peculiarly belongs to citizenship, should be extended to those who are not citizens. It is a part of political sovereignty. It seems to me to be the essential duty of a citizen, but of no one else, to exercise that power. It is at war with the principles of all government, it seems to me, to confer upon those who are not citizens, the power to control the Government through the right of suffrage. That right belongs only to those who are members of the body-politic, and no foreigner can be so until he has, by naturalization, entered into the compact which constitutes him one of the political community.

I admit that the legislation of the country has been somewhat irregular in this particular. I know that that irregularity dates from a very early period of our history. I know, for example, that in the ordinance of 1787, which organized the Northwest Territory, we provided that when there were five thousand male inhabitants over twenty-one years of age, they should have a legislative government, and that the right of suffrage should be committed to those who were citizens of one of the United States, and had certain property qualifications, or to those who had resided two years in the district and had certain larger property qualifications. But there was a manifest reason for that which does not apply now. At that time we had no Federal Government, no Constitution of the United States. There was no such thing as a citizen of the United States. The right was confined to the citizens of one of the United States; and it was manifest that, as there was no general power under the Confederation to constitute citizens of the United States, a man might have resided in the Territory for an indefinite period without acquiring citizenship in the Territory by virtue of any law of naturalization. The only citizens then known to the law were citizens of the respective States of the Confederation. Well, sir, inasmuch as a man who resided in that Territory for any length of time could not thereby become a citizen of the United States, and there was no power to make him such, it seemed to be somewhat reasonable that the right of voting should be given, in that case, to all the residents in the Territory under the condition prescribed by the ordinance which supposed them to be assimilated in interest and feeling with those who were citizens of one of the United States; a freehold to the amount of fifty acres, and a residence in the district of two years, I think, was the requisition in this case.

That provision was successively extended to the different Territories organized out of the Northwestern Territory. It was extended, I believe, also, to the Territories southwest of the Ohio, not in precise terms, in totidem verbis, but by a general provision, that the inhabitants of the Southwestern Territory should be entitled to all the rights, liberties, and advantages which, by the ordinance, were given to those in the Northwestern Territory. Some similar provision was introduced into the act for organizing the Territory of Mississippi, in 1793, when we placed it under an Executive government. But it is a little curious that, in 1808, Congress passed an act to extend the right of suffrage in the Mississippi Territory. Whether there had been any elective Legislature in that Territory up to that time I do not know, but I presume there had not; at least I am not able to find any evidence of it, and I suppose that it was governed as was the Northwest Territory, by a Governor and judges. But in 1808, Congress passed an act to extend the right of suffrage in the Mississippi Territory, and that act expressly restricted the elective franchise to those who were citizens of the United States, and besides, possessed the necessary property qualifications. That was the earliest act which I can find in which the policy of the Government was to confine the elective franchise to citizens of the United States. In 1812, we organized the Territory of Missouri, and there we expressly limited the right of suffrage to citizens of the United States. Afterwards we organized the Territory of Arkansas, and applied to it the provisions of the act organizing the Territory of Missouri. When we organized Iowa and Wisconsin we also limited the right of the elective franchise to those who were citizens of the United States, and so we did in Utah and New Mexico as late as 1850.

We have departed from that rule in regard to the lately organized Territories of Oregon, Minnesota, and Washington. In regard to these three Territories, the provision which extended the elective franchise to those who are not citizens, I think never entered into the consideration of any member of the Senate. I have looked over the debates on the Minnesota bill, and I do not find anything said on the subject when that bill was under discussion. In regard to Oregon Territory, there was perhaps a peculiar reason why Congress should be more liberal than in regard to other Territories. I presume, however, that, in regard to all of them, the provision was established in consequence of the attention of Congress being absorbed by subjects of much greater importance. Be that as it may, these three later precedents being the only cases of extending the franchise to those who are not citizens of the United States, and who have only declared their intentions to become such, seem to be entitled, under the circumstances, to but little consideration; at all events, they should not overrule the precedents which I have mentioned in the Territories of Missouri, Mississippi, Arkansas, Iowa, Wisconsin, Utah, and New Mexico.

But I see this bill provides, that while the alien who may have come into the Territory only the day before, may entitle himself, by a declaration of his intention to become a citizen, to exercise this privilege of citizenship, and vote in the organization of the government, or in the election of those who are to conduct it, no officer, soldier, seaman, or marine, or any other person in the Army or Navy of the United States, shall be allowed to vote or hold office in the country.

Mr. WALKER. I desire to correct the Senator; "he shall not be entitled to vote by reason of being stationed there," is the reason of it. He may be a resident and citizen elsewhere; and he is not to be allowed to vote by reason of being stationed in the Territory.

Mr. PEARCE. Then a man who is stationed there by orders of his Government shall not be allowed to vote because he is a citizen of some State of the Union; but the alien who may go in the day before he declares his intention to become a citizen, shall be entitled to vote, though not a citizen. That is practically declaring that our naturalization laws shall have no force at all in this Territory, and placing the newly arrived foreign emigrant above the citizen of the United States. I can conceive of no higher exercise of the right of citizenship than that of voting, unless it be the right of being elected a Representative; yet you propose to bestow it upon one who may never proceed further than the declaration of his intention to become a citizen, though that declaration may never be carried out, and the party may never become a citizen at all.

There is another section of this bill which, in effect, repeals the Missouri restriction of 1820, and proposes to substitute for that restriction the authority of the people of the Territory to regulate their own domestic institutions. It is true that the section does not expressly provide that the Territorial Legislature may prohibit slavery, or establish it at their own will. Some gentlemen doubt whether it is competent for Congress to confer this power upon the Territorial Legislature; whether the Constitution allows such a grant of power. So the general declaration is made in this section that "the true intent and meaning of this act is to leave the people thereof free to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way, subject only to the Constitution of the United States." This, while it does not in terms invest the Territorial Legislature with the power to establish or prohibit, impliedly does so provided nothing in the letter or spirit of the Constitution inhibits it.

While, therefore, the effect of this provision is doubtful or doubted, one thing is certain, that the bill proposes, in this indirect manner, to invest the people of the Territory, so far as Congress constitutionally can, with the power to decide the question of slavery or no slavery; and this power is conferred, as well on the alien who has been long enough in the Territory to declare his intention to become a citizen, as upon the citizen of the United States who is so by birth or naturalization.

Now, I am not willing under any circumstances to bestow the elective franchise upon one who is not a citizen of the United States, whatever precedents there may be. Still less am I inclined to bestow it upon him when he is to be invested with authority to control this question which Congress has not settled, and cannot settle, to its own satisfaction, and, therefore, to be rid of its embarrassments, has transferred to the Territories themselves. If this question is to be left to the people of the Territories, (and I am inclined to think that it is as wise as any thing else which can be adopted,) let it be left to those people of the Territories who are citizens of the United States, who understand our Government, who, whether native or naturalized, have been living long enough in the United States to have obtained some familiarity with our institutions, who have acquired an interest in the welfare of the country, and have identified themselves with it.

I am free to admit that many of our naturalized citizens are distinguished for earnest patriotism, and an intelligent comprehension of our public affairs.

But let us not confer power over this delicate and disturbing question upon those who have merely declared their intention to become citizens, who may never become citizens, who cannot claim suffrage as a right, and who, by the theory of our naturalization laws, are not supposed to be competent to exercise it.

For these reasons I have offered the amendment.

Mr. BRODHEAD. Mr. President, it has been correctly stated by the Senator from Illinois, that this is the same bill which we passed in the Senate sometime since, with the exception of one very important provision, respecting the rights of unnaturalized citizens.

Mr. DOUGLAS. It may be well to state that it contains some verbal alterations in its grammatical construction, but there is no variation in sense with the exception mentioned by the Senator.

Mr. BRODHEAD. The Senator is correct, and as I do not wish to open the debate on the merits of the bill again, I will only consider the section respecting the qualification of voters, which the honorable Senator from Maryland [Mr. PEARCE] has moved to amend by striking out the clause authorizing unnaturalized citizens to vote. The section authorizes all free white persons above the age of twenty-one to vote at the first election, including foreigners who have not become citizens but have declared their intention to become such, and excluding the officers and soldiers of the Army. So that a foreigner unacquainted with our language or laws, not twenty-four hours in the Territory, and who has not been in our country ten days, can vote without paying a tax, and General Scott, if he happened to be there commanding our troops, could not. The honorable Senator from Maryland has moved what is called the Clayton amendment, which restricts the right to vote to those who are citizens, either native-born or those who have become such under our naturalization laws, and as I voted for it when the bill was before the Senate upon another occasion, and have seen no reason for changing my vote, I will do so again.

The right to vote and take part in the Government is a high privilege, and I hold that it should only be exercised by those who have become citizens and entitled to the rights and immunities, and who have incurred the obligations of citizenship. I will hereafter state how an alien may become a citizen.

There has been many misrepresentations made respecting the effect of the proposed amendment. It has been said that those who support it desire to disfranchise foreigners, which is not the fact. It has been said that the Clayton amendment was stricken out by the House, in accordance with the example furnished in the bills erecting the Territories of Utah and New Mexico, when the truth is that the Clayton amendment makes it conform to those bills, as I will presently show. And those bills were part of the compromise measures of 1850, and better considered than any others. The amendment now under consideration, is, in my judgment, required by the true spirit and meaning of the Constitution, by sound policy, and justified by precedent.

The Constitution in the eighth section says, Congress may "establish a uniform rule of naturalization." Therefore, whenever Congress acts it must make the rule uniform. Well, Congress has established a rule by an act passed in 1802, requiring five years residence before admission to citizenship, and now it is proposed to establish another rule for Nebraska. And what good reason can be given for it. Why should an alien have greater privileges in Nebraska than in Pennsylvania? I voted to extend the present naturalization laws over the Territory of Nebraska, nothing more. By whom should this Government be carried on—by citizens either native-born or naturalized, or by foreigners? And how does an alien become a citizen in this country? Only under the clause of the Constitution which I have cited and the act of Congress passed in pursuance thereof. And can the right to vote properly appertain to another than a citizen? If foreigners can have and enjoy the rights and privileges of citizens, the highest one of which is to vote, why did our forefathers "establish a uniform rule of naturalization?" and why have so many aliens conformed to it? The section under consideration says, any free white man above the age of twenty-one years (and such is the law in all the States) shall vote, &c. So that we require a native-born person, acquainted with our language, educated in our schools, &c., to be twenty-one years of age before he is thought fit to exercise the high privilege of an elector. Our forefathers wisely thought that foreigners should take five years to become trained in the ways of republicanism, acquainted with our people, our laws, our complex machinery of government, &c., and I concur in opinion with them. This Government can only be maintained by an intelligent exercise of the elective franchise. Hence we have always heretofore confined the right to vote to free white persons above the age of twenty-one years who are native-born, and to aliens who have been in the country five years, and complied with the provisions of our naturalization laws. Our views of constitutional liberty differ very much from European notions of liberty. It may be profitable, Mr. President, to examine the action of Congress under the clause of the Constitution requiring an "uniform rule of naturalization." In 1789 the Government went into operation under the present Constitution, and on the 26th of March, 1790, the first naturalization law was passed, requiring two years' residence, one year in the State where the application is made, oath to support the Constitution, &c. Toward the close of Washington's administration, on the 29th of January, 1795, an act was passed requiring five years' residence, three years' declaration of intention, oath, and proof of good moral character, &c. In 1797, the old Adams party came into power, and on the 18th of June, 1798, an act was passed requiring fourteen years' residence, five years in the State in which the application is made, oath, and proof of good moral character, &c. In 1801, the Jeffersonian Democratic party came into power, and on the 14th of April, 1802, passed an act requiring five years' residence, declaration of intention two years' renunciation of allegiance to any foreign Prince, &c., oath to support the Constitution, proof of good moral character, &c. This law has now been in force for more than fifty years. It was intended to be a liberal one, for the country was then almost a wilderness. It was satisfactory to the alien at that time, and should be so now. Any attempt to modify it, or to denounce those who are willing to stand by it, on the part of the emigrants, will create a counter sentiment, highly injurious to them. The statistics of emigration show that up to 1840, only one million of emigrants had arrived in the country; now we receive annually, near four hundred thousand. During the next three years, we will receive as many as we did for thirty-five years prior to 1840. I have no feeling of hostility to them. I want them to come here and enjoy religious and political freedom, protection to person and property, and in due season to become citizens and take part in the government; to vote and to hold office. Any man who pretends anything more for them is not their true friend. The wise portion of them do not wish any thing more themselves. Up to the present time foreigners came here to be Americanized, not to un-Americanize us. But, I confess I have witnessed some recent demonstrations that do not please me. The movements of Kossuth in this country did him no credit, and since he returned, he has issued an address to the German people of this country to take action against the Senate of the United States for rejecting a gentleman nominated by the President for consul at London. German meetings have been held in different parts of the United States to denounce those who support this bill, and I believe they went so far, in some places, as to burn the honorable and distinguished Senator from Illinois in effigy. But, sir, I do not hold the great mass of them responsible for these acts. The honest and industrious German does not wish to meddle unreasonably in politics, nor does the generous and warm-hearted Irishman whose heart beats responsive to the bold anthem of "Erin-go-bragh." Those who set themselves up for leaders among them, who claim to be the special guardians of their rights, who pretend to have the same religion that they have, that they may sell them out in election times, either for money or office, are their worst enemies. I have seen a good many claim office on the allegation that they influenced this or that portion of the alien vote, and threaten those in power with the displeasure of the voters of foreign birth if they were not gratified. Did we not see General Scott, the gallant old chief, who fought during the war of 1812 upon our northern frontier, and who had carried the stars and stripes of our country in triumph to the halls of the Montezumas, talking during the last presidential canvass about the "rich Irish brogue, and the sweet German accent." It was a humiliating spectacle. For my part, sir, I do not wish to see our candidates making appeals either to or against any portion of our emigrant population. I wish them to feel as American citizens, and act as such at the proper time. But when they hold separate meetings, why, of course, they induce native-born American citizens to hold meetings and organize against them.

Mr. President, I think I have pretty clearly shown that the spirit of the Constitution, and sound policy, require aliens to become citizens under the clause of the Constitution I have referred to, and the act of Congress passed in pursuance thereof, before claiming the right to vote. Our own people, moving from one State to another, cannot vote in the State into which they move until they have resided therein for some time, and paid tax. In most of the States it is two years; in some one year, and in a few six months. Some time is supposed to be necessary to enable them to become acquainted with the laws and the people among whom they reside. I will now proceed to show that the section, as it comes to us from the House, is a departure from previous legislation.

The celebrated ordinance of 1787, organizing the Northwestern Territory, prior to the adoption of the Constitution, contained this provision. The Southwestern Territory was afterwards organized with a similar provision:

"Provided, That no person be eligible or qualified to act as a representative unless he shall have been a citizen of one of the United States three years, and be a resident in the district, or unless he shall have resided in the district three years, and in either case shall likewise hold in his own right, in fee-simple, two hundred acres of land within the same: Provided, also, That a freehold in fifty acres of land in the district, having been a citizen of one of the States, and being resident in the district, or the like freehold and two years residence in the district, shall be necessary to qualify a man as an elector of a representative."

In 1808 Congress passed the act alluded to by the honorable Senator from Maryland. It not only required citizenship, but a certain amount of property. It reads as follows:

"That every free white male person in the Mississippi Territory, above the age of twenty-one years, having been a citizen of the United States, and resident in the said Territory, one year next preceding an election of representatives, and who has a legal or equitable title to a tract of land, by virtue of any act of Congress, or who may become the purchaser of any tract of land from the United States of the quantity of fifty acres, or who may hold in his own right, a town lot of the value of one hundred dollars within the said Territory, shall be entitled to vote for representatives to the General Assembly of said Territory."

In 1819 Congress authorized the people of the Territory of Michigan to elect a Delegate to Congress, and then a slight departure took place, but still not so great as is now proposed. A residence of one year, and the payment of a tax, was required to qualify an inhabitant of the Territory to vote. The section under consideration neither requires prior residence, payment of tax, nor evidence of intention to remain in the Territory, or naturalization. The following is the law to which I refer:

"SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That every free white male citizen of said Territory, above the age of twenty-one years, who shall have resided therein one year next preceding an election, and who shall have paid a county or territorial tax, shall be entitled to vote at such election for a Delegate to the Congress of the United States, in such manner, and at such times and places, as shall be prescribed by the Governor and judges of said Territory."

In 1836 Congress organized the Territory of Wisconsin, and in 1838 the Territory of Iowa. The territorial law passed for Iowa is in the same language as that contained in the Wisconsin bill. The fifth section of both contains a significant proviso:

"SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That every free white male citizen of the United States, above the age of twenty-one years, who shall have been an inhabitant of said Territory at the time of its organization, shall be entitled to vote at the first election and shall be eligible to any office within the said Territory; but the qualifications of voters at all subsequent elections shall be such as shall be determined by the Legislative Assembly: Provided, That the right of suffrage shall be exercised only by citizens of the United States."

In 1848 the Territory of Oregon was organized, and then a still greater departure took place; but still the law required a residence in the Territory at the time of the passage of the act, and in this respect it differs from the legislation now proposed.

Then, sir, we come to the legislation contained in the compromise measures of 1850. There has been a great misrepresentation in regard to the legislation upon this subject in the two bills organizing the Territories of Utah and New Mexico. It has been represented, over and over again, that both of these Territories have been organized in such a manner as to give the inhabitants, whether native-born, naturalized, or unnaturalized, the right to vote. It is not so. The bill organizing the Territory of New Mexico was approved on the 9th of September, 1850; the Utah bill was approved the same day. This provision is contained in both:

"SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That every free white male inhabitant, above the age of twenty-one years, who shall have been a resident of said Territory at the time of the passage of this act, shall be entitled to vote at the first election, and shall be eligible to any office within the said Territory; but the qualifications of voters and of holding office, at all subsequent elections, shall be such as shall be prescribed by the Legislative Assembly: Provided, That the right of suffrage, and of holding office, shall be exercised only by citizens of the United States, including those recognized as citizens by the treaty with the Republic of Mexico, concluded February 2, 1848.

I am justified, therefore, in saying that the proposed legislation is not only contrary to the provisions and spirit of the Constitution, and to sound policy, but it is contrary to the weight of precedent upon the subject. I believe we have organized eighteen Territories, and in a majority of them the right to vote is confined to citizens of the United States. In 1838, on the question of the admission of Michigan as a State, Mr. Calhoun and Mr. Clay both contended, especially Mr. Calhoun, that even a State could not be admitted into the Union whose constitution authorized unnaturalized aliens to vote. There seemed to be no doubt in the mind of either that unnaturalized persons should not be permitted to vote in the Territories.

What do we propose to do now? It is proposed to pay millions for this territory to extinguish the Indian title. We paid five millions to extinguish the Indian title in Minnesota. We propose now to pay millions to extinguish the Indian title in Nebraska and Kansas; and we are asked to turn over the government of both Territories into the hands of foreigners, and thus permit them to lay the foundation of two States. And we are also asked by the advocates of the homestead bill to give each one a farm besides.

Mr. President, in view of what has taken place upon this Nebraska and Kansas bill, well disposed persons may well inquire whether Congress is capable of legislating on any subject where slavery and the rights of aliens may be called in question. There seems to me to be a quailing before the spirit of Abolitionism and a foreign influence, which may well suggest the inquiry to which I have just alluded. The excitement about slavery in the Nebraska country shows that nations, as well as individuals, are more troubled about imaginary than real evils. I have been denounced all over my own State by the open or secret enemies of this bill, or by those whose malice against me has long had the upper hand of their sense of justice, as voting to disfranchise aliens, and as being the only Senator from a free State who voted for the Clayton amendment. Well, sir, it is true that I am the only Senator from a free State who voted for it—and what of it? A majority of my brother Senators voted for it, and a majority of the Democrats of this body. The Free-Soil, or Abolition Senators, as they are called, of course, voted against it. I voted with the distinguished Senators from Virginia.

Mr. HAMLIN. Will they vote with you now?

Mr. BRODHEAD. I do not know whether they will or not. I do not ask who is going to vote with me or against me. I inquire whether it is right, as I did when the Wilmot proviso was first presented. I stood almost single-handed and alone against that. I do not care who votes with me on this amendment. It is right. It is right and just to the aliens themselves. It is for the purpose of maintaining the Constitution and the rights of American citizens, and I will vote for it, be the consequences to myself what they may. I know that my course may be misrepresented before the alien voters, and that I may thus incur their displeasure; but I will do my duty, and incur the hazard. When the amendment was first proposed by the honorable Senator from Delaware, it was late at night. I was acting as the Presiding Officer, and could not give the reasons by which I was influenced. I have endeavored to do so now, and respectfully submit them to the consideration of the Senate, and those I have the honor to represent on this floor.

Mr. TOOMBS. Mr. President, this question having been very fully discussed by the Senate on a former occasion, I shall not enter into any length of argument on it; but there are some observations which fell from the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania which seem to require a word of comment.

The Senator has got himself into a great error in supposing that this is in any sense a constitutional question. He has reached that point by confounding two very different things—naturalization and the right of suffrage. Naturalization gives nobody a right of voting in the United States. That is a question regulated by the different States of the Union. Originally, shortly after the Revolution, a large class of citizens of the United States were excluded from the ballot-box. I doubt whether, immediately after the Revolution, one half of the free white citizens voted in the United States. Virginia excluded all who had not a freehold qualification; and I believe all the States of the Union had other qualifications besides mere citizenship; and, therefore, the naturalization law of 1802 in no wise affects this question, and the constitutional point raised by the Senator from Pennsylvania passes away. Making a man a citizen gives him no right to vote; and giving him a right to vote does not make him a citizen. Although the general principle in the United States is that none but citizens do vote, (and I concur in the correctness of the opinions expressed by the honorable Senator from Maryland on that subject,) yet it is not a universal sentiment in those States. Several States of the Union allow foreigners to vote.

I do not think the Senator from Pennsylvania is quite correct in his reference to the policy of our fathers, as any guide for us at present. They seem to have been utterly indifferent upon this question. The ordinance for the government of the Northwest Territory, which was passed under the old Confederation, allowed persons to vote who had fifty acres of land, and were citizens of the United States, or of either of the States, or other persons not being either citizens of the United States or of the States, who had resided two years, without even this preliminary of having declared an intention to become citizens of the United States, or disclaimed allegiance to other Governments. An English subject, or a French subject, in 1789 might have voted in all the country northwest of the Ohio river, and they did actually vote. The ordinance of 1787 was readopted by the first Congress under the first Constitution in 1790, and allowed persons who owned fifty acres of land, and resided there for two years, to vote; but the point as to the two years' residence does not at all affect this question. The ordinance of 1787 was extended over all the territory of the United States, southwest as well as northwest of the Ohio, saving and excepting the sixth, or anti-slavery clause. The same provision was subsequently extended to Indiana, and to some of the Territories west. In 1836, I believe, was the first departure from that policy. Then was the first time that there was any variation from the qualifications of voters as prescribed in the ordinance of 1787—and that was in the case of Michigan. I am not certain as to that being the first; but it is the first territorial government where the change was made that has attracted my attention. Then, why prescribe, in one or two territorial bills, that no one shall vote in the Territories but citizens? Subsequently, however, in passing a territorial bill for Minnesota, the very provision now contained in this bill was adopted. I say, therefore, that the requisite of citizenship as a qualification for voting, was not the practice of the Government for the first thirty or forty years of its existence, and since that time the practice has been variable.

Now, sir, while I concur with the Senator from Maryland, and with other Senators who have expressed the same view, that it is best to confine the right of voting in those Territories to citizens of the United States, I cannot conceal the fact that the House of Representatives differ with the Senate on this subject, and that there are great and important fundamental principles in this bill which will be endangered by this difference. Then, I say, the true policy of the friends of these great principles is to yield this point to the House of Representatives, and save another, and higher, and greater principle. Let us not endanger a more important principle by differing on this, in regard to which the policy has been both one way and the other, and where the weight of authority and precedent is for allowing these people to vote. Therefore, even if I concurred entirely with the honorable Senator from Maryland, and the other gentlemen who voted for the amendment of the Senator from Delaware originally, those of them especially from my own section of the Union, I am perfectly willing to surrender the amendment, rather than endanger this bill. I am not willing to put the bill in hazard in regard to a principle on which the House of Representatives differ from us, and on which the practice of the Government has been rather with them than with us. I trust, therefore, the friends of the bill will not endanger the other great principle involved in it. No great harm can result from rejecting this proposition even as a practical error. It involves no constitutional question whatever. It is merely a question of expediency. Now, I say that the highest expediency is to not trammel the great principles in this bill with a side issue of this sort.

Besides, Mr. President, the practice being varied, being now different in different Territories of the United States, if gentlemen suppose that it is wise to make the rule uniform, and to confine the right of voting to citizens, that is an appropriate subject for legislation. Gentlemen can introduce that subject by itself, and get the sense of Congress upon it, and make a law in conformity with that sentiment. For myself, I attach but very little importance to it. The qualifications of those who are to vote will, after the first election, be vested in the territorial government, and very soon it will be vested in the State governments to be there formed, and then it will be beyond your reach. The making of a man a citizen gives him no right to vote; but when the Territory becomes a State, it prescribes its own qualifications. Then this being a mere matter of temporary expediency, and the practice being rather against the Senate, I should feel it to be folly to endanger the other principles of this bill by any dispute between the two Houses upon such a proposition as this.

I trust, therefore, that even those gentlemen who feel some solicitude for confining the right of voting to American citizens, and not extending it to foreigners, will seek an occasion when they can make a uniform and general law of the land upon the subject. Being satisfied, as I am sure my friend from Pennsylvania must be now, that this has nothing to do with the naturalization law of 1802, and in no respect involves any constitutional question, I hope he and others will be willing to yield. The friends of the bill have already stated their own opinions in favor of or against confining the right of suffrage to citizens, and having stated their opinions to the country, and this dispute having arisen with the House, I hope they will not hazard the principle which both the House and the Senate deem important to the peace and welfare and establishment of right principles in this country. I hope they will yield this point of dispute which can, at any point, be taken up and settled by itself, and leave the bill as it comes from the House of Representatives. Besides, I attach no very great importance to this matter at all. You have invited these people to our shores by the policy of your laws. They are here. You ought to incorporate them, in feeling at least, and in interest, under your flag, and in the national sentiment, as early and as soon as possible. This is not the point to meet the evil of immigration. If it be an evil, you should meet it at the threshold, and not aim side blows at it after you have brought these people into the country. I am for Americanizing them, and giving them the full benefit of all the laws of the country.

Mr. ATCHISON. Mr. President, I voted for the amendment to the Senate bill proposed by the Senator from Delaware; but I must say now that I concur with the Senator from Georgia. I have not, however, changed my opinions as to the policy of that amendment. I still entertain the opinions which I entertained then, that none but American citizens, native-born or naturalized, should be entitled to the right of suffrage, or to hold office either in the States or Territories of this country. But, sir, there is a higher principle than that involved in this measure. There is no constitutional question in my opinion involved either by voting for or against this amendment. It is a mere question of policy; and that question of policy I am willing to yield for the sake of a higher principle contained in this bill. Sir, I would vote for this bill, although there might be not only one, but one thousand obnoxious principles contained in it. I would vote for it, because it blots out that infamous—yes, sir, I think it is a proper term to be used—that infamous restriction passed by the Congress of 1820, commonly called the Missouri compromise, passed when the State which I have now in part the honor to represent, asked admission into the Union of these States, and it was made a condition, an infamous condition, that slavery should be excluded from all the territory acquired from France, then called Louisiana, north of 36° 30' north latitude. Yes, sir, if this bill contained one thousand obnoxious principles, with the repeal of that infamous "compromise," as it is called, I should vote for it. When this is done, we shall have achieved what, after thirty years of struggle, has only been consummated at this session.

As I said before, I believe that, as a matter of policy, none but American citizens, native-born or naturalized, should be entitled to vote or to hold office in this country; but still I am willing to yield this; and as a southern man, as representing a State more deeply interested in the passage of this bill, perhaps, than any other State in the Union, I say that, practically, it will have no effect upon the institutions of these Territories. The foreign population are not the pioneers, they are not the first to enter the Territories of the United States. They are not the first to encounter the perils, the toils, and the dangers of settling a new Territory. They follow in the footsteps of the pioneers, and inhabit the cities and the villages.

They are generally not the agricultural portion of the community. The great mass of them are traders, mechanics, paupers, and pedlars.

Mr. President, I have been denounced by the abolition papers in my State, (and I regret to say that we have some of that caste in the slaveholding State of Missouri,) for voting for the amendment proposed by the Senator from Delaware; and it has been charged upon me that I was the author of that amendment, that I had used the honorable, the venerable, the distinguished Senator from Delaware, as a tool to effect this purpose. I disavow anything of the kind. That Senator and myself never consulted about it.

Mr. CLAYTON. Never.

Mr. ATCHISON. I knew nothing of his amendment until he proposed it. When he did propose it I voted for it, believing it to be right as a matter of policy. I still think so, and but for the reasons which I have assigned I should now vote for it.

Mr. CLAYTON. I desire to confirm what has been stated by my friend from Missouri. I have seen the allegation to which he has referred, in some of the public prints, charging him with having prompted or instigated me to move the amendment. In confirmation of what the honorable Senator has said, I only desire now to state that I never had any communication with him in reference to the subject before I moved the amendment in the Senate, nor do I remember to have spent a moment in conversation about it while it was under consideration.

Mr. ATCHISON. Never one word.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. President, I was gratified to hear the remarks of the Senator from Georgia; for there has evidently been a great deal of confusion of ideas in regard to this subject; and I perceive that the Senator from Pennsylvania has fallen into that error to a greater extent than any gentleman I have ever heard discuss the subject on the floor of the Senate. He set out by stating that the provisions of the bill as they now stand, coming from the House of Representatives, repeal the naturalization law of 1802. Now, I wish to ask the Senator to look at the distinction between the naturalization laws of the country and the rights of citizenship under the Constitution. He will find, as the Senator from Georgia has said, that an individual may be a citizen and yet be precluded from the exercise of the right of suffrage. This, in point of fact, is the case in many of the States already. Other qualifications may be imposed upon a citizen of the United States, with which the citizen in the State may not be able to comply, and consequently he cannot exercise the right of voting.

The exercise of the right of suffrage affects the Government of the United States, under the Constitution, in but three particulars. Now I should be glad to have the Senator from Pennsylvania point out to me, if he can, the provision of the Constitution having any reference whatever to the exercise of the right of suffrage which does not refer the whole matter to the States. He cannot point to the provision of the Constitution. Sir, it is denied that the Congress of the United States has the right to interfere with the subject of slavery in the Territories; and why? Because they are assimilated to the States. If the Territories are to be viewed in the same light as the States, and the right to regulate the matter of slavery was left as expressly to the States as is the right to prescribe the qualifications of those who are to vote, there would be no doubt, in my mind, that Congress could have no right to interfere in the subject. The first provision of the Constitution that relates to the matter at all is this:

"The House of Representatives shall be composed of members chosen every second year by the people of the several States, and the electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature."

When you refer to the Constitution of the United States to ascertain the qualifications of an elector, so far as the exercise of the right concerns the Government of the United States, you find that you are to look at the State constitution. You are to consult the State constitution, and ascertain what are the qualifications of electors for the most numerous branch of the State Legislature; and when you find that, you have ascertained the qualifications of an elector for a member of the House of Representatives. Then not only is this matter left to the States, because it is not delegated to the Congress of the United States, but it is expressly left to the States by the Constitution itself. Congress cannot, if they would, restrict the States in the exercise of this attribute, left to them not only impliedly, but expressly. Then we come to the next provision on this subject:

"The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State;"—

Chosen how? In a manner pointed out by the Constitution? Certainly. But it is left indefinite, to be regulated where? In the States:

"Chosen by the Legislature thereof, for six years."

This is the provision in regard to the qualifications of those who are to choose the Senators. We have already seen that the Constitution leaves the qualifications of the electors to the very persons who are to choose the Senators, the State Legislatures. The Constitution expressly refers the whole subject to the States.

The next provision is in regard to choosing electors of President and Vice President; and, in reference to that subject, it is provided that "Each State shall appoint, in such manner as the Legislature thereof may direct, a number of electors," &c.

Thus, again, expressly referring the matter to the State sovereignties. Then, sir, when the Senator from Pennsylvania claims that we are, in any sense of the word, infringing either the letter or the spirit of the Constitution by the provisions of the bill as it now stands, he is very greatly mistaken. It is a matter entirely for the States; and if the Territories are to be assimilated to the States, if they are to be viewed as occupying the same position, you should leave the subject to them. The Territories are viewed by some of us, in regard to the subject of slavery, as occupying the same position as the States. If they are to be viewed in the same light in all respects, then unqualifiedly I would say Congress has no right to prescribe who shall or who shall not vote either at the first, or at any subsequent election; but it is a matter which should be left entirely to the Territories; and, in that point of view, even the limitations that are put in the bill as it comes from the House of Representatives may be considered an infraction, not of a principle of the Constitution, but of its express letter; for we do take upon ourselves now, to some extent, to prescribe the qualifications of electors in these Territories by this provision, which is contained in the bill:

"Every free white male inhabitant above the age of twenty-one years, who shall be an actual resident of said Territory, and shall possess the qualifications hereinafter prescribed, shall be entitled to vote at the first election, and shall be eligible to any office within the said Territory; but the qualifications of voters and of holding office at all subsequent elections, shall be such as shall be prescribed by the Legislative Assembly."

That would leave the Legislative Assemblies of the Territories unlimited in their power to qualify the elective franchise; but there is a further provision which goes beyond the Constitution, if we are to view the Territories in the same light as the States, and exercises a power which, in that point of view, we cannot exercise. That provision is this:

"Provided, That the right of suffrage and of holding office shall be exercised only by citizens of the United States, and those who shall have declared on oath their intention to become such, and shall have taken an oath to support the Constitution of the United States, and the provisions of this act."

Suppose such a provision were incorporated in a bill in regard to a State, the State would treat it with scorn; and why? Because, appealing to the Constitution of the United States, the State authorities would see clearly that the whole matter had been left to them. This is the manner in which it would be viewed by a State sovereignty, and considering a Territory in the same light, it would seem that a Territory would have more right to revolt at such a provision in regard to the exercise of the elective franchise, than at any provision upon the subject of slavery. The reason is plain. It is because the assertion that we have no right to legislate on slavery is merely a matter of implication; but here the Constitution clearly leaves the right to the States. In regard to slavery, the power is left to the States by implication, because it is not delegated to the General Government. I think, then, that the Senator from Pennsylvania presents the matter in a wrong point of view; and however correct his conclusions may be, most certainly the reason which he has assigned is incorrect and illogical.

Mr. PETTIT. Mr. President, I deeply regret that this proposition has been made in the Senate on the return of this bill. I regret it because of the necessary consequences that must follow if the amendment prevail. No Senator can shut his eyes to the fact that if we again incorporate this provision in the bill, all our labor, all our exertions, all our anxieties during the whole of this long session will have been nought, and fall to the ground, if this provision shall succeed. If that is to be the case, let me warn Senators that they must take the consequences upon their own heads. Let me warn Senators that it may not be possible again, for years to come, to get a body of men together in the two Houses of Congress with this exciting, fanatical question hanging over them, who will settle, as we have settled, the great and the only principle involved in this bill. You hurl back this whole question upon the American people, there to ferment, boil, bubble, and heave like a boiling cauldron. What body of men may be thrown here together under such circumstances? Nothing is plainer than that this provision cannot be concurred in by the House. It is a provision simply of policy, of expediency, and not of principle. By adopting it, you endanger the principle of self-government, the principle of putting all the Territories, and the rights of the people in all our Territories, upon the same broad basis of equality, and establishing their own local and domestic institutions for themselves. Is it thus to be endangered for the purpose of pandering to a mere question of doubtful policy or expediency?

Sir, I believe that this will not be done. Is all our labor, and toil, and suffering, not to say all our abuse and vilification, to be gone over with again? Or shall we now, when we have this bill in our hands, and at our disposal, harmonize and bury in oblivion the differences of opinion as to a mere question of policy, and settle the broad principle that your people may go to all the Territories of the Union with the same rights, the same political privileges, the same promises of establishing their own political institutions? Sir, the consequences of putting this bill in hazard now will be dire and calamitous. You may have not only the protestations and the anathemas of three thousand clergymen, but they may be trebled and quadrupled before another meeting of Congress. What is the result? Is it not plain? I will not conceal it. I need not. If you throw back this question so as to enter into the election of members of the other House, and one third of the members of this House, what will be the result? I speak what all men must know, when I say that ultra Abolitionists, moderate Abolitionists, Free-Soilers, contemners of right, and law, and justice, together with tender-footed or timid Democrats, will unite with Whigs upon any class of men to defeat those who are in favor of a sound and legitimate administration of the Government. Who does not know that that would suit the Senator from New York, [Mr. SEWARD,] and a few other Senators here? Who does not know that that would suit your three thousand clergymen? No man can answer for the consequences. But here now, by passing over and yielding a little question of expediency, you put to rest forever the great principle of equal rights in the Territories, and banish from Congress this exciting question, never, I trust in God, to return again.

Sir, at this point, let me say one thing that has not been said here, or in the country, heretofore; and I say it from the full conviction of my judgment, that if any section of the Union has a right to complain of the existence and continuance of what is called the Missouri compromise, or the restriction of slavery north of 36° 30', it is the northern and not the southern portion of this Union. Why? If you put it on the principle that men in the States south of that line are to migrate to the territory south of it, and those in the free States are to migrate to that portion north of it, what will be the result? South of that line you will have citizens of the United States, or citizens of the southern States, if they are to migrate there, who will have privileges which are forbidden to the citizens north of that line. You have said to those south of it: you may or may not establish slavery, as you please; we will not bind you in the adamantine chains or the cords of congressional legislation. But you say to those north of the line: We will tie you in fetters, we will manacle you hand and foot, and forbid the exercise of your own judgments as to the rights and privileges you shall enjoy. Sir, as a northern and western man, I protest against any such inequality. I hold that, if I emigrate to a Territory, though it be one mile north of 36° 30', I ought to have the same rights and privileges there that my more fortunate neighbor has who emigrates a mile south of me. I repeat, then, it is the northern portion of this Union, and not the South, who are put under the ban; and it is for them that I claim that this obnoxious restriction shall be removed. The citizens of Indiana have the right now to make their own laws and establish their own institutions; and if they move to Kansas or Nebraska next year, will they be less qualified, or have less moral right to do so there? All will say, no! Why, then, seek to deprive them of it?

Mr. President, the consequences of a defeat and failure here I will not undertake to delineate at length. They rise up thick and numerous before me. They tower to the heavens. They plant themselves deep, extending to the center of the earth, and threaten the stability of the Union. They will stand an impregnable barrier over which, for years to come, no Congress will be able to get if we allow this opportunity to pass. The bill is now in the hands of the Senate of the United States to dispose of. Will they dare to be so recreant to the peace and the harmony of the Union, and to the justice which should mark our legislation, as now to let the opportunity escape for a paltry question of policy?

Sir, let me say to the Senator from Pennsylvania that he is totally mistaken. I agree, certainly, with the Senator from Georgia, and the Senator from Wisconsin, and perhaps I shall only use different words to express their ideas on this subject. The Senator from Pennsylvania is totally mistaken in supposing that the right of suffrage and citizenship are correlative terms, or that they are the same. They may have similarities in some respects. He who is a citizen may be entitled to vote, if the States allow him to vote, but not otherwise. Let me say to that Senator, further, that naturalization itself, as well as adding to the rights of the inhabitants of the country, takes away some rights. A foreigner in Pennsylvania has rights which the Senator, and no other native-born citizen of Pennsylvania can do. But, sir, while he has his right, and while, by virtue of citizenship, he will alienate it, and must drop it, and fall into the common level of his fellow-citizens, he has other and greater rights secured to him. Citizenship secures to him the right of protection abroad. When, after having staid with us for five years, he shall have taken the formality of the law upon him, and shall go abroad either for pleasure, for business, or for trade, the Constitution, with its manifold and ample protection, and the flag of your country, are over him. He has taken an oath renouncing allegiance to all foreign Governments, Potentates, and States, and has sworn eternal fidelity and brotherhood to you. He has sworn that he will stand side by side with you in council, and shoulder to shoulder in your battle-fields. You have, in return, taken upon you, as a Government, the solemn obligation of a sovereign that you will protect him as a citizen, go where he may. He cannot, in the language of the President of the United States, wander so far from home in the legitimate pursuit of pleasure or business but that the flag of his country is over him, and shall ever protect him.

Such, sir, is the proud position of the man who becomes a citizen of the United States. But not so with the resident alien; he has no such claim, and no such right upon the protection of the Government. I will not enter into any argument as to the point at which this right begins, and the time at which a foreigner ceases to be an alien, and commences to be a citizen and have the rights of citizenship attached to him; but when they do attach to him, then the protection of which I have spoken attaches to him. That is the great, the darling, and the desirable object of citizenship. As a mere question of domestic protection, it is not so important; for a foreigner may go into the courts and obtain redress for an assault and battery to his person, or for a wrong to his property. But if a subject of Great Britain comes and domiciles with you for twenty years, or even for fifty years, if he lives here without becoming a naturalized citizen, and goes to Brazil, to Mexico, to the Barbary States, or to any other country, the flag, the laws, and the protection of the Union, are not over him, and do not follow him, because he has not entered into the solemn league. Naturalization is but a contract between individuals and the whole mass of the nation. The one says, if you will take upon yourself these obligations and stipulations, we will take upon ourselves to discharge towards you the duties and obligations of a sovereign to his subjects, or the duty of our Government to its native-born citizens, and protect you, as such, in all legitimate pursuits or wanderings at home or abroad. A heavy and grave responsibility on us, but glorious boon to him!

No greater error can be fallen into than to suppose that citizenship and suffrage are one and the same thing. This question was brought up, some years ago, in the House of Representatives, by innumerable petitions, abolition petitions, praying Congress to declare that free negroes in the States might be voters, and that foreigners might be restricted in that right. In that form the question was raised, and it was referred to the Judiciary Committee of the House of Representatives, of which I was a member, and was very fully and deliberately considered. I had not the honor of making the report upon the question, and if I had, I should have added but little to its weight. The report was made by a gentleman from New York, Mr. Rathbun. In it the whole question of the right of suffrage was fully and ably discussed. But, sir, if there had been no discussion, and if it were an entirely new question, could there be any difficulty about it? You say you are to look to the delegated provisions of your Constitution for all the powers that you have. Those which are not given there are reserved to the States, or to the people of the States. Where, in what page, what line, what section of the Constitution is to be found the delegation of power to you to create voters in the States? It is expressly said that electors of President and Vice President shall be chosen in such manner as the Legislatures of the States shall direct, and that the members of the House of Representatives shall be elected by those having the right to vote for the most numerous branch of the Legislatures in the different States. Many of the States have conferred that right upon Indians, and many, both North and South, have conferred it upon free negroes without property. Old Cave Johnson, of Tennessee, an honored and respectable gentleman, formerly Postmaster General, and for a long time a member of the other House, told me, with his own lips, that the first time he was elected to Congress from Tennessee, it was by the votes of free negroes, and he told me how. Free negroes in Tennessee were then allowed, by the constitution of the State, to vote, and he was an iron manufacturer, and had a large number of free negroes, as well as slaves, in his employ. I well recollect the number he stated. One hundred and forty-four free negroes, in his employ, went to the ballot-box, and elected him to Congress the first time he was elected. Did this Government settle the question of suffrage there? So plain is it that this is a matter which pertains alone to the States, that I may state that in New Jersey—the Senator from New Jersey can correct me if it is not so—a few years ago women voted, if they do not now.

Mr. CASS. Strong minded women. [Laughter.]

Mr. PETTIT. Strong minded women, the Senator from Michigan says. Well, sir, whether they were strong minded or not, it is a fact that they did vote. Each State then has reserved the right to settle the question of suffrage. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. BRODHEAD] is one of those who do not agree with me that all power over the Territories is in our hands. I consider it as unnecessary, impolitic, and unjust to exercise it, and I hand it back to the people. I will not shirk from any constitutional or legal responsibility when I am required to perform it; but I will not exercise the ultra power in my hands, when, in my judgment, it can better be exercised by the people. The Senator from Pennsylvania and myself do not agree as to the powers of this Government over the Territories. He holds, if I understand him, and I think I have so understood him through a series of years, that there is no power over the Territories in Congress; and indeed so far have some Senators, if not he, gone, that they say it is only from necessity they organize a Territory at all, and give them the outlines of a form of government, and pay their expenses for a few years. Sir, necessity forms with me no plea for a violation of the Constitution. If I did not believe we had the ample power, no plea of necessity should induce me to walk to the brink of the abyss of usurpation. If the power was not clear in my judgment, I should not attempt to exercise it. Why, sir, there is no absolute necessity for organizing Territories at all. All you have to do is to repeal your restrictive laws forbidding that people shall settle there. Let the people go. If I go with them, they may elect me Governor, or any other man they see fit. There is, therefore, no necessity which can justify any such thing; but it is a power and a duty which we have that we shall organize these Territories while they are in their incipient stages, and then for all other domestic purposes, turn them over to their own keeping and protection.

But, sir, the Senator from Pennsylvania says that you have not the power to settle the question of slavery in the Territories, but you have the power to limit the right of voting to citizens of the United States, and that you have no power to extend it further. I grant that we have the power, and I say we have the power to extend it further. What, then, does his reasoning lead to? Why, you cannot legislate upon the subject of slavery, but you must leave it to the Territory to settle that question, and you can limit the right of suffrage to one man from the South, or to citizens from the South, and say they shall have the entire voting, and shall settle the institutions of the country. So far as that is concerned, I know that no such thing is proposed, but if you have the power to fix the right of suffrage, you may limit it to any class; you have the power to limit it to men forty years old, or to any other class you please. The power, in my judgment, is clear, but expediency and justice are to be consulted.

We have proposed to leave this country, as it is said, a tabula rasa, as a clean naked sheet of paper, so far as law is concerned; we are to tell the people there, here is the stone on which you may engrave the twelve tables of law, but we give it to you naked. We do not hand it down to you with the rescript of order upon it that you shall obey. Go there and establish your own laws, write such rules as you and your successors are willing to be bound by, and change them from time to time, all of you being male settlers, twenty-one years of age, free and white, having the voice and the right to determine that matter.

Mr. President, suffrage and citizenship, as I have said, are quite different things, having no alliance whatever. Who does not know that in many of the States—I presume even now in South Carolina, if I am not incorrectly informed—all the citizens of the United States, though native-born, are not voters, or they are not for certain offices. They cannot vote for Governor or for members of the Legislature, as I understand, unless they hold certain property.

Mr. BUTLER. That idea seems to have prevailed very generally in relation to the State of South Carolina, which I in part represent. The honorable Senator from Texas [Mr. HOUSTON] upon one occasion thought proper to arraign the State—

Mr. PETTIT. I did not make the allusion for the purpose of arraigning that State.

Mr. BUTLER. I am aware of that, but I wish to correct the gentleman, and so far as the Senate may be interested in it, to correct the opinion which may be entertained by the Senate generally. In the State of South Carolina there is no restriction upon the right of voting, except the residence prescribed in the constitution; and there is no property qualification at all. Every free white man over the age of twenty-one years, primarily has a right to go to the ballot-box and vote for members of the Legislature, and for the Senators of the different districts. Those members, in Legislature assembled, vote for Senators in Congress, as required by the Constitution, and they also vote for the Governor of the State and for electors of President and Vice President of the United States. Thus far the members of the Legislature, elected by the free people without any qualification so far as regards the right of voting, have a derivative right of voting for the different offices which I have indicated; but in all other respects the qualification of a voter in South Carolina is as plenary, I presume, as in Indiana or any other State. Of course the voter is required to be a citizen of the United States.

Mr. PETTIT. I am very glad to hear the explanation, but it was my understanding that it was not always so. In the State of Virginia, near by, it is but a few years since a general right of suffrage was allowed. Though a man were there, though his ancestors had been there from before "the old war," as they are in the habit of saying in Virginia, though he were of the older and even of the "first families of Virginia," he might have been, a few years ago, in such a condition as not to be a voter. Then the question of suffrage, and of naturalization or citizenship, are two distinct things. The two rights are conferred for a distinct purpose.

Now, Mr. President, allow me to detain the Senate for a moment, as to the dangers of this question. What are the dangers? I hold that the very best naturalization law you could give to a foreigner, which would operate like a charm and make him a better citizen the day he lands, would be, instead of requiring him to stay here five years, as under the present system, to give him an interest in the soil—immediately induce him to become an owner and cultivator of the soil. It is the best naturalization, and the germ will produce the growth and the fruit of love of country, and devotion and willingness to serve it, in preference to any and all others. Sir, take the Irishman; if you please, he who has suffered from the oppressions of the English Government, through himself and generations of his ancestors past, who has never been allowed to own a foot of land. It was beyond his means to acquire an acre, and it was not the policy of the Government to allow it. Transplant him to-morrow to your rich and fertile lands in the West, and give him a quarter section of land there, and who do you think he will serve? Where will be his ties? About whose Government and whose people will the fibers of his heart cling and its emotions beat? Will it be for the Government that has oppressed and driven him out from his native land, or for that Government which has treated him thus parentally and kindly? Sir, it would be a thousand fold better naturalization law than all the forms of your statute-books, and residence for five years in your corrupt and corrupting cities in the East.

The policy now incorporated in the bill, as it comes to us from the House, has been adopted in a number of the States. The State which I in part represent is one of them. We did not do it so early as some of our sister States. Illinois, Michigan, Iowa, and, I believe, Wisconsin, adopted the policy earlier than we did. Let me call the attention of the Senator who moves this proposition for a moment to the fact that you are getting now, at this period, a better class of foreign emigration than you formerly did. Many years ago—I do not speak of any particular period—no one came here but those whom abject poverty, and misery, and persecution at home sent here. This was because people abroad had very little faith or confidence in the form of Government, the climate, and the prospects before them here. But, sir, since that time, in more late years, our Government has a better credit and reputation abroad; our institutions are better known, their stable character has been developed; and now it is that you are drawing from abroad a better class of foreign emigrants, with capital, with means, with money in their pockets to invest here. You get, to be sure, with them a more worthless class. The States surrounding Indiana adopted this policy wisely and prudently before we did. They said, the sooner we open up to these foreigners—thinking, intelligent, men of learning and of wealth—the exercise of political rights, and give them an influence and a voice in taxing their property, the readier will they come into our States and settle with us. That was their policy. Indiana saw it in a very short time. We were getting the sediment, the dregs of that emigration. We were getting the heedless, who had no property to tax and no interest in legislation. They only looked to a place to dig on your canals or railroads, or something of that sort. The whole cream of the foreign population, those with wealth, with learning, with stability and character, passed directly through Indiana, and went to Illinois, to Michigan, and to Iowa, leaving us the sediment of that class of population. We, however, took the hint, and reversed our policy. We held a constitutional convention, and adopted the same provision as the States around us—and what has been the result? Why, sir, the valuable portion, the cream of the emigration, settles now with the sediment, and we have a mixture. We now get a portion of the better class and their money to help us to maintain and keep in order the more improvident portion of that population coming among us. We now have a mixture of the good and the bad, and it makes it altogether a much more desirable population.

But, sir, who fears the result of allowing foreigners to go to these Territories? No man will go to Kansas or Nebraska unless he wants to become a farmer, a cultivator of the soil. What injury, what danger is there in allowing such a man to vote? Will he vote to ruin himself? Will he vote to annihilate all his own rights, his own liberty, and his own hopes of prosperity and happiness? I repeat what I said before, on the 2d or 3d of March last, when this question was before us, that the foreigners who come here do not form distinct and separate parties, but they range themselves under the banner of one or the other of the great political parties of the day. They are either Whigs or Democrats, and not Abolitionists. Mostly, I grant you, their sympathies are with the Democratic party. The majority of them vote and act with us. Their sympathies were with us before they came here, and they find those sympathies doubly aroused and doubly strong when they get here, and see the course of treatment of the two parties towards them. No third party do they make. They come and vote with me, or else they vote with my friend from Maryland, [Mr. PEARCE.] If they follow his advice, and range themselves under the banner of his party, they swell the vote which brings a President into the White House, a Senator here, or a Representative to the other House. The consequence is, that if the addition of that vote ruins the country, or brings bad policy, the Senator would have brought it; if it had been in his power. They only vote for the same measures and the same men that he would have voted for. So, on the other hand, if they vote with me, and with the great Democratic party, which has mainly, and I trust will hereafter govern the country so long as it shall be a country of government. When they vote with me and my party, they swell the vote which causes a Representative to be sent to the other House, by adding a few votes more than he otherwise would have got. Has that endangered the liberties of the country? If it has, then the Democratic party would have ruined the country without the foreigner's vote. He votes with the native Whigs or the native Democrats of the country, and only swells the votes either would have given. He only carries out with greater force that policy which the one or the other would have adopted if it were in their power.

Mistake not yourselves, Senators, in supposing that every man who comes and resides here five years is better qualified to vote than than others are the day they land. A great many of the men who come here, come well educated, well-read, well-informed, and, indeed, know all the details of our own history, and of our own Government better than many Senators here know them. Then, sir, as a question of safety and strength to ourselves, give them at the earliest moment you can an interest in the country, and they will be Americans indeed, they will be Americans in heart as well as name. But keep them for five or ten years, deprive them of an early enjoyment of political privileges, and you tend to alienate them instead of attaching their affections to you, your people, and the country and its Constitution. Safety and prudence to ourselves, and justice to them, alike demand this policy, in my judgment.

Again, I say I regret that this question is here, and if it shall return this bill to the other House, which will necessarily defeat it, I shall deeply deplore the consequences. Let me implore Senators to forego their objections to this minor question of expediency, and seize, with fraternal feelings, this opportunity of putting at rest forever the great principle involved in this bill.

Mr. BADGER. Mr. President, I voted for this amendment when it was proposed by my friend from Delaware, to the bill which passed the Senate. I thought the amendment right then; I think it right now; and I have listened to discover what reason there is why I should now vote against an amendment which I before voted for, because I thought it right, and which I still think to be right. Well, sir, what reason has been given to us? We have been entertained by disquisitions upon the subject of the Constitution. I concede that this is no constitutional question. With my views of the subject heretofore expressed in the Senate, that we have an ample and absolute power over these Territories, we of course have a right to model their governments as we think proper, to give the elective suffrage to whom we think proper, and in each, in every, and in all respects, to do with the Territory, and with the people who may choose to go there, as we think just, reasonable, and proper. This is, therefore, no constitutional question. If there were an express provision in the Constitution of the United States, that no man but a native born citizen of the United States should be entitled to vote in any one of the States, it would not in the slightest degree effect the question now under the consideration of the Senate, as far as power is concerned.

Then we have been told that a majority of the House of Representatives is opposed to this amendment. I ask where is the evidence of it? Was any vote taken in the House of Representatives upon this amendment? No, sir. Was an opportunity ever afforded in that House to take a vote upon this amendment? No, sir. We all know perfectly well that the House, having up a bill which had originated in that body, having passed through the ordeal of the Committee of the Whole, and having that bill reported to the House, the gentleman who was at the head of the Territorial Committee of the House immediately moved, as a substitute for the House bill, the bill which had passed the Senate, without the amendment adopted upon the motion of my friend from Delaware, and demanded the previous question. We all know, that question being demanded, and the demand being seconded, no amendment could be moved to the bill, no debate could be had upon the bill, no explanation could be given of the position of members with regard to this particular question, and nothing was left but to vote for or against the bill.

The fact that a majority of the members of the House voted to sustain the demand for the previous question proves not their opinions with regard to this amendment. If I had been a member of that House, I should have voted so myself. We all know the condition of things there. We all know the contest that had been waged. We all know that a protracted discussion had been engaged in, and all the parliamentary tactics, which the rules of the House directly or indirectly allowed, had been used for the purpose of preventing the judgment of the majority of the House being given on that bill. Therefore, if I had been a member of the House, important as I think this amendment to be, I would undoubtedly have voted to sustain the demand for the previous question, and thereby maintain the authority of the majority to determine upon the business of the House.

Hence, Mr. President, it is an assumption, without proof, to say that a majority of that House was opposed to the amendment now proposed by my friend from Maryland. I know gentlemen who concur entirely with me upon that subject, but who voted, nevertheless, to sustain the demand for the previous question, who voted for the bill without this amendment, who looked upon it as decidedly a matter of importance to obtain the amendment, but who, in the circumstances in which they were placed, felt themselves bound as I would have felt myself bound, by higher and loftier considerations even than the question of this amendment, important as it is, to sanction the call for the previous question, and have the judgment of the House upon the measure. Therefore, when we are told that the majority of the House of Representatives is opposed to this amendment, we may be told so by gentlemen very sincerely; gentlemen may have the private expression of the opinion of individual members, and may thus for themselves collect the general sentiment of that House; but there has been no manifestation in the House of the judgment of the House upon it. And, therefore, also, it follows, that when the honorable Senator from Indiana tells us if we adopt this amendment the bill is lost, it is a conclusion founded upon no premises. It is a deduction warranted by no precedent matter. It is a mere opinion, entitled to no greater respect than if I should say, if you adopt this amendment, you will insure the support of the House of Representatives to it.

Well then, sir, believing, as I do, that the principle of the amendment is right, why should I not vote for it? If it be sent to the House of Representatives, and it becomes a question between the two Houses, it is one thing to insist upon such an amendment, to the loss of the bill, and another thing to give to the House of Representatives what, according to their rules, they have never yet had, an opportunity of saying whether they are for or against it. I do not make this amendment a sine qua non. I agree with my friend from Georgia, that there is a principle in this bill more important than is involved in the amendment. If the Senate vote down the amendment, I shall vote for the bill. If the House disagree to the amendment, I, for one, will never consent to lose the bill upon any such disagreement. But I think it is rather too much to ask me to vote against an amendment which I believe to be right, which I believe to be important, which I think contains the recognition of what is valuable, upon a mere hypothesis that the House is opposed to a measure upon which the House has never voted.

Mr. President, I can understand very well the position of a number of my friends in the House of Representatives. I cast no censure upon them, none at all. As I have said, if I had been there, I should have voted with them, and surrendered my particular views in regard to this amendment to the condition of things which made it necessary, to enable the majority of the House to decide upon the pending questions. In this body, thank Heaven, we are under no such necessity. We can here bring forward a question, discuss it, give ample time for its discussion, and when it has been discussed, we can have the judgment of the majority, without waiting days and nights in calling the roll of this body upon questions to adjourn, to adjourn over, and all imaginable technicalities which the rules of order can be made to supply. Therefore, I see no reason why we should not consider this amendment, and why we should not dispose of it.

Now, sir, what is the amendment? Is it unjust or unfair to anybody? It is to allow the citizens of the United States in these Territories to elect the legislative body, and then to determine upon the domestic institutions of the Territories. For one I am perfectly willing to leave it to the judgment of the citizens of the United States, who may be in the Territories, whether the institution of slavery is to be introduced into them or not. But I am not willing to leave it to those who are not citizens of the United States, to men who are poured fresh from the workhouses, from the ignorance, from the filth, from the debasement, which mark the lowest orders in the different countries of Europe; just landed upon our soil, ignorant of our institutions; ignorant, many of them, of everything except the performance of some mechanical operation in a particular trade, or except, perhaps, that one knows how to hoe, and another to delve; men who can neither read nor write; men whose associations have brought them into no contact by which the understanding has been developed; men who have no sympathies with us, or our country; men who are just landed, finding here a refuge from oppression, if you please, or from punishment, if you please, or from starvation, if you please, to determine the political condition of a Territory, which is hereafter to become a State of this Union.

Why, my friend from Indiana would seem, according to his argument, to imply that the longer these persons are here, the less reliable they are. He says, take them fresh, the moment they come here, and let them become proprietors of land.

Well, sir, if they are to wait until they become proprietors of land, I pray you what becomes of the principle of unlimited suffrage? But it is said you must give them the land. Well, how does that qualify them to know what the institutions of the new Territory should be? It may give them a desire that those institutions should be right; but to desire, and to know how to accomplish thing, are two very different qualities. It is true, as the honorable Senator says, that many persons come to settle in this country, who are men of character, men of intelligence, men who, at once, would be able to assume and discharge respectfully the functions of a citizen; but we must recollect that is not the character of the class altogether, nor the character of the class generally. Wherefore, I think, the wisdom of our forefathers was true and right. They required that foreigners should undergo a probation, should live among us, should signify their intention to become citizens; time should elapse afterwards; the eye of the community should be upon them; and evidence should be given finally to their upright deportment their good moral character, their exhibition of an attachment to the institutions of the country, before they were clothed with the character of citizens.

The Senator from Indiana says that citizenship and suffrage are not the same thing. Undoubtedly; but citizenship is the status which is presupposed to exist in every man before he is capable of receiving the right of suffrage. That was the notion of our forefathers. It is a discovery of modern times, that a man may be a political member of a community, so far as to exercise the powers of the ballot-box, to vote for legislators, to elect all the officers of the community, and yet that he should not have a citizenship in the country which he thus aids in governing. When the Constitution of the United States was framed, and it was said therein that the electors of the members of the House of Representatives should be those who, under the State constitutions, were entitled to vote for the most numerous branch of the State Legislature, the idea of unnaturalized foreigners voting had entered the minds of no people, of no State in the Union. I know it is past reach; but, according to my judgment, every provision in the constitution of any State in this Union, which now or hereafter may authorize an unnaturalized foreigner to vote, is in conflict with the spirit and principle of the Constitution of the United States. I know we had in the constitution of my own State, adopted in 1776, a provision which conferred all the rights of citizenship, the power of holding real estate, and the right of voting, upon foreigners who came there to settle, and who had resided twelve months, and taken the oath of allegiance. But we have always considered that from the moment the Constitution of the United States was adopted, conferring the power of naturalization upon this Government, ipso facto that provision of the State constitution was annulled.

Mr. President, although I concede that this is not a paramount matter with me, though I admit there is a high principle in this bill which I will carry out without this amendment if I cannot obtain the amendment; yet I see no reason why, believing the amendment to be right, I should not vote for it now, as I voted for it when it was proposed before, and when I then deemed it to be right. If it had been the case, that a decided and undoubted expression of the opinion of the House of Representatives had been obtained upon this amendment and found to be adverse to it, I should vote against it; but no such opinion having been expressed, no opportunity having been afforded for its expression, no evidence being furnished but that a majority of that House is for it, I wish to put the amendment here, and give the House an opportunity of saying, whether it meets their approbation or not. If it does not, I shall not be for losing the bill for want of the amendment.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, I think it probable that my naked vote upon this subject, either one way or the other, would not be very well understood; and the occasion, perhaps, is one that requires of me to make a few remarks, by way of explaining the course I may think proper to pursue upon this subject. Justice to others, and justice to myself, require it.

The issues which have grown out of this bill scarcely leave any gentleman the right to consult his independent judgment. I am free to say so.

I may, in limine, say, that if I had been in the House of Representatives, I should have voted with the one hundred and thirteen, in favor of the bill without this provision. I will say, further, that whether the amendment be adopted or not, I shall vote for this bill. Nay, further, I do not know but that there may be such a change of circumstances, during to-day or to-morrow, as may require of me, rather than to put this bill in jeopardy, by sending it back to the other House, or putting it in a position where it will be subjected to the hazards of parliamentary proceedings, to waive the opinion—the very strong opinion—which I entertain upon this subject. I have already given a vote in favor of the amendment. It was not introduced at my instance; or on consultation with me or my friends. I believed it right, and I voted for it. I think I have gone very far in reconciling myself to vote for this bill, with some of the principles which have been attributed to it by those who are likely to vote for it. I have gone very far, when I admit that I shall vote for the bill, whether it contain this amendment or not.

Now, sir, we propose to bring into existence two sovereign States; and at this time, as far as our legislative Government goes, we are to influence their destiny. As has been said by my honorable friend from Indiana, we are about to give to the people of Kansas and Nebraska a blank piece of paper, or a stone, upon which they are to write the laws that are to influence the destiny of those republics. I am one of those who do not believe that any people settling upon our Territories have the right of self-appropriation. I do not believe in the principle that the transient population settling upon our Territories have the right of self-investiture of sovereignty, to shape out with their fingers what shall be the boundaries of this State or that State; or to assume, without the previous action of Congress, the right of forming themselves into a State, and forming such a constitution as they may think proper. Therefore, when I delegate to any people this very high office, this important function of making laws, and of doing more, of putting into existence institutions which are to influence the destinies of this Confederacy, I have a right to pause. In doing this I am not willing, for one, to give the right of suffrage or the right of voting, for those who are to make the laws, to any but those who are, by birth or by naturalization, American citizens.

I have been told that there are those who live abroad who would have equal capability with Senators here to form a system of laws. I shall not dispute it; and perhaps if, by my legislative choice, I could discriminate so far as to select this man or that man to be a citizen and make laws for me, I might be willing to assume upon myself the office of doing so. But, sir, it is a different thing when we are to invite foreigners to come here—foreigners who are unaccustomed even to the principles of the common law, the magna charta from which we derive all our notions, not red republicans from France or from Germany. When the selection is not to be confined to those who have in some measure been accustomed to the administration of the English law, either in Great Britain or Ireland, I would pause for a long time before I would devolve such an office on those who have been invited here, and especially after I have seen the demonstration that has been made by irresponsible crowds of foreigners not knowing what they are about. Have I not already seen that Abolitionists have invited this very class of persons to join them? Under their influence, they have met and have dared to burn in effigy one of the American Senators, for acting upon the grave responsibilities of his position here in this Senate house. If the option were given to me to allow such persons to come and vote, I would exclude them, whilst I might admit a very different class. I have, therefore, strong opinions upon this subject—not constitutional I grant. I admit the practice has varied. I have taken some pains to have a synopsis of your laws upon this subject prepared, and I will state it to the Senate.

NORTHWEST TERRITORY.—Ordinance 1787.

Qualification of Voters.—That a freehold in fifty acres of land in the district, having been a citizen of one of the States, and being resident in the district, or the like freehold and two years residence in the district, shall be necessary to qualify a man as an elector of a Representative.

1798. MISSISSIPPI.—Same as the above; ordinance 1787.

1800. INDIANA.—Same.

1804. LOUISIANA.—Legislative Council.

1805. MICHIGAN.—Same as the ordinance 1787.

1809. ILLINOIS.—Same as the ordinance 1787.

1812. Additional legislation on the subject, as follows:

That upon the admission of the Illinois Territory into the second grade of territorial government, in conformity with the provisions of the act entitled "An act for dividing Indiana into two separate governments," each and every free white male person who shall have attained the age of twenty-one years, and who shall have paid a county or territorial tax, and who shall have resided one year in said Territory previous to any general election, and be at the time of any such election a resident thereof, shall be entitled to vote for members of the Legislative Council and House of Representatives for the said Territory.

[First departure from the ordinance 1787.]

1812. MISSOURI.—That all free white male citizens of the United States, above the age of twenty-one years, who have resided in said Territory twelve months next preceding an election, and who shall have paid a territorial or county tax, assessed at least six months previous thereto, shall be entitled to vote for representatives to the General Assembly of said Territory.

1817. ALABAMA.—Same as ordinance of 1787.

1819. ARKANSAS.—Same as Missouri, 1812.

1836. WISCONSIN.—[Freehold qualification first stricken out.]—That every free white male citizen of the United States, above the age of twenty-one years, who shall have been an inhabitant of said Territory at the time of its organization, shall be entitled to vote at the first election, and shall be eligible to any office within said Territory: Provided, That the right of suffrage shall be exercised only by citizens of the United States.

1838. IOWA.—Same as Wisconsin.

1849. MINNESOTA.—Same as Wisconsin and Iowa, with the additional words in the proviso, and those who shall have declared, on oath, their intention to become such, and shall have taken an oath to support the Constitution of the United States, and the provisions of this act.

From this statement of our laws on the subject it will be seen that our legislation has shown a great degree of indifference in regard to it, by those who have superintended it. At one time it would have been very wrong of Congress to require none but citizens to vote, when, in fact, the Territories were so remote that citizens could not very well get there. Hence, in the early settlement of the country, many persons did vote who were not citizens; but they were required to be actual residents, and a property qualification was imposed. In 1809 actual settlers, with one year's residence, were allowed to vote.

In view of this variation in our policy on this subject, I am free to say I have no constitutional scruples. My objection is broadly to the policy of devolving upon unnaturalized persons coming from abroad the right of shaping our territorial governments. I do not know what course I might have taken if this were a new question; but I have considered the subject, and I have brought my mind to this conclusion. I do not say that my objections are so insuperable that they may not be overcome; but at present I retain them, and they are very strong upon the subject.

Mr. PRATT. Mr. President, when this amendment was originally introduced by the honorable Senator from Delaware to the Senate bill, I voted for it; and it is known to that Senator, and to other Senators on this floor, that I had a right to expect that if his amendment were incorporated into the bill he would vote with me for it. But although his amendment was incorporated into the bill, he did not vote for the measure; and in that respect I was disappointed.

Mr. President, I made no speech upon the subject of this bill, nor do I design to make one. It has been my habit, when others on this floor have fully discussed the principles of any measure so that they could go to our common constituency, to rest myself satisfied with my vote in accordance with what I thought right. The friends of this measure have believed, I believe, that it contains one great principle which will prevent future successful agitation upon the subject of slavery, and that principle is that the people of the Territories, irrespective of any congressional action, should regulate that matter for themselves.

Now, I can readily understand why my honorable friend from Delaware may very consistently press this amendment here, because, although it should be adopted, he would yet vote against the bill; and the very reason which deters me from voting as I did before for the amendment, is an apprehension of the defeat of the measure if it be adopted. That, however, would be an inducement to the honorable Senator to advocate and press the amendment, which has been again introduced. But my honorable friend from North Carolina says we have no evidence that the majority of the House of Representatives is opposed to the principle of the amendment of the honorable Senator from Delaware, because no vote was there taken upon it. Why, sir, I apprehend that my honorable friend should be aware that those who had the management of this measure in the other branch of the National Legislature, would hardly have pursued the course they did unless they were aware that the bill would be defeated if this amendment had been retained in it. But I submit to the Senate, whether the law of Illinois, as read by the honorable Senator who has just taken his seat, does not show conclusively that this amendment were contained in the bill it would lose very many votes which it obtained in the House of Representatives. By the constitution of that State, as read by the honorable Senator from South Carolina, every free white male resident, being of a certain age, is entitled to vote, provided he has paid taxes.

Mr. BUTLER. My friend from Maryland is, perhaps, laboring under a slight error. I did not read from the constitution of Illinois; nor do I know what her constitution is now so far as regards the qualification of voters; but I read from the act of Congress for the formation of the Illinois Territory, the provision that all persons who resided there one year, and had paid a county or territorial tax, should be allowed to vote.

Mr. PRATT. I only designed to bring to the view of the Senate, that not only Illinois, but other States of the Union, allow them to vote for all their State officers, and under the second section of the first article of the constitution, they are, per se, entitled to vote for all Federal officers; that there are other States besides Illinois which allow every person to vote. They are not particularly interested, except so far as the common welfare of our general country is concerned in this great principle which I have brought to your attention. Is it not more than we can expect, if this bill is sent back to the House of Representatives, that these gentlemen will vote to exclude very many of those persons who have put them in the seats which they occupy?

It is a matter, however, of details to which I have paid very little attention, but those who have, will readily see that this of itself would tend to detract from the bill very many votes which were obtained in the other House, and many more than would be sufficient to obtain its passage. Now, my friend from North Carolina supposes—and to that notion the honorable Senator from Delaware [Mr. CLAYTON] nodded assent as if he concurred in it—that if the amendment be adopted, the bill will go back to the House of Representatives, and the only effect will be for the House to say that they will or will not concur in the amendment, and that then it will come here, and we are to say whether we shall recede from it or not. Mr. President, that is not so.

Mr. BADGER. You are much mistaken.

Mr. PRATT. I am much mistaken, sir? I should be glad to be corrected, if I am mistaken. But as I understand it, the bill which passed the Senate has not passed the House; but they have taken up an original bill which was introduced into the House. Hence this is not a Senate bill, but it is a bill which has passed the House, so that if we pass it with an amendment, it goes back, and it is not only the amendment which comes under the consideration of the House, but the whole bill, and this whole subject of agitation is introduced anew into the House precisely as if it were first brought there to-day. That I apprehend to be so. Therefore the dangers which the honorable Senator seems to suppose exist only in the imagination of those who have spoken upon this side of the question, I humbly apprehend do in reality exist.

Mr. BROWN. I think the honorable Senator wholly misunderstands the rule of the House of Representatives. If the bill goes back to the House with this amendment, the simple question will be as to whether the House will concur in the amendment.

Mr. PETTIT. May they not order the bill to lie on the table, or refer it to the Committee of the Whole?

Mr. BROWN. If the opponents have the power they may, but they have shown that they have not the power. Have they not fought two or three weeks over it?

Mr. PETTIT. They can order it to lie on the table or refer it to the Committee of the Whole, and never get it out again. I have seen such things done there.

Mr. PRATT. Mr. President, I do not profess to be familiar either with the parliamentary rules of the House or of the Senate. It is a subject which has never very deeply engaged my attention; but I apprehend, sir, according to the common sense of the thing, if this bill goes back to the House in which it originated, that House may offer any amendment to the bill it pleases.

Mr. PETTIT. Certainly it may.

Several SENATORS. Oh no.

Mr. PRATT. You see there is a great difference of opinion. Some say "Oh yes," others "Oh no."

Mr. PETTIT. They must concur in the amendment.

Mr. PRATT. Yes, sir; and they can offer an amendment to the amendment; or introduce a bill in the shape of an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. BROWN. I understand that an amendment offered must be germane to this amendment, and they cannot amend the general provisions of the bill.

Mr. DOUGLAS. They can kill the bill by ordering it to lie upon the table.

Mr. BROWN. Oh yes; the Senator says they can kill the bill by ordering it to lie upon the table. So they may; and so they might have killed it at any time during the last six weeks or two months, but they have not done it.

Mr. PRATT. It is sufficient for my argument that they certainly will have the subject up again by a motion to lie on the table, if I am wrong—and I do not think I am—in the general proposition which I have submitted. Now, allow me to submit to the honorable Senator from Delaware, [Mr. CLAYTON,] who is not for the bill even if this amendment be adopted, and to my honorable friend from North Carolina, [Mr. BADGER,] who is for it whether the amendment be adopted or not, why does the Senator want his amendment? Is it to defeat the bill? He is against it even if the amendment be adopted. Why does he want it? I give him credit for supposing—for I really believe he wants it because he thinks—that it contains a great American principle, and one which ought to be adopted; and I agree with him. But is there no other way in which he can attain that object? Does the passage of his amendment upon this bill attain it? Why, sir, we have now in existence the territorial governments of Minnesota, Washington, Oregon, and perhaps others—but those three are enough to mention for my purpose—containing this very provision. Now, does he wipe out this stain, as he would term it, upon the government of the country, by making his amendment to this bill, and suffering the same principle to be retained in the territorial governments now in existence? If the object of the honorable Senator from Delaware be, as I suppose it to be, simply to have incorporated in the legislation of this country this great American principle, that none but American citizens should be allowed to rule in the country, let him introduce a general bill, altering all the territorial governments in that particular, and he will find every southern man who is here now, supporting this bill, and going against his amendment, going with him.

I submit to all those who have spoken, or who have not spoken upon this amendment, whether it would not be correct, in point of policy, for those who desire in reality the incorporation of this American principle, advocated by the Senator from Delaware, to introduce a bill here placing it in all the territorial governments of the Union? That would be the true plan, sir. The true plan is not to place it upon this bill, and run the risk of having defeated a bill which has already produced so much agitation throughout the whole country, and to send it back to the House, where that agitation will be continued, because its incorporation here will insure no one isolated beneficial purpose. It still leaves in the legislation of our country the same principle; and you would then have to adopt a general law, as I propose the Senate shall do now.

Mr. President, I shall vote against the amendment, although I feel as deeply as the Senator from Delaware, or any other Senator upon this floor can feel, the want of policy in suffering foreigners to take upon themselves, before they are naturalized, the garb of American citizens. Although I feel it as strongly as any man here, and am prepared to resist it, yet I think its proper place is not upon this bill.

It is not for Congress, Mr. President, unless you can amend your Constitution, to initiate this proceeding. The remedy is with the people themselves. We find that that remedy has already commenced its career. We find that these separate foreign political organizations throughout the country, superinduced or not by the course indicated by the Senator from South Carolina, are raising an American spirit in the land, which is to answer the purpose of getting rid of this stain upon our escutcheon. It must be public opinion, sir, the public opinion of the native and naturalized citizens of this country which is to cure this evil; and it cannot be cured by putting the amendment on the bill which is now upon your table. I believe it will be cured. The spirit is now abroad. The people of this great country, native and naturalized, are not willing to see their birth-right subject to the foreign importations of those to whom the Senator has alluded, or of others who may come here voluntarily for their own interest. I have trespassed, Mr. President, longer upon the time of the Senate than I intended.

Mr. HUNTER. Mr. President, as an abstract question, I certainly should prefer the bill as it went from the Senate; that is, with the so-called Clayton amendment, to that which has been returned to us from the House, the two bills differing only, as I understand, in that respect. If I had to frame a bill myself, and to consult only my own judgment in reference to it, I certainly should prefer the Senate bill to that which is now under consideration. But, sir, I am not allowed to consider it in reference only to my own judgment; I must consider the circumstances under which it is returned to us. I believe that the effect of putting on this amendment will be to hazard the bill in the House of Representatives; and I do not choose to try such an experiment on a measure of so much importance. Experimentum in vili corpore. It must be upon some cheap substance that we can venture to try such experiments as these, and not upon a bill which may involve the peace and harmony of the whole country. I cannot demonstrate that the adoption of this amendment would destroy the bill in the House of Representatives. I cannot, perhaps, produce evidence that would satisfy my friend from North Carolina that it would even hazard it. But such evidence has been adduced to me as satisfies me that the adoption of this amendment to the bill will not only hazard it in the House, but may destroy it. There are various ways in which it might be destroyed. It might be laid on the table. I have seen such things attempted. It might be committed to the Committee of the Whole. At any rate, it would be a signal for the renewal of that agitation from which the country has already derived no good; and which I should be unwilling to see renewed merely for the sake of this amendment. I have no idea that it will be possible to pass the bill with the amendment; and I would rather have the bill without it than see the whole measure destroyed, and all the labors of the session, in regard to this exciting question, rendered abortive.

But suppose it was as the Senator from North Carolina imagines, that the only question was upon this amendment, that the House of Representatives would not consent to renew the agitation; that there would be no one there who would be so irritated as to move that the bill lie upon the table; that there would be none there who would seek to refer it to the Committee of the Whole; still it is to be considered what might be the effect and result of the question thus presented. It would be upon this naked question of the amendment, and nothing else; if we can suppose all these propitious circumstances to exist in regard to the action upon it, who then would determine this question? Why, it might be that the enemies of the bill, with a small minority of its supporters, would fix that amendment upon it, and thus our northern friends, who have come forward to sustain the bill, and risk so much in order to repeal the Missouri restriction, a repeal which we value so highly, might have to go home and meet the responsibility of the measure with this obnoxious restriction upon it. Would that be fair, sir? We understand that the bill, as it is, was brought in and carried through upon a compromise between its northern and southern friends. Northern sentiment conceded something in repealing the Missouri restriction. Southern sentiment conceded something in agreeing to reject what was called the Clayton amendment. It seems to me that it is fair, and just, and proper for us to ratify that understanding, and to pass the bill as it came from the House. From these considerations I shall vote against the amendment; although I say, if I had nothing to consult but the simple suggestions of my own judgment, I should vote for it. But, under existing circumstances, I do not feel at liberty to peril the bill by affixing to it such an amendment. I shall therefore vote against it.

Mr. BELL. I desire to give an explanation of my vote on this subject before the question is taken. I do not wish now to occupy the attention of the Senate long. The honorable Senator from Illinois has intimated to me the desire to have the questions preliminary to the passage of the bill taken this evening.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Yes, sir; and debate it tomorrow on the question of its passage.

Mr. BELL. But, before I vote, I shall desire to make an explanation. I shall not detain the Senate long; but I wish now to reply to the honorable Senator from Virginia particularly, because my vote on this question will be regulated somewhat by the sentiment which has been expressed by various gentlemen who are friends of the bill. I am of the opinion, Mr. President, that if the bill goes to the House, the amendment will not be concurred in, if it shall be made by the Senate.

Mr. PETTIT. There is no possibility of it. Mr. BELL. It will not be concurred in. That is the opinion of the Senator from Virginia, also; and, therefore, he will not vote to ingraft it on the bill. I believe, however, that the honorable Senator voted for the amendment when offered by the honorable Senator from Delaware at the time the bill was formerly under our consideration?

Mr. HUNTER. I did.

Mr. BELL. And I understand the honorable Senator now to say, that if it were anything but a mere abstract question which was involved, he would vote for it now?

Mr. HUNTER. I did not say if it were anything but an abstract question; I said that if it were a mere abstract question I would vote for it now, if I had nothing to consider but the suggestion of my own judgment. I did not mean to say that it was not of importance, but that it was not of sufficient importance to hazard the bill upon it.

Mr. BELL. I understood the Senator to say that if it was anything but an abstract question, he would vote for it now, but there are considerations behind which will restrain him. He is of the opinion that it will not be concurred in by the House. Does the honorable Senator infer that the bill will be lost if the House does not concur in the amendment?

Mr. HUNTER. Does the Senator ask my opinion? I am assured by those who I think are good judges of the sentiment of the House, that the bill would be endangered. I received that assurance not ten minutes ago, from a friend of the bill.

Mr. BELL. But, although he is in favor of this amendment upon principle, he will waive it on the ground that he wants another greater and higher principle established. Various gentlemen on all sides have taken the same position. I presume I know what the opinions of many of these Senators are as to that point, but I do not remember that any of them distinctly stated what that higher principle was which they supposed would be established by the bill, and which would induce them, therefore, to waive all the opinions which they held as to the expediency and importance of this amendment.

Mr. TOOMBS. I will tell the Senator, as far as I am concerned, that it was the repeal of the Missouri restriction which was the principle.

Mr. BELL. I understand that. I should like to hear from some of the gentlemen what they mean in regard to it. The honorable Senator from Virginia has also indicated that that is the great object. The honorable Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. BUTLER,] upon another occasion, stated significantly, and in expressive language, that he expected nothing else, but to take that thorn from his side. Am I wrong in attributing that sentiment to the honorable Senator? That is the great principle to be established.

Mr. BUTLER. If the honorable Senator alludes to me, I will still repeat, that I believe, if the northern people would voluntarily and in good faith repeal the Missouri compromise, and it were a contest upon a mere fictitious issue, whether it resulted to one or the other, it would withdraw a festering thorn from the side of the South. That was my opinion.

Mr. BELL. I understood it. It was a fine feeling and a patriotic one, according to his judgment, of the effect of the bill.

Mr. BUTLER. But in reference to this, if I should be reduced to the necessity of saying whether I would vote for this amendment or not, it would be, I am free to say, because I would not, in any vote which I could give, do injustice to my own friends from the South, and much less would I perform any office that would have the appearance of deserting my friends from the North.

Mr. BELL. I understand that, and I assure the Senator that I appreciate his feelings. I will say that I have considered seriously whether I could separate myself from my friends from the South when there seemed to be a generous tender from the North of the principle which is proposed to be established by this bill, but that is neither here nor there just now.

But another Senator who sits near me [Mr. BADGER] spoke also of the high principle, the higher and more important and fundamental principle, that will induce him to vote for this bill, though the amendment in support of which he has argued so ingeniously and ably, giving very strong and cogent reasons for it, to which many people of the country will respond, be not adopted. He has not stated what that principle is which he wishes to establish.

Mr. BADGER. I not only stated it, but I really thought if my friend from Tennessee had either heard my speech on the Nebraska bill, or read it, or heard of it, he would have known what it was. [Laughter.]

Mr. BELL. I want to know it now, if the honorable Senator will please to state it.

Mr. BADGER. The honorable Senator can send for a copy of the speech which I delivered, and see what it is.

Mr. BELL. I heard the honorable Senator make his speech; but I wanted to know whether he corresponded in sentiment with the honorable Senators from Virginia, South Carolina, and Georgia; and if it was his great object to remove that stigma from the legislation of the United States, or that violation of the Constitution rather.

Mr. TOOMBS. That is my great object.

Mr. BELL. That I understand. The honorable Senators will remember that I do not reproach them. I have not the slightest disposition to question their motives or the correctness of them. They have a perfect right to act on their principles; but I want to know the correspondence that exists between these honorable gentlemen now. The honorable Senator from Indiana [Mr. PERRIN] has another consideration which sways him; for he expects that the cauldron which is boiling, if we do not settle the question now, will continue to boil, and that there may be innumerable other influences set in motion at the North before the next Congress. He is of opinion that if the bill goes back to the House with the amendment, it will not carry; and if we do not pass the bill now, he says that the country will never again have an opportunity to establish this great fundamental principle.

Mr. PETTIT. I did not say "never." I said it would endanger it for years to come.

Mr. BELL. The honorable Senator drew a description of the country, at the North particularly. Now, I was struck by his views. I do not know but that he is right in regard to the question, and whether it would not be for the interest of the country to settle the question now, if this great principle is to be established. That is what I say, if it is important to the welfare of the country, and to the Union of these States, that the principle should be, or can be, established by this bill. If that is so, I agree with the honorable Senator.

But I want to know what that great fundamental principle is which the honorable Senator from Indiana thinks so important to establish in this country; that if we do not get it now he does not know whether we can ever get it, because we do not know what will be the condition of the next Congress.

Mr. PETTIT. The fundamental principle to which I referred was substantially that stated by the Senator from Georgia—that is, the carrying of the same policy and the same political rights all over our territory, the giving to the people of the whole Union the same political rights over every foot of the territory, North and South.

Mr. BELL. Is that what the honorable Senator from Michigan means by the term "squatter sovereignty?"

Mr. PETTIT. No, sir.

Mr. BELL. I am at a loss again. Perhaps the honorable Senator from Mississippi [Mr. BROWN] can enlighten me upon this subject. What is the great fundamental principle to be established by this bill, which makes it so important that we should pass the bill without the Clayton amendment, and not hazard it a day in the House? Honorable Senators will understand me; I mean to conduct myself with perfect fairness towards them. They have expressed the greatest apprehensions that the principle will escape, and which the Senator from Indiana seemed to insinuate would escape forever if not established at this time. I want to know now whether that is the principle of squatter sovereignty? I do not mean to disparage the principle of the right of the people to govern their own concerns and establish their own domestic institutions. I do not mean to state anything inconsistent with the principles which I held on the legislation of 1850. I do not mean to involve myself in any inconsistency as to the doctrines that I held or practiced upon, but what I want to do is to see if I can reconcile the jarring opinions, or what seem to be the jarring opinions, of those honorable Senators who have expressed so great an interest on this question.

Mr. PRATT. Will the Senator permit me to interrupt him on this point?

Mr. BELL. If the Senator wants to answer any question, I will with pleasure.

Mr. PRATT. I desire to answer a question; but I will not interrupt the Senator.

Mr. BELL. Certainly; if that is all, I will yield.

Mr. PRATT. I desire to state for myself, you may call it "squatter sovereignty," or what you please.

Mr. BELL. I do not use that term.

Mr. PRATT. The principle of this bill, which I denominate the great principle, which we ought not to surrender, was, in the first place, that it struck out the Missouri compromise line; and, in the second place, that it adopted in its stead the principle that the people inhabiting the Territory should decide for themselves the Government under which they should live.

Mr. BELL. Well, I inferred as much as that, though I did not know that the honorable Senator had such an objection to the Missouri compromise. I thought it was another great principle which he had in view—the principle of non-intervention in the affairs of the Territories by Congress—which I have not heard mentioned to-day, that I remember. That great principle of non-intervention in the affairs of the Territory was the origin of this bill. That is the principle which I understood to be aimed at originally by the honorable Senator from Illinois. I did not think there was so much a disposition to set aside the Missouri compromise, because it was a hated thing in any section of the country, but only to give them liberty to get this tabula rasa, this plain sheet of paper, on which we could carry out the great doctrine of non-intervention.

Now, if I have done injustice to what were the opinions and views of the honorable Senators at the outset of this argument, I beg their pardon; and I shall be ready to admit it when they explain. I thought it was the principle of non-intervention which was held to be so important. I thought that was the doctrine of the Senator from North Carolina at that time, and that he had no hostility particularly to the Missouri compromise. On the contrary, I thought that the honorable Senator held that it was perfectly constitutional, and that it was only necessary to repeal the compromise in order to give place to the principle of non-intervention.

In regard to this amendment, I mistook the Senator from Virginia, in the outset of his remarks, in relation to its being an abstract question. But I would ask that honorable Senator, and I will also ask the honorable Senator from South Carolina, if they have not yielded up, one after another, in the support of this bill, every principle contended for by the ultra State Rights party of the South, except the simple repeal of that compromise?—whether they have not made a general free-will offering and sacrifice to our northern friends?

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, I certainly would not undertake to be the exponent of the State Rights party from the South; but I do not know any constitutional principle that we have yielded.

Mr. BELL. Then I understand again. That is a new revelation. I understand that the honorable Senator thinks that the Constitution will protect slavery in these Territories, pass it when you will.

Mr. BUTLER. I understand, if you take away all restrictions, and give us a fair chance, we are as good as anybody else. [Laughter.]

Mr. BELL. That brings me to another question. I thank the honorable Senator, because it enables me to introduce a little more gracefully the idea I wanted to bring in, which it would otherwise have taken some circumlocution to get at. Why the necessity with those honorable Senators, who rely on the integrity and inviolability of the Constitution, of repealing the Missouri compromise?

Mr. TOOMBS. Will the Senator allow me to answer him?

Mr. BELL. Certainly.

Mr. TOOMBS. The principle which I understood I was supporting, was the amendment of the honorable Senator from Illinois, for which you voted, and for which I voted; for this repeal you and I both voted.

Mr. BELL. The repeal of the principle of the Missouri compromise.

Mr. TOOMBS. For the principle of the bill, and the amendment which the Senator from Illinois introduced, you and I voted, and agreed to in the caucus of his friends.

Mr. BELL. That is not a fair answer to the question which I put; and I would not have asked such a question of the honorable Senator, though I will not complain of it. I shall have occasion, perhaps, to explain it. With regard to the repeal of the Missouri compromise upon constitutional grounds, the honorable Senator says I voted for it when offered as an amendment. That is not an answer to the question, I respectfully submit. He says his great object is to secure the repeal of the Missouri compromise, because it was an unconstitutional act, and that is the great principle which he will not hazard by voting for the Clayton amendment. I do not know whether the honorable Senator voted for that.

Mr. TOOMBS. I was not here when it was voted upon. I shall vote against it now.

Mr. BELL. The honorable Senator says he will vote against it now, which implies very strongly, I think, that he would have voted for it then. That brings up what I want to state to the honorable Senators from South Carolina and Virginia. Suppose they are violating no principle, that they are making no sacrifice to the honorable Senator from Illinois, and to the northern gentlemen who have gone for this bill, because they consider they are shielded still by thategis of the Constitution which heretofore has protected the rights of the slaveholder in all the Territories since the Government of the United States was in operation over them by act of Congress, what I wanted to know was why the necessity of this bill, if the Missouri compromise act was unconstitutional? As I have already said, (not in this debate,) again and again, I thought there was no warrant in the Constitution to authorize its passage. I have said out of the Congress of the United States, and before the people, perhaps a hundred times, that if the South saw proper to make an issue upon this slave question, it should have been done in those times when there was great agitation in the South upon this subject, and when these questions came up for consideration in 1820-'21. That was the time when the South should have stood by what they considered their rights, and should not have yielded. They were then strong. The North was not feeble, to be sure, but the South might expect to have stood successfully on that occasion. It would have been at some hazard, it is true, but then was the time to have made resistance to this measure.

Now, in regard to those gentlemen who contend that that act was unconstitutional, and therefore ought to be repealed, when it was proclaimed that this principle of non-intervention was an important one to be established in the country, or recognized by the Congress of the United States, why did not they rely upon the protection of the Constitution? I had intended to put the question, whether it was not intervention instead of non-intervention in fact? We know that the compromise acts of 1850 left New Mexico and Utah free territory. Well, what did the honorable Senators who hold these extreme opinions in the South then rely upon? What did those who agreed to that compromise rely upon? What did the honorable Senator from Georgia rely upon on that occasion when he supported those bills? It was, as I understand, the desire to stand on the Constitution, and to establish this principle of non-intervention, and to allow the people to settle and arrange their institutions under that Constitution? The Territories of Utah and New Mexico, when they came into the Union, were free Territories by the law of Spain and Mexico. The question was raised, whether that really was prohibitory; whether that was the condition of the country, and whether slaves could go there with safety? Those who were in favor of the compromise bills said, whether they can or not, we will risk the judicial tribunals in the decision of the question. Then why, if the principle of non-intervention was incorporated in this bill, as I thought it was at first, interfere or insist on now what seems to be a mere abstraction, the repealing of the Missouri compromise, after that principle was adopted by a large majority of the Senate? It was supposed, at that period of time, that slavery might go into Kansas and Nebraska, because it was slave Territory by the laws of the country from which we acquired it. They did not stop with the removal of the Missouri compromise, but they further went on to interpose or intervene by abrogating the effect of the treaty of 1803.

But, sir, I do not mean to go into an argument on this question. I mean to say now, that with regard to this proposition, I voted for it before. It was near the close of the debate in the Senate on the bill; and at that time, I understood that every southern Senator was in favor of it; and when that question was mooted about the House, it was believed that no bill could be carried through there; that southern members would not vote for it unless that amendment was incorporated into it; and when that was voted in, I did not believe the North would vote for it; so that the bill, as it was agreed to by the Senate, it was presumed, could not be carried through the House.

Mr. President, at that time, as well as now, I did not see that there is the same interest or importance involved in the question which the honorable Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. BADGER,] or the honorable Senator from Maryland [Mr. PEARCE] conceive to be in this proposition. Formerly it was understood that the bill could not pass the House. There was some question, perhaps, whether with the Clayton amendment in, if fully considered, it would not, at all events, diminish the vote in the Senate, but for the prospect of striking it out in the House of Representatives. I remember very well that I was struck by an argument used by an honorable Senator either from Iowa or Wisconsin, which was presented very briefly. It was asked, when the amendment was moved by the Senator from Delaware, why will you make this invidious and odious discrimination between the privileges of foreigners going into Minnesota and those going into Nebraska, which is just adjoining? It looks a little unreasonable, and it is what these people can never understand or comprehend. It will create ill-feeling, and may lay the foundation of ill-feeling.

But with the principles of this bill now, as they stand incorporated in it, coming from the House without the Clayton amendment, or as we sent it from the Senate, it can be of no great importance whether these people be admitted to vote in that Territory or not. The difference is the time that must elapse between the declaration of their intentions to become citizens of the United States and the expiration of their terms. It necessarily implies those very feelings described by the honorable Senator from Iowa, [Mr. DODGE,] I think it was, before the bill passed from this body. If I considered that it was of such great importance as the honorable Senators from North Carolina and Georgia, and other Senators have stated, that we should risk nothing by the Clayton amendment, I would vote against it now. If I could be convinced that the condition of things described by the Senator from Indiana would arise at another session of Congress, and that the common sense or patriotism of the country, including the South as well as any portion of the North, would not forbear to press such a species of legislation as was calculated to produce an effect so appalling to every patriot, then I would not vote for it.

Again, if honorable Senators from the South have made up their minds that there is a principle of such high importance involved in this bill, a principle connected with the stability of our institutions, the integrity of the Constitution, and the preservation of the Union, I have nothing to say. They are right, according to their own judgment; and if I believed that there was the high principle alluded to by the honorable Senator from North Carolina, I do not think I would risk it there. But what I mean to say is, that if honorable Senators from the South hold these opinions, that there is great importance to be attached, as they say there is, to the passage of this bill, and so great and fundamental a principle is to be established by it, then I think they ought not to vote for this amendment, and, if I understood that was the sense of a clear majority of southern gentlemen on the subject, I should not vote for it myself; but, sir, I know of no means of drawing such a conclusion, that I can rest upon satisfactorily. If honorable Senators from the South have made up their minds to vote for this bill, without the amendment, whether it carries or not, I think there is a very decisive reason, which has not been stated yet by any gentleman, why they should so vote.

If the South shows a disposition to exclude these aliens until they become naturalized citizens under the laws of naturalization as they stand, when we know that some half a million are flowing in upon us every year, and that these new Territories, and not only these, but every other Territory in the northwest, is soon to be filled up with this class of population, they will go with the feeling that the slaveholding States of the Union would have excluded them if they could; that it was their purpose and disposition to do it, but they voted in vain because they were in a minority; and why would we, and why should we, implant such a feeling as that in the bosom of whole districts and counties of these German emigrants, to say nothing of the Irish who are likely to go there, unless we can do it with effect at all events? At the time when this proposition was made in the Senate the argument was that there was something more than a mere abstraction in this bill, and some few honorable Senators, not many of them, said to me privately that they thought there was a chance that slavery would go into the Territory of Kansas. That was one idea which honorable Senators may have had at that time in support of this bill.

Mr. President, I have stated my sentiments incoherently, because they have all occurred to me in the progress of this debate. I mean to say that if honorable Senators, and those from the South particularly, have made up their minds to vote for this bill, whether the Clayton amendment is attached to it or not, I consider it impolitic that they should do so. They ought not to show what their disposition was without power to execute any scheme of policy in relation to it. To be sure, it might all result in having no decided effect in that foreigners would go in, and it might never be inquired what section of the Union was favorable to them, and what was not.

The honorable Senator from Virginia [Mr. HUNTER] spoke of the sacrifice of the South. He is disposed to give up certain notions of policy which he had, on account of the risk which northern gentlemen have incurred in supporting this measure. Well, sir, it is a generous principle and policy, and the avowal of it is frank and manly. It is on account of the northern friends of the South, who have gone in and risked whatever was to be risked at the North by going for the repeal of the Missouri compromise, that several Senators from the South have declared their determination to sacrifice their own opinions upon such questions as these of mere expediency, where they think no great principle is involved. I repeat, I think it manly and generous, at all events.

Sir, I shall vote for the amendment, although I do it with some hesitation, because I feel the weight of the remarks of the honorable Senator from Indiana. I do not know what the decision of the Senate will be; yet, sir, if there be a majority who will adhere to it, I believe the bill never can become a law.

Mr. TOOMBS. If the honorable Senator from Tennessee had confined his remarks to a defense of his own position, which I think needed it, rather than assailing that of other Senators on this floor, I should not have further participated in this debate. As to the advice which he gives to the friends of the bill, with reference to how they should act on this amendment, I presume they will be something like myself—a little tired of taking advice from such a quarter. The Senator complains that he does not understand the great principles which this bill establishes. I know no Senator who has had better opportunities of understanding them than he has had. I know that he met, upon a call of its friends, time after time; and that we discussed the clause of the bill in which these principles are contained which have agitated this country from one end of the Union to the other; and I know that when it was agreed upon by the friends of the bill, North and South, East and West, Whig and Democrat, he came here and recorded his vote for the clause as I and other friends of the bill did. The very question of the repeal of the Missouri restriction; the very question of taking this subject out of the Congress of the United States and giving it to the people of the Territories who are to be affected by it, is contained in it. Whatever this bill does in that way, is contained in the provision for which the Senator from Tennessee voted, which he aided and cooperated in establishing, and came here upon the responsibility of a Senator to help to put it upon your statute-book. I know, too, that that Senator, at a subsequent portion of the proceedings, met with its southern friends of his former party alliance, and was supposed to concur in a resolution disapproving the known organ of that party for opposing the great principle which he is now unable to see. I say he was supposed to concur in that resolution. I supposed he did concur in it, because he was present and did not object to it. Then, sir, on these occasions, the Senator had the benefit of public discussions, of party caucuses of the friends of the bill, Whig and Democrat, and of the consultations with his own peculiar party friends in their meeting upon this matter; and I know, too, that at the meeting of Whig Senators referred to, at which he was present, we, for fear we might be misrepresented or misunderstood, authorized the Senator from North Carolina to say that we concurred with him in the conclusions to which he came on the bill. Therefore I say the Senator has had the advantage of public discussions, of caucus consultations with the friends generally of the measure, and his particular partisan allies; and besides, he was sufficiently satisfied upon it to give his vote for it upon the test question in the Senate of the United States. Now he wants to know what the principle is. I trust he will excuse me, after this discussion, after his votes, after his speeches, and after his cooperation with the friends of the bill, from making the attempt to enlighten him on this great principle further than to refer him to the bill itself.

Mr. BELL. Remember, I wanted to know; because one principle was stated by one Senator, and another principle by another.

Mr. TOOMBS. That was the very object of the clause itself for which he voted, to reconcile these conflicting opinions. That was the very reason why the friends of the bill met together, laying aside their partisan views, that they might reconcile their differences and defend great principles. We met, and consulted, and agreed, and came here and placed our action upon the statute-book of our country. Now, the gentleman says, let me see you reconcile it. Sir, the vote of the Senator from Tennessee is recorded; and if it needs explanation, it is needed from him both to the Senate and to the country. If it does not contain a principle—if this Missouri restriction ought not to have been repealed—if this great agitation to which he referred should not have been stopped, or if the bill is double-tongued or double-shot—if it contains anything hurtful to the Republic, I charge that the Senator from Tennessee has his full share of responsibility before the American people and the world. I am told now, but I do not know exactly for what reasons, the gentleman will vote against the proposed amendment.

Mr. BELL. I will vote for it.

Mr. TOOMBS. Well, for it or against it. [Laughter.] It is equally clear that the Senator's object was not so much to discuss the amendment, as to produce discord on other points among the friends of the measure. We adopted it on the principle stated by the Senator from Virginia. We look upon it as a principle, a great principle, that the Congress of the United States should no longer usurp this power to interfere with the domestic policy of the Territories, in the judgment of many of us against the Constitution—in the judgment of all of us against good policy—in order to restrict the equal rights of the free citizens of all the States in the common Territories of the Republic. We believed we would bring evil, and evil only, by legislating here in this manner for our remote dependencies; for the Territories are nothing else, at least upon the question of slavery. To establish this policy we planted it in the clause of the bill to which I have referred, and voted for it; and that clause had the assent of the Senator from Tennessee.

Now, the Senator offers, as an argument against his and our action, that we ought to rely upon the unconstitutionality of the Missouri compromise. A strange argument for an American Senator. The Constitution of my country and his, has thrown around itself a quadruple wall to protect it from violation. The members of the House of Representatives are sworn to stand by it. The members of the Senate are sworn to do the same. The President of the United States binds himself, by a solemn obligation, to do the same; and the judiciary are bound by the same ties. If a bill is brought before me, and I am satisfied that it is unconstitutional, I have no option but to vote against it. If it seeks to repeal an unconstitutional act, it is the highest reason you can give me for its repeal, for then I have no discretion. It may be a good law, it may be a wise law, in my judgment, it may be a beneficial law; but satisfy me that it violates the fundamental law of the land, and I cannot consider its wisdom and justice, though, in my judgment, it might shed boundless prosperity over this Republic.

But, the Senator says why not rely on the courts to declare it unconstitutional? Sir, I must do my duty to the Constitution whenever the question is presented to me; and I trust the judiciary will perform theirs if the question should ever get there. But it does not follow, as a matter of course, that their judges would agree with me on that subject when it went there. They must decide according to their judgment and their consciences. I must decide it according to mine. I assume the obligation of an oath on my conscience. Their judgment cannot protect me; and if they declare the exercise of a power to be constitutional, and have so declared it from 1789 until to-day, and, in my judgment, I believe it to be unconstitutional, and it comes here, I am bound to vote against it; and, upon the same principle, I am bound to repeal all unconstitutional laws that come before me, even if I have no other reason than their unconstitutionality. The Senator seems to suppose that remedies for unconstitutional laws belong exclusively to the judiciary. I do not concur in that opinion. The distinction between passing and repealing a law on this point is unsound. Why concern yourselves with the constitutionality of your action here in passing laws? There are the courts. The rule would be as sound in the one case as in the other.

The Senator knows that attempts have been made to get up an excitement in this country on this subject. He knows that there are men who have lived upon its agitation, especially in the northern portion of the Union—men whose political existence is staked on this agitation—whose desires and hopes can only be realized by inflaming the public mind against, and defeating this measure. The Senator from Tennessee has become their ally, working to this purpose, aiding in the same result—to keep this prohibition on his own section, although high-minded, noble, generous, and patriotic men of the North feel and see its injustice, and labor for its overthrow. The distinguished Senator from Michigan [Mr. CASS] said it violated the Constitution of his country, and when the question was presented to him, he felt it to be his duty, for that reason, to wipe it from the statute-book. I did not vote for its repeal in order to get any advantage over any portion of this Republic. I would scorn myself if I sought an unjust advantage of any State in this Union. I claim no triumph over the North; I would have none. I claim it a triumph of the Constitution, and of right, equality, and justice to all the freemen of this great Republic, throughout its utmost limits, from ocean to ocean. I would ask nothing that I would not grant; I would take nothing from the people of the North that they ought not to yield; and, therefore, do not consider this bill a triumph of the South against the North. Neither northern right nor northern honor is violated by this measure. It is a victory over error, injustice, and wrong; a triumph of right, justice, and the Constitution. For this triumph the whole country is certainly not less indebted to the genius, the eloquence, the statesmanship of the North than the South; and happy is it for the country that it was thus achieved. This great fact will spread far, and wide, and deep, a feeling of brotherhood throughout this great Republic, and even more than the act itself, tend to perpetuate that sacred bond of true liberty, equality, and fraternity—the Constitution. This is my ardent desire, my earnest prayer.

Mr. BELL followed at great length, and spoke until five o'clock, when, without concluding, he gave way for a motion to adjourn; and

The Senate adjourned.

[See the Appendix for Mr. BELL's speech.]

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, May 25, 1854.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. WILLIAM H. MILBURN.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

RATES OF POSTAGE.

The SPEAKER stated that the business first in order was the consideration of House bill No. 330, "further to amend the act entitled 'An act to reduce and modify the rates of postage in the United States, and for other purposes,' passed March 3, 1851, and the act amendatory thereto, passed August 30, 1852."

Mr. OLDS, by unanimous consent, submitted a substitute for said bill; which was received, and ordered to be printed.

POSTPONEMENT OF THE SPECIAL ORDER.

Mr. PHELPS obtained the floor.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky. I appeal to the gentleman to yield me the floor for one moment.

Mr. PHELPS. I merely desire to ask the unanimous consent of the House to submit a motion that the special order be postponed until to-morrow.

[Cries of "No objection!"]

Mr. PHELPS. There being no objection, I hope the motion will be entertained.

Mr. McDUGALL. I object to it. I will say to the gentleman from Missouri, who has charge of the deficiency bill, that if he will agree to make no attempt to take up the deficiency bill to-morrow, if it is not disposed of to-day, I will consent to the postponement of the special order. But if the consideration of that bill is to be continued during the whole of this week, I must object.

Mr. COBB. Wait till to-morrow, and object then.

Mr. McDUGALL. The Pacific railroad bill has been postponed too long already.

Mr. PHELPS. I will state for the information of the gentleman from California, and the members of the House generally, that if we will remain here for the ordinary time to-day, we can dispose of all the amendments to the deficiency bill, and report it to the House. Let us talk less and vote more.

Mr. WALSH. I object to the postponement of the special order.

PRINTING OF THE REPORT UPON BANKS.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky. The Secretary of the Treasury desires to have a few copies of his report on the subject of banks printed. I therefore submit the following resolution, that it may be referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That fifteen hundred extra copies of the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the condition of the banks of the United States, communicated to the House of Representatives on the — instant, be printed for the use of the Treasury Department.

The resolution was referred, under the rule, to the Committee on Printing.

AFRICANIZATION OF CUBA.

Mr. DUNBAR, by unanimous consent, presented the resolutions of the Legislature of Louisiana, upon the subject of the Africanization of Cuba; which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HAMILTON. I call for the regular order of business.

CASE OF CAPTAIN GIBSON.

Mr. ORR. Mr. Speaker, I ask the unanimous consent of the House to present the proceedings of two public meetings in my district, convened to give expression of opinion on the subject of the recent outrage committed by the Dutch authorities in the East Indies on the person and property of Captain Walter M. Gibson, late a citizen of South Carolina. He was seized in the Island of Java and thrown into prison at Batavia, upon pretense of having been guilty of sedition against the Dutch Government in their Indian possessions. He was thrice tried for the offense and acquitted by their judicial tribunals; but the Governor was dissatisfied with the result of these trials, and he was a fourth time tried by a star chamber court, where he was not allowed to confront his accusers, or be represented by counsel. He was convicted, and sentenced to death; but a day or two before the sentence was to be executed, he succeeded in making his escape. His vessel, the schooner Flirt, and its contents, were confiscated by the Dutch authorities, and all the earnings of his life sacrificed to Dutch injustice, intolerance, and cupidity.

The meetings were held at Pendleton and Anderson, and were composed of persons of high character and intelligence. The persons composing the meetings were acquaintances of Captain Gibson; they had known him many years, and they indorse his character, his integrity, and his worth. They ask this Government to demand and enforce full reparation for this outrage upon the person of one of their fellow-citizens. The resolutions at Pendleton were drafted and presented by my predecessor here, Hon. R. F. Simpson, himself a man of high character and intelligence, and contain the expression of opinion of Captain Gibson's former neighbors as to his worth, and the enormity of the outrage perpetrated on him.

Mr. KNOX. I object. I do not understand why the resolutions cannot be presented under the rules.

Mr. ORR presented the resolutions under the rule, and referred them to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. PHELPS. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

So the rules were suspended, and the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. CHANDLER in the chair.)

The CHAIRMAN. The House has resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the special order, upon which the gentleman from California [Mr. McDougall] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. PHELPS. With the permission of my friend from California, who yields me the floor for that purpose, I move that the further consideration of the Pacific railroad bill be postponed until to-morrow.

Mr. McDougall. I will state, with the leave of the committee, that I do not consent to this arrangement, except upon the express understanding that to-morrow we proceed to the consideration of the special order.

Mr. PHELPS. I make the motion to suspend the consideration of the special order with a view of finishing this bill to-day. I believe we can do it in the course of two hours.

The CHAIRMAN. It is moved that the further consideration of the special order of the day, which is the Pacific railroad bill, be postponed for the day, with the view of taking up for consideration the deficiency bill.

Mr. WHEELER. Upon that motion I demand tellers.

Tellers were not ordered.

Mr. DEAN. I rise to make an inquiry. I wish to know whether a majority can suspend the consideration of a special order, or whether it requires unanimous consent to do so?

Mr. WHEELER. I move a call of the House. There is no quorum here.

The question then being upon Mr. PHELPS's motion,

Mr. WHEELER demanded a division.

The House then divided; and the Chairman reported—ayes 78; but before the vote in the negative was declared,

Mr. PHELPS said: I withdraw the motion I made, for the purpose of submitting it in another form.

Mr. DEAN. I renew the motion that the consideration of the special order be postponed till to-morrow, and that the deficiency bill be now taken up.

Mr. MORGAN. I would like to know whether gentlemen have a right to vote on both sides?

The CHAIRMAN. There is no rule on that point.

The question being on the motion to postpone further the special order for the consideration of the Pacific railroad bill, Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. CAMPBELL, and DAVIS of Indiana, were appointed.

The question was taken; and the tellers reported—ayes 91, noes 29.

So the special order was further postponed, and the deficiency bill was again taken up.

The forty-fourth amendment was reported, as follows:

For compensation of the judge of first instance in civil cases for the district of San Francisco, California, per appointment dated 21st of September, 1849, by the late General B. Riley, while Governor of that country, from the 1st October, 1849, to the 1st April, 1850, $750.

Mr. PHELPS. The Committee of Ways and Means recommend a concurrence in that Senate amendment.

The question was put; and the amendment was concurred in.

The forty-fifth amendment was then read, as follows:

Strike out of the original bill the following:

For compensation for the discharge of United States consular duties at Constantinople, in conformity with the act of Congress approved August 11, 1848, $3,594 50, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be paid, under the direction of the Secretary of State, to such person or persons as may be entitled to the same, or any portion thereof.

Mr. PHELPS. The Committee of Ways and Means recommend a concurrence in that amendment.

The question was put; and the amendment was concurred in.

The forty-sixth amendment was then reported, as follows:

At the end of the bill add the following section:

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That all books, papers, documents, and records, in the Department of the Interior, may be copied and certified, under the seal of that Department, (which is hereby recognized as legal,) in the same manner as those in the other Executive Departments may now by law be, and with the same force and effect.

Mr. HAVEN. I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment. The amendment I propose is purely of a legal character, and involves the appropriation of no money. I send it to the Clerk's desk that it may be read.

The amendment was reported, as follows:

Add to the Senate amendment the following:

And in all cases where a seal is necessary by law to any commission, process, or other instrument, provided for by the law of Congress, it shall be lawful to affix the proper seal by making an impression therewith directly on the paper to which the seal is necessary; which shall be as valid as if made upon wax or other substance.

Mr. COBB. That is the law now.

Mr. HAVEN. I have a word to say in reference to that amendment, and a word only. It has been decided repeatedly in the courts of the northern part of the Union, that a seal, properly speaking, is not such unless it is made by an impression upon wax, or upon some other adhesive substance. Difficulties have arisen in reference to seals of the different Departments of the Government of the United States upon commissions, in some of the northern courts of the United States, upon the very ground that the impression was directly upon the paper, instead of upon wax or other adhesive substance. I thought to avoid this difficulty in future by adopting the amendment which I have offered.

The question was then put upon Mr. HAVEN's amendment; and it was agreed to.

The question then recurring upon the Senate amendment, as amended, it was put, and concurred in.

The forty-seventh amendment was then reported, as follows:

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That hereafter the commissions of all officers, under the direction and control of the Secretary of the Interior, shall be made out and recorded in the Department of the Interior, and the seal of the said Department affixed thereto, any laws to the contrary notwithstanding: Provided, That the said seal shall not be affixed to any such commission before the same shall have been signed by the President of the United States.

Mr. PHELPS. The Committee of Ways and Means recommend a concurrence in that Senate amendment.

The question was then put; and the amendment was concurred in.

The forty-eighth amendment was then reported, as follows:

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That before any payment shall hereafter be made to any invalid pensioner whose name shall have been upon the pension list two years, he shall produce to the agents for paying pensions, to whom he shall apply for payment, the affidavit of two surgeons or physicians, satisfactory to the Secretary of the Interior, stating, from personal examination, the continuance of the disability, describing it, for which the pension was originally granted, and the rate of such disability at the time of making such affidavit, blank forms of which shall be furnished by the Commissioner of Pensions to agents for paying pensions, for the use of pensioners; and if in said affidavit the disability shall be stated at a rate below that for which the pension was originally granted, he shall only be paid at the rate stated in said affidavit. Said affidavit shall be filed by said agents, and carefully preserved, and copies thereof shall be transmitted, with the semi-annual returns of said agents, to the Commissioner of Pensions, who shall file them with the original papers of said pensioner, respectively: Provided, That when the pension shall have been originally granted by a special act of Congress, or for a total disability for the loss of a limb or other cause, which cannot be removed, either in whole or in part, the above affidavit shall not be required.

Mr. PHELPS. The Committee of Ways and Means recommend a non-concurrence in that amendment. I think the matter is before the Committee on the Judiciary in this House. If I mistake not, a communication was referred to that committee yesterday. I think that it should undergo an examination before that or some other committee of this House. We have, therefore, recommended a non-concurrence in the amendment.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I move to strike out after the word affidavit as follows:

"Said affidavit shall be filed by said agents, and carefully preserved, and copies thereof shall be transmitted, with the semi-annual returns of said agents, to the Commissioner of Pensions, who shall file them with the original papers of said pensioner, respectively: Provided, That when the pension shall have been originally granted by a special act of Congress, or for a total disability for the loss of a limb or other cause, which cannot be removed, either in whole or in part, the above affidavit shall not be required."

Mr. Chairman, in my opinion, the adoption of the principle contained in this amendment will be tantamount to a repeal of your invalid pension law. It will, at least, so embarrass those who are entitled to them, as, in many cases, to make it impossible for them to get them. The invalid pension law operates mostly for the benefit of private citizens, who, in time of war, have volunteered in the service of the country. You have provided by that law, that, where they have become disabled in the service of the country, they shall receive a pension, sometimes two dollars a month, sometimes three dollars, sometimes four dollars, and for total disability, such as the loss of both eyes, or both arms, or both legs, or both arms and legs, they are allowed only eight dollars a month.

33D CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

MONDAY, MAY 29, 1854.

NEW SERIES...No. 83.

Now, it is proposed to require these persons not only to make out their papers to the satisfaction of the Department in the first place, but proposes to require them to go to the trouble and expense of going over the whole ground again every two years. Sir, from the very nature of the case, it will be impossible for many of them to comply with these conditions.

But it is only proposed to apply this principle to those who receive their pensions under the general laws. It does not apply to those who come here to Congress and get their pensions. Now, sir, I venture to say, those who are upon your pension rolls under the general laws, are, in nine cases out of ten, the most meritorious class of persons. If restrictions are to be imposed, there would be much more justice in imposing them upon those whose cases have not merit enough to make them entitled to pensions under the general laws, but who come here, and by sympathy, influence, or good will, obtain their pensions. Why do you not require these men to make out their cases every two years? Many of them have received their pensions in utter violation of the general laws, and yet receive larger sums than those who are regularly entitled to them. Now, sir, I repeat, that if you are to require these men for the little pittance you give them for their support when they are not able to support themselves by manual labor, to be at the expense of making out their papers once in two years, you might as well repeal your invalid pension laws at once.

Mr. HOUSTON. I did not intend to have said anything about this amendment; but as the gentleman from Tennessee, who has just taken his seat, evidently does not understand it, and as I am myself in favor of the principle of the amendment, I feel it my duty to state two or three facts in relation to it. Now, sir, it does not require that the pensioner shall have his papers made out anew every two years, it merely requires that a certificate of two surgeons shall be forwarded every two years to the pension agents. To whatever extent the disability remains according to the evidence, to that extent is the pension increased or diminished.

The gentleman says that there is no increase provided for. The increase follows as a natural result. The report of the surgeons making the examination will control the action of the Department. If the disability has been increased in consequence of wounds, the action of the Department will, as a matter of course, be to enlarge the pension.

Now, it was originally introduced into the Senate as the gentleman from Tennessee imagines it is now; but, on a very full discussion and examination, that body determined to strike out that portion which related to annual examination, and require only one solitary examination for the purpose of testing the principle, and allowing Congress and the country then to decide whether it was a proper one or not.

The gentleman says, point out any case where there is a fraud, and let that be examined into. Mr. Chairman, I suppose that the expense to be thrown on pensioners, under this section, would be nothing. The pensioners of the country are not charged anything for the authentication and preparation of their papers. You do not find your attorneys and agents charging for them, at least it is not the case in my country, and I am sure that it is not so in my friend's State.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. By the laws of Tennessee, the officers required to authenticate papers for revolutionary pensions are not entitled to fees; but there is no exemption from the payment of fees in the case of invalid pensions.

Mr. HOUSTON. In my country I have attended to a great many cases of the kind, and I have never charged a single cent. Nor have I ever heard of a cent being charged by anybody, either by an attorney, agent, or justice of the peace, for the preparation of pension papers.

But admit that the expense may be a trifle. What is it? Here is but one solitary examination required, and that is asked for the purpose of enabling the Department to see what pensions are paid undeservedly, and to decide that where there was disability from wounds received in the service, to the extent of that disability should the party be pensioned upon the Government. If the disability exists, nobody desires to cut off the pension; but if it be true, as the Secretary of the Interior states to us in his communication laid upon the table, why should we propose to keep up the pension when the disability has ceased to exist, and when, if the party were to make an original application, he would not be entitled, under the law or action of Congress, to a pension?

The object is not to throw heavy expense on the pensioner. The object is not to deprive him of any kindness which the law has extended to him; but simply to make a test by a single examination. If it be a good rule to apply to this case, then it is within the discretion of Congress to continue it or not, as they please. If the party undergoing examination be found disabled, his pension will remain as it was. It is to be diminished or increased, according to the report of the examiners. I will occupy the time of the committee no further.

Mr. JONES. I withdraw my amendment, and ask for a vote on concurring in the Senate amendment.

The question was taken; and the amendment of the Senate was non-concurred in.

The forty-ninth Senate amendment was read by the Clerk, as follows:

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the compensation of the special mail agent of the Post Office Department in California shall be $5,000 per annum; such rate to take effect in virtue of this provision from July 1, 1853.

Mr. PHELPS. I do not propose to debate that amendment. I will only state that the Committee of Ways and Means recommend a non-concurrence in it.

Mr. OLDS. I admit that the difference between the pay proposed to be given to the special mail agent in California, and that given to the mail agents in the Atlantic States, appears to be very great. It raises it from $1,600 to $5,000. But you must recollect that you require a higher order of talent for mail service in California than elsewhere; and not only that, but the special mail agent in California is almost an Assistant Postmaster General. And then, the expense of living in California is treble what it is in one of the Atlantic States; and perhaps this $5,000 would not be any higher compensation there than $1,600 in one of the Atlantic States.

Now, I will say one word more with reference to this matter. The Postmaster General recommended to the Post Office Committee of the Senate an increase of this compensation to $4,000. They have put it at $5,000. I am authorized by the Postmaster General to say that he does not consider $5,000, under all the circumstances of the case, at all too much to be given to this gentleman. It is very difficult to find the right sort of person to act as special mail agent in California; and the gentleman who now holds that position has taken it under a pledge from the Representatives of California that his compensation shall be increased to the amount proposed by this bill, so far as their influence extends to increase it. Sir, you need just such a man as you have got as special mail agent in California at this time. The reletting of your mail contracts has just taken place, and the new contracts are all to go into operation in California in a few days.

Mr. MATTESON. I would inquire if the gentleman from Ohio is in order? Is there any question before the committee?

Mr. OLDS. The question is on non-concurring in the amendment of the Senate, and I am speaking in favor of concurring in that amendment.

Let me give an illustration of the importance of this officer. A certain mail contract was held in California—I will not specify it—under a previous letting, for $8,000. A combination had taken place there by which the steamboats had been bought up, and those contractors put in a bid at the present letting for $40,000. Now there were bids given by men, who were not in the steamboat interest, for $8,000 and $15,000, and an effort is made for the relinquishment of the low bids for the purpose of getting the $40,000. Now, that matter will come before this special agent, and I am authorized by the Postmaster General to say, that to have such an agent as you have now will save to the Government twenty times as much as this increase of compensation will amount to. I hold that, under all the circumstances, the amendment of the Senate ought to be concurred in.

Mr. LATHAM. I desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. HAVEN. I wish to speak in opposition to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. OLDS. I offered no amendment. I spoke in favor of concurring in the amendment of the Senate.

Mr. LATHAM. I move to amend the amendment of the Senate so as to increase the amount $100.

I will state to the committee that the compensation of this officer, at the present time, is $1,600 per annum. The responsibilities which devolve upon him are of no ordinary character. California being so remote from the seat of Government, it is absolutely impossible for the Postmaster General to make orders as he can do in the Atlantic States, and consequently a large degree of responsibility connected with the postal system has to rest upon this officer.

The gentleman who has the charge now of the mail agency in California accepted the office, not at his own solicitation, but at the earnest solicitation of the delegation now in Congress. We all feel that there must be placed in this office a man of ability, a man of integrity—a man whose character is unquestioned, and whose judgment is of the very highest order; and therefore it was that we solicited the man to take the position which he now occupies. I assert in my place, that there is not a man in that State of any degree of respectability whatever, and who is qualified to discharge the duties of the office, that would think an instant of accepting it at a salary of $1,600. Why, you cannot get the service of a common sales clerk in that country short of $150 a month, which would make $1,800 a year. Yet the Government, notwithstanding the responsibility which rests upon this officer, gives him but $1,600 a year.

The gentleman who holds this office gave up a lucrative and profitable business, in which he had to pay a clerk $1,800 per annum, at the earnest solicitation not only of the delegation in Congress here, but also at the solicitation of the Postmaster General. That officer told me this morning in a conversation with him upon this very subject, that $5,000 would not at all be too large a compensation for this mail agent. He stated that he could not get an officer sufficiently competent to discharge the duties of the office for a less sum; and he further stated, that had it not been for the fidelity, the integrity, and industry of this gentleman, manifested in the discharge of his duties, there would have been the most inextricable confusion in the postal system of that country.

The Postmaster General further stated, that he was exceedingly anxious, believing that Congress would make a liberal appropriation for that purpose, to secure the services of this gentleman, because, at the present time, as the gentleman who has preceded me has stated, new contracts are about to be entered into which render it necessary that the mail agent should be a man of judgment, integrity, and industry.

I think it is right to state that the Postmaster General recommended, in a letter to the Committee of Ways and Means, that the salary of this officer should be increased to $4,000. He now desires that the salary should be raised to $5,000, for the reason that when he sent in a recommendation for $4,000 salary, he was unwilling that any invidious distinction should be drawn between the mail agent and the postmaster at San Francisco, whose salary is $4,000. The postmaster at San Francisco being here, and having expressed his entire willingness that the salary of the agent shall be increased; and further than that, that it was absolutely necessary that the services of such a man as we now have there should be secured, the Postmaster General does not hesitate to say that the salary now asked is nothing more than a fair remuneration for the labors of this office.

Mr. HAVEN. Mr. Chairman, I wish to oppose the amendment of the gentleman from California, [Mr. LATHAM,] and the suggestions made by the gentleman from Ohio, the chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, [Mr. OLDS.] If the statement of the gentleman from California made here to-day be correct, that the Postmaster General told him this morning, that although he informed the Committee of Ways and Means when the bill was before it, that $4,000 was a proper amount to fix this agent's salary at, yet he now thought it ought to be $5,000, then I am opposed to the Postmaster General, and I am certainly opposed to this amendment of the Senate. Sir, the Senate propose to increase the pay of this mail agent from $1,600 per annum, where it is now fixed, to $5,000 per annum; and this increased pay to commence on the 1st of July, 1853, when a competent and faithful man, I presume, who discharged the duties well for the former sum, was displaced; and the present incumbent, who is here to see about this increase of the salary, was put in. Why, sir, it is but little more than a month past that these amendments were before the Committee of Ways and Means, when the Postmaster General recommended $4,000 for this salary; to-day he recommends $5,000. It seems that if we are to follow his judgment, we are to run this salary up at the rate of $1,000 a month until this bill is passed.

Mr. LATHAM. I beg the gentleman's pardon. Mr. HAVEN. The gentleman, sir, has but just told us that the Postmaster General recommended $4,000 only when the matter was before the Committee of Ways and Means, and that to-day he told the gentleman himself it ought to be $5,000. It occurs to me, sir, that here is a good and sufficient reason why the House acted wisely this morning in postponing the consideration of all other business, so as to dispose of this deficiency bill immediately; for the longer it lays on our table, the greater the deficiencies grow; and the imagination of the Postmaster General, and his recommendation too, have, in about one month's delay, swelled, on this officer's salary alone, $1,000. These salaries, sir, seem to be growing large by degrees, and beautifully more magnificent. [Laughter.] Let us strike out the amendment at once, before it takes another rise.

I am opposed to the suggestions and views of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. OLDS.] Sir, if his business is to lavish public money upon the employees of the Government connected with the Post Office Department, I will give him the credit of doing it well, and of moving upon this House in that direction with great power and giant strides. He has raised their compensation, and that of the deputy postmasters, by a bill which he reported, and which has passed this House. He now seeks to raise the salary of this mail agent, and he also has a bill, reported by himself, and pending here, to levy an increased tax, or burden, upon the correspondence of the country, for the purpose of thereby further increasing the salaries of these officials. I repeat, I am opposed to all of this. California officers all, or nearly all, have double pay now. I agree, I concede she should have double pay. She has double ability and pertinacity on this floor, and in the other House; and it is but natural that she should have double pay, and double plunder, in all cases whatever. There, however, it ought to stop. They tell us in this case that the ordinary compensation to mail agents is $1,000 a year, and to this agency $1,600 the year. According to the rule then, sir, they should stop this man at $3,200 for this office; but they are not satisfied with that, and a month ago demanded $4,000; and now, the Postmaster General, following in the adventurous lead of the Senate, is ready to go, and actually recommends, as high as $5,000. I object to it. I will not vote it. I may stand alone, but I will not vote for it. I hope this committee and the House will put their mark of reprobation on the practice now too frequent, and sought to be carried out here.

I ask gentlemen seriously to look at this matter, and this tendency of things. There is another ground which makes this course of legislation very objectionable, and highly repugnant to a fair minded man. And that is, by the bill already passed providing additional pay to deputy postmasters, to which I before referred. Such increased pay commences, I believe, on the 31st of March, 1853, precisely the time when the Administration got fairly under way in removing competent men, who had always performed the business faithfully, without increased pay and without complaint, and in putting in their places men who, I fear, had followed its standard only because the whole command was but a baggage train and carried the plunder. It is a discrimination against old faithful officers who had done their duty, and in favor of new recruits who had never served together before, and who, when they enlisted, were promised pay, not, it is true, from the day of the enlistment, but from the earliest moment their commander could get control of the Treasury. This amendment of the Senate, which I am opposing, is placed upon the same principle; for it provides the increased pay is to commence back, on the 1st of July, 1853.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. OLDS] has another bill pending in the House, and which was up for discussion this morning, which proposes to increase the rates of postage—and for what? Why, sir, further to increase the pay of these deputy postmasters and officials; for remember, sir, their pay is graduated by the amount of postage collected. What a spectacle does this present; these additional burdens and charges placed upon the correspondence of the country, upon its commerce, its literature, its business; all to pay—no, not to pay, for that was done before—but to increase the pay and rewards of these officials of the Government. Why, it is not only a tax upon the commerce, literature, and general business of the country, but it stoops to plunder the poor servant men and girls of the country, who have to pay this increased postage upon the humble, but kind and necessary letters that they write home to their friends whom they have left behind upon the other side of the Atlantic, and upon the affectionate and kindly greetings and remembrances that pass between the honest, hard working, but separated citizens of our own country. All of this, sir, I repeat, to reward deputy postmasters and increase the pay of post office officials, and at the unblushing rate of running this agent up at one list from $1,600, for which the duties have always been well done before, to $5,000; and as the Senate amendment proposes the increased pay shall commence about a year back, it will be giving, in the aggregate, about $10,000 to this officer, by this one enactment. Sir, I hope the committee will vote the amendment down.

Mr. LATHAM. If there be no objection, I will withdraw my amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was accordingly withdrawn.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the word "dollars" in the amendment under consideration. I have not the slightest doubt, sir, that this gentleman, whose salary is asked to be increased to $5,000, does possess a very high order of capacity; according to the office-seeker's interpretation of the phrase "high order of capacity," which means a capacity and talent of an abstracting order.

Sir, I am opposed to this whole bill, from first to last; and I caution gentlemen on this floor who claim to belong to the same party that I do, to beware how they cut loose from the moorings of the Democratic party. [Laughter.] I contend, sir, that this deficiency bill, from first to last, is wrong; and I contend that this practice of the Senate in sending in various bills to us, under cover of one title, with amendment after amendment which are in gross violation and falsification of the character of the bill as set forth in the title, ought to be rebuked, and rebuked promptly, by this House. Now, the assayer at California only receives $5,000 a year; and that office is ten times more important than that of mail agent.

Sir, my friend from California [Mr. LATHAM] says that the postmaster of California is here, and recommends this increase of salary. This postmaster has got a salary of $4,000 a year, and he recommends $5,000 to be given to the mail agent. After the mail agent gets his salary increased to $5,000, we will see another bill introduced drawing comparisons between the salaries of both officers; and we will hear arguments that when the mail agent receives $5,000 a year, the postmaster should receive $7,000. If the postmaster's business is arduous, I should like to know why he is loitering round Washington, instead of attending to his business in California. Will the gentleman from California be good enough to reply to that inquiry?

Mr. LATHAM. I will answer, if the gentleman from New York will permit me.

Mr. WALSH. With the greatest pleasure.

Mr. LATHAM. The gentleman is here for the purpose—as designated by the Postmaster General—of regulating the affairs of the postal system for California, and not at his own option or solicitation.

Mr. WALSH. And, sir, that gentleman has obeyed his instructions in the fullest sense. He has gone to the extent of the letter, and is determined to arrange the affairs of the post office to his own individual benefit.

Mr. McDUGALL. I desire to say a word in opposition to the amendment which was last offered.

I suggest to my friend from New York [Mr. HAVEN] that he is mistaken as to the relative importance of the duties performed by the officers of the assay office in California, and those of the special mail agent of the Post Office Department in that State. I say to him that there is not in the State of California an officer upon whom is devolved a higher responsibility than that which is imposed upon the special mail agent. That agent there does not occupy the same position, or perform the same duties, as do the mail agents of the United States generally. By the law regulating the Post Office Department, a large number of duties are charged upon the post office itself, which, in California, devolve upon the special mail agent. It is a more important office than the assay office. That officer is as important an officer as is the head of the customs in San Francisco, whose compensation is $10,000 per annum.

Mr. WALSH. Will my friend from California permit me to make one remark?

Mr. McDUGALL. Certainly.

Mr. WALSH. I know gentlemen—I do not know as I ought to use that term here, as the persons to whom I refer do not belong to this body—I know individuals occupying the position of mail agents who are utterly incapable of earning a dollar and a half a day by any legitimate employment. In the first place, they are too stupid to earn it intellectually, and too lazy to earn it physically. [Laughter.]

Mr. McDUGALL. I will simply say to the gentleman, in reply to his remark, that the present special mail agent of the Post Office Department in California, is a man who was selected with special reference to his competency and integrity.

I wish to say to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HAVEN,] who alluded to the compensation of previous mail agents, that a bill has already been passed by the Senate for the relief of the special mail agent appointed by the last Administration. That bill was sent to the House, was referred to the House Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and has been reported to this House by them, and it is now upon your Private Calendar. So it appears that there has been no disposition on the part of the majority of this House to provide for the present mail agent in exclusion of those who have heretofore served the Government in that capacity.

Mr. Fry, the present special mail agent for California, was not in the city of Washington when the appointment was made, but was engaged in private business at home. He knew nothing about the contemplated appointment, or that his name was connected with it. When it was announced to him that he had been appointed such agent, he thought that the compensation was altogether inadequate. The California delegation in Congress, after advising him that Congress would raise the rate of pay, sat down and pledged themselves in writing that they would exert all their influence in Congress to induce them to raise his compensation to $5,000; and it was only in consequence of that pledge, both by the Representatives and Senators from California, that he was induced to accept the office. I believed then, and I believe now, that Congress will allow to him that reasonable compensation, which the California delegation pledged they would secure to him from Congress. I think that some credit should be given to that delegation of understanding something about the necessities which exist in that State in reference to public affairs.

Mr. McNAIR. I move to reduce the appropriation contained in this amendment $1,000. That will make it $4,000, which I think is about a fair compensation. I am well aware that a special mail agent has a great many difficulties to encounter, and particularly in that State. I well know that he has a great many trials. I know that he has to be an "all sorts of a man," as an officer expressed himself to me the other day; that he has to be an industrious and persevering man; that he has to be a good lawyer, in order to understand the United States laws well; that he is charged with the duty of detecting depredators upon the mails in that country; that he has to go over the hills and valleys of California, in stages, by night and by day; that he has to be, or ought to be, almost omniscient and omnipresent. [Laughter.] He is required at all times to be present, ready at a moment's notice, to depart for any part of the country for the purpose of catching rogues. He has, of course, to expose himself to much danger. He is liable, perhaps, every week or two, to be shot down in capturing those who are endeavoring to plunder the mails in California. Every one knows that he is continually exposed to all kinds of dangers and hardships. Now, I think that such a man as that should be allowed a reasonable and a fair compensation.

Mr. WALSH. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania to permit me to ask a single question.

Mr. McNAIR. I will allow the gentleman with great pleasure.

Mr. WALSH. I want to know if the gentleman's fears in reference to the danger to which this man is exposed did not arise from his own experience last session when on the Committee on the Extensions of the Capitol? Because, in his efforts to detect the rogues who were engaged in executing that work, I understand he came near being assassinated several times. [Laughter.]

Mr. McNAIR. I am very thankful to the gentleman for informing me of the fact, though I assure him that I had no reference to any precedent. But, sir, I think that $1,600 is entirely too little as a compensation for this man. I think $5,000 is too much; and I think $4,000 is just enough. I hope, therefore, that my amendment will be adopted.

Mr. LATHAM. I just wish to say one word in reply to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HAVEN,] who, being a member of the Committee of Ways and Means, and speaking with great confidence upon this subject, his statements are worthy of a reply. Now, sir, I submit that no comparison can be drawn between the compensation proper to be paid to a mail agent in New York and one in California. Sir, we have no railroads extending like net-work over our country, by which a man may travel with the speed of lightning from one end of the State to the other. The duties of this officer in California require excessive exposure and involve dangers and hardships which have no parallel in the Atlantic States.

This gentleman is required to travel over a State three and a half times as large as New York. The only conveyance for him, as a general thing, is to ride upon a mule. He finds the cost of living, a great portion of the time, about four dollars per diem. I say, therefore, that it is absurd to talk of comparing the services of a mail agent in New York, or in any of the eastern States, or of comparing the compensation to which such mail agent is justly entitled, with that of the mail agent in California.

But, Mr. Chairman, I will state further to the House, that unless some provision of this character is put into the bill, the condition of my State, so far as its postal system is concerned, will be most lamentable. Why, sir, the gentleman from New York [Mr. WALSH] says there are many men too stupid to discharge the duties of this office, and who hold office simply because they are too lazy to go to work. Well, sir, it is to obviate this very thing that the delegation from California have agreed to advocate this amendment. They desire to furnish a compensation that will be sufficient to employ a man who is competent to discharge the duties which are devolved upon him; for no such man will undertake to discharge those duties in California for the compensation now provided by law.

Mr. WALSH. If the gentleman will allow me, I wish to say that I did not say these men were not competent to discharge the duties of that office.

Mr. LATHAM. The gentleman said they were too lazy to labor for their own support. Now, sir, I think that by adopting this amendment, you will accomplish a great saving to the Government. But I want to say another thing; it is just this: Unless the Government make some such provision as is provided for in this amendment; unless they provide a compensation that will employ a competent man, the Postmaster General will be compelled to send out some one there occasionally to regulate the affairs of the Department in that State. The compensation of such an agent, his traveling expenses, mileage, &c., the loss which will result to the Department, will be not $5,000 merely, but five times five thousand dollars annually. If you reject this appropriation of $5,000, which is a just and reasonable compensation, you will find that the increased expenditure which will be involved, will, instead of $5,000, be $25,000. I advocate this amendment, sir, as a measure of economy, and I hope the committee and the House will adopt it.

The Postmaster General thought that the salary of this officer should be $5,000 per annum, and he would have recommended this in the first instance, had it not been that he was unwilling to draw any invidious distinction between his highest officer and this gentleman. As I remarked before, I am authorized to state that he has been always, and is now of the opinion, that the service of no gentleman of ability, integrity, and character can be secured for less salary than $5,000 per annum.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I would ask the gentleman to withdraw his amendment.

Mr. PHELPS. I hope that we may now vote on the question, as it has, in my opinion, been fully discussed.

The question was taken; and the amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. SMITH. I move to reduce the appropriation $100.

Mr. Chairman, without any interest in this question other than that which appertains to the members of this House. I have no feeling in the question—none in the world; but I have some experience of California, having gone there to pursue my private fortunes, and having returned after a pleasant and agreeable trip. I say to this body, from personal knowledge, that it is indispensable, and perhaps more so in that country than in any other portion of the Union, that this officer should be a man of the very highest character. He has jurisdiction over contracts. He has a great power of collusion; and unless he be protected by a great deal of integrity out there, where every man goes to make his pile, and where it is honest enough to make money anyhow—

Mr. WALSH. You went to make your pile?

Mr. SMITH. I went to make my pile, but to make it honestly. A great many go there for a different purpose, and, as I know, especially from New York.

Well, sir, this being the case, it is necessary to secure a man of high character. You cannot do that for the present salary. In this particular case I desire the House to understand that there is no proposition to increase the per diem. A man here gets $1,600 per annum, and $2 per day for his traveling expenses. In this case he is to get $5,000 per annum, and only $2 per diem. The $2 per diem will not pay for drinks. [Laughter.] I tell gentlemen that the man who is hearty there has to pay very high for his living. I have seen many a miner pay $2 50 for his breakfast. You have to pay a quarter of a dollar apiece for eggs, a half of a dollar for a beef steak, seventy-five cents for a partridge; and when a fellow gets thirsty, he has to pay a quarter of a dollar for a drink, and short measure at that. What does the gentleman from New York [Mr. WALSH] think of that? [Laughter.]

Mr. WALSH. What kind of drinks?

Mr. SMITH. Good stiff drinks, and a quarter of a dollar apiece. I mention these things to show that there is no comparison in point of importance—and I speak in sincere candor to the gentleman from New York—between this officer and the United States assayer at San Francisco. One sits in his room, performs light and easy duties, while the other has, to brave the tempests, bad roads, and all the dangers pictured a while ago by my friend from Pennsylvania, [Mr. McNAIR.] Five thousand dollars is not one cent too much. There are many officers, clerks of the Government, who get more. What do you think of the naval officer getting $8,000 per annum? He is not nigh as responsible an officer as this one, judging from the incumbent.

Mr. HOUSTON. I was at first inclined to vote for this amendment; but if $2 50 per day is required to furnish the officer with drinks, I am of the opinion that it had better be voted down. I shall vote against it.

Mr. SMITH. I am greatly surprised that any chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means could be found to give such a reason for his vote. The amendment was withdrawn.

The question now being on concurring in the amendment of the Senate,

Mr. McDOUGALL demanded tellers.

Tellers were not ordered.

The question was then put; and it was decided in the negative.

So the amendment of the Senate was not concurred in.

The fifth amendment was read, as follows:

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That from and after the passage of this act, there shall be, in addition to the clerks authorized by the third section of the act of March 3, 1853, entitled "An act making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1854," in the office of the Register of the Treasury, three clerks of class four, to include the clerk now authorized to take charge of the redemption of stocks; and in the office of the Commissioner of Pensions five clerks of class two, and fifteen clerks of class three; and said clerks shall be paid, according to the provisions of said section, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. PHELPS. The Committee of Ways and Means have instructed me to recommend to the House to non-concur in that amendment of the Senate. But it is right that the communication from the Secretary of the Treasury with reference to the clerks in the office of the Register of the Treasury should be presented to the House. I therefore ask the Clerk to read it.

The Clerk read the communication, as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, March 20, 1854.

SIR: You will perceive, by my letter of the 10th of January last, I recommended for the First Auditor's office, one clerk of the fourth class; for the Third Auditor's office, five clerks of the fourth class; for the Treasurer's office, two clerks of the fourth class; and for the Register's office, two additional clerks of the fourth class.

These additional clerks in the Register's office are necessary for the better and prompt preparation of the statistics prepared in that office; and it is desirable, if Congress grants this additional force, that it should be done as soon as practicable, as the force is much needed in that office.

In the Sixth Auditor's office, the accounts of foreign postages under treaty stipulations, and otherwise, have accumulated to such an extent as to require a clerk of great capacity and efficiency; and the Department will not be able to retain such a one for less than $1,800 per annum; and no one of the clerks of the fourth class can be spared for that position. I therefore respectfully recommend an additional clerk of the fourth class for the Sixth Auditor's office.

The clerk in the Register's office in charge of the stocks came in under the provisions of the act of 1846, revived by the act of March 3, 1853, classifying the clerks, and is only entitled to $1,400, but was paid $1,800 prior to 1st of July last, under an arrangement I did not feel at liberty to continue. The position is a confidential one, and will not continue after the debt shall be paid. In my opinion, he ought to have $1,800 per annum.

I am, very respectfully, JAMES GUTHRIE, Secretary of the Treasury.

HON. R. M. T. HUNTER, Chairman Committee on Finance, United States Senate.

Mr. PHELPS. I now ask the Clerk to read a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, with reference to the clerks proposed to be created in the office of the Commissioner of Pensions, in lieu of the temporary clerks now employed. The Committee of Ways and Means have recommended a non-concurrence in this part of the amendment of the Senate; but I desire that the letter may be read.

Mr. ASHE. This is all out of order; and I object to the reading of the letter. It is consuming time uselessly.

Mr. WALSH. I object to the reading.

Mr. HENN. I think that the letter of the Secretary of the Interior ought to be read.

Mr. PHELPS. I am entitled to the floor; and I ask that it may be read as a part of my remarks:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR.
WASHINGTON, March 17, 1854. }

SIR: Since our interview of this morning I have conversed with Judge Waldo, the Commissioner of Pensions, and examined the classification of the clerks in his bureau, as made by the act of March 3, 1853, and am satisfied that justice to the employees in his office, as well as a proper regard for the public interest, requires some change in the number of clerks assigned to each class.

As at present arranged, there are in the Pension Office, exclusive of the chief clerk, forty-nine clerks, classified thus: ten of the first class, thirty of the second, five of the third, and four of the fourth. It seems to have been supposed by the late Commissioner of Pensions that this number would be sufficient to discharge the duties of the office, although, at the time that estimate was made, there were about one hundred and forty permanent and temporary clerks employed in the bureau. But, it being found utterly impracticable to get along with that force, a sufficient number of temporary clerks were, of necessity, retained. The Commissioner is now of the opinion, in which I fully concur, that a permanent force of about sixty-nine clerks, exclusive of the chief clerk, is required for the prompt and efficient discharge of the laborious and important duties of that bureau, and that the increase should be made to the second and third classes; that is to say, five to the second and fifteen to the third. This would give ten clerks of the first class, as at present; thirty-five, instead of thirty, of the second class; twenty, instead of five, of the third class, and four of the fourth class, as at present. This change would make the classification of the clerks in the Pension Office correspond somewhat with that in the other Departments and bureaus.

Of all the clerks in the Executive Departments, embraced by the act of March 3, 1853, I find that about one fifth are of the first, one half of the second, one fourth of the third, and one fifteenth of the fourth class. The proportion of the several classes now in the Pension Office is about one fifth of the first class, three fifths of the second, one tenth of the third, and one twelfth of the fourth class. The addition of five clerks to class two, and of fifteen to class three, as now asked, would give to class one about one seventh, to class two, fourth sevenths, to class three about one fourth, and to class four about one seventeenth, which is as near an approximation to the general proportions as can well be obtained.

Many of the clerks now receiving the lower salaries are obliged to perform duties corresponding in responsibility and intricacy to those discharged by clerks in the other bureaus as well as their own, who receive the salary affixed to the grade or class next above them; and they perform their duties as faithfully and as well, and it is but just that they should receive the same amount of compensation.

I would, therefore, earnestly recommend that provision be made in the deficiency bill authorizing an increase of the number of clerks in the Pension Office of the second class from thirty to thirty-five, and those of the third class from five to twenty, as the Commissioner requests.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
R. W. McCLELLAND, Secretary.
Hon. R. M. T. HUNTER,
Chairman Committee on Finance, United States Senate.

Mr. HENN. I propose to amend the section by striking out the following words:

In the office of the Register of the Treasury, three clerks of class four, to include the clerk now authorized to take charge of the redemption of stocks.

That will leave in the office of the Commissioner of Pensions five clerks of class two, and fifteen clerks of class three. I do not see any necessity for the increase of force in the office of the Register; but I think there is a great necessity for an increase of the clerical force in the office of the Commissioner of Pensions. I believe every man in this House has had more or less business to transact with that office. All who have had occasion to do any business there have found that the present Commissioner has succeeded in bringing his office from a state of great confusion to a condition of perfect simplicity and order. I believe every man who has had any business at that office is willing to concede that the Commissioner would not ask anything but what was absolutely necessary for the public service. So far as I have heard, he has, upon all occasions, given the most perfect satisfaction to all the members of this House; and I hope that the clerks he asks for will be provided by this bill.

Mr. PRATT. I fully concur with my friend from Iowa [Mr. HENN] in the remarks he has just made. I hope his amendment will prevail, and that the section, as amended, will pass.

The question was taken on the amendment to the amendment proposed by Mr. HENN; and it was agreed to.

Mr. HIBBARD. I move to amend the remaining clause of the amendment by striking out the word "fifteen," in the fifth line of page twenty-seven of the printed bill, and inserting in lieu thereof the word "sixteen," so as that there shall be sixteen clerks of class three.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. If the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. HIBBARD] will allow me to offer an amendment, perhaps it will meet his approbation.

Mr. HIBBARD. I am very willing to allow the gentleman to do so, and for that purpose I ask to withdraw my amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was accordingly withdrawn.

Mr. JONES. I propose to insert after the word "pensions," in the fourth line of the twenty-seventh page of the bill, the following words: "in lieu of the temporary clerks now employed therein," so as to make the clause read as follows:

That from and after the passage of this act, there shall be, in addition to the clerks authorized by the third section of the act of March 3, 1853, entitled "An act making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1854," in the office of the Register of the Treasury, three clerks of class four, to include the clerk now authorized to take charge of the redemption of stocks, and in the office of the Commissioner of Pensions, in lieu of the temporary clerks now employed therein, five clerks, &c.

Several MEMBERS. That is right.

Mr. JONES. Then, Mr. Chairman, I will support this amendment of the Senate. The Committee of Ways and Means non-concurred with this entire amendment; but, upon reflection, and on a more thorough understanding of the subject, I am satisfied that the appointment of the regular permanent clerks asked for by the Commissioner of Pensions, in lieu of the temporary clerks now employed there, will be promotive of the dispatch of public business; and it will be economical and right.

Mr. STRATTON. I desire to ask the gentleman from Tennessee if it is proposed that these additional permanent clerks shall be selected from the different clerks temporarily employed there?

Mr. JONES. I should think that these additional clerks asked for will be selected out of the temporary force now employed in that bureau.

Mr. BRIDGES. I wish to ask the gentleman from Tennessee one question. How many temporary clerks are there now employed in the office of the Commissioner of Pensions?

Mr. JONES. I do not know exactly.

Mr. WALSH. All Democrats here are temporary clerks.

Mr. HIBBARD. I will answer the question asked by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. A week ago there were ninety-seven clerks employed in the bureau of the Commissioner of Pensions—fifty permanent clerks, and forty-seven temporary. And I would further say, that the previous Commissioner of Pensions had, in all, one hundred and forty clerks employed; and, without meaning to cast any reproach on that officer, I would say that the condition of affairs in the office when Mr. Waldo, the present Commissioner, entered on his duties, was six months in arrears, as I am informed, and that he has now brought it up. There are now, as I have said, forty-seven temporary clerks employed; or, at least there was that number employed when I obtained this information, a week or two ago. I trust, therefore, that the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee will be adopted in lieu of that which I proposed. I, as a member of the Committee of Ways and Means, am of opinion that the report by that committee, unfavorable to this amendment, was founded on a misapprehension of the facts, and that it is a just and proper amendment, which I desire to see adopted.

Mr. STRATTON. I am in favor of allowing these additional clerks for the office of the Commissioner of Pensions. I desire, however, that the Commissioner may be allowed to classify and select them from the temporary clerks who are now employed in the office.

Mr. HAVEN. I have but a word to say to the committee on this subject. As a member of the Committee of Ways and Means, I thought it best not to concur in the amendment of the Senate. But a man is never too old to learn. Since that time I have conversed with the Secretary of the Interior. I believe I can be just towards men, and to the actions of men, everywhere; and I will state that I have always found that gentleman to be an honorable man. I have not, however, merely taken his word on this subject, but he laid before me the reasons which induced him to ask for an increase of his clerical force. I am satisfied that the proposition made by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. JONES,] in his amendment, is an entirely proper one. I shall vote for it here, and think that the committee will be right in voting for it. I think, also, that what was struck out by the gentleman from Tennessee is properly struck out.

The question was then taken on the amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee; and it was agreed to.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I want to propose another amendment to this section. I move to insert, in line sixth, after the word "section," the words "until the 30th of June, 1854." So that it shall limit the appropriation made by this act to the current year. It will then read:

"And said clerks shall be paid, according to the provisions of said section, until the 30th of June, 1854, out of any money in the Treasury, not otherwise appropriated."

This amendment is intended to prevent the making of a standing and indefinite appropriation for the payment of these clerks; and to require that the sum shall be appropriated for that purpose each year, in the same manner as is required in reference to the salaries of all other officers of the Government.

The question was then put upon the amendment of Mr. JONES; and it was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was then adopted.

The first-first amendment was then reported, as follows:

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That the portion of the seventh section of the act of the 26th of August, 1852, entitled "An act to provide for executing the public printing and establishing the prices thereof, and for other purposes," which provides "that when any documents shall be ordered to be printed by both Houses of Congress, the entire printing of such documents shall be done by the printer of that House which first ordered the same," is hereby repealed; and when there are different printers for the respective Houses, each shall do the printing which may hereafter be ordered by the House electing him; and so much of the printing for the Executive Departments and bureaus of the Government as is ordered by the said act to be done by the public printer, shall be equally divided between the printers of the two Houses.

Mr. NICHOLS here obtained the floor.

Mr. PHELPS. I ask the gentleman from Ohio to yield me the floor, in order to enable me to offer an amendment to that fifty-first section.

Mr. NICHOLS. I yield the floor.

Mr. PHELPS. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the words:

"And so much of the printing for the Executive Departments and bureaus of the Government as is ordered by the said act to be done by the public printer, shall be equally divided between the printers of the two Houses."

There is, in my opinion, Mr. Chairman, a necessity for the adoption of the Senate amendment, as proposed to be amended by the Committee of Ways and Means. It is well known that at this time a controversy exists between the public printers of the two Houses; as the House of Representatives and the Senate have each elected a different printer. That controversy, which is now being settled in the courts of this district, has arisen between them in reference to the printing ordered by the two Houses. The law, under which these printers are elected, provides that when any document shall be ordered to be printed by both Houses of Congress, the entire printing of such document shall be done by the printer of that House which first ordered the same. In the debates which have taken place in this Capitol, in reference to the public printing, it has been intimated that there has been great haste on the part of the House, in ordering such and such documents to be printed, in order that the House printer might have the printing, not only of the quantity ordered by the House itself, but that subsequently ordered by the Senate.

Again, the law provides that whenever the same document shall be ordered to be printed by both Houses of Congress within three weeks of each other, but one composition shall be charged for the same document. We propose that that provision shall remain, so that if it should hereafter happen that both Houses elect the same printer, that printer will be entitled to only one composition. Now, in the debates which have been had upon this subject of printing, it has been stated that this double composition amounts to from $12,000 to $16,000 per Congress. That was the estimate which was submitted by the Superintendent of Public Printing. Here arises a difficulty in carrying out this last direction under the last provision of the section which we propose to strike out. Under the existing law the departmental printing is to be executed by the public printer. But there being two public printers the Department has the right to select between the two elected by the different branches. Under the existing law the Executive Departments may procure all their printing by one of the printers, or they may make such division between the two as they may think proper. But under the section which the Senate propose to insert, and a part of which the Committee of Ways and Means propose to strike out, it is provided that so much of the printing for the Executive Departments and bureaus of the Government as is ordered by the said act to be done by the public printer, shall be equally divided between the printers of the two Houses.

Now, I want to call the attention of the committee to the confusion and difficulty that, it seems to me, must necessarily result in carrying out this provision, if it is practical to carry it out at all, so as to make an equal division of the matter between the two offices. It will give rise to endless difficulty. The heads of Departments, and the heads of bureaus, each have their own printing to be done, independent of that done by the others; and what rule are they to adopt by which the printing ordered by the Departments or bureaus shall be divided in equal quantities to the printers of the two Houses, or divided in such a manner as that each shall receive the same amount of compensation?

Mr. HENN. I wish to inquire if, under this section which the Senate have ordered to be adopted, every document that is ordered to be printed by the Departments would not have to be given to both printers, and whether we should not have to pay for composition at both offices?

Mr. PHELPS. That would depend upon the manner in which the division was made. If the law was so construed that every document ordered by a head of a Department, or by a head of a bureau, of which one thousand copies were to be printed, must be given five hundred copies to one printer, and five hundred to the other, we should, of course, have to pay the expense of double composition; for that is provided for in a preceding part of the section.

Mr. WALSH. I will suggest that, as far as the matter of double composition is concerned, it would be impracticable to carry it out in the manner suggested by the gentleman from Iowa. It is to be carried out as far as practicable, and that settles the whole matter.

Mr. NICHOLS. I agree with the gentleman from Missouri in what he has said upon the impropriety of adopting the amendment of the Senate. I do not see why any of it should be retained, and I therefore move to strike out the whole section.

The CHAIRMAN. It will be in order to oppose the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri, if the gentleman desires to make any remarks.

Mr. NICHOLS. I do not desire to speak upon the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia. I do. I am glad to hear the gentleman from Missouri say that the Committee of Ways and Means have agreed to the first portion of the amendment of the Senate, which is to the effect that the printer of each House is to do the printing ordered by that House. It will lead to a little additional expense, to be sure, but then I consider that a matter of small importance when taken in connection with the much more important question which is involved. The importance of this amendment cannot be better illustrated than by what has already occurred since the election of two different printers by the two different branches of Congress. There is now a controversy going on between these printers in reference to the printing of the Patent Office report, and a controversy in respect to which it seems to me impossible that there can be two opinions. I have examined the matter carefully; but the Joint Committee on Printing have decided that they have no jurisdiction over the subject. One of these parties is a friend, the son of a friend, and the grandson of my grandfather, and I advised him to ask for a mandamus from the court, so clear did I consider the case. He went into the circuit court, and that court decided that the Committee on the Public Printing was the tribunal for the decision of the matter. The Committee on the Public Printing decided that it had no jurisdiction. The case has now gone to the Supreme Court; and there is no knowing what may be the decision of that Court. All of us who are lawyers know the difficulty of getting a mandamus. It is an extreme remedy. There it is: the circuit court, one of the ablest courts in the country, saying that the Committee on the Public Printing has jurisdiction, and that committee saying that it has no jurisdiction; and you leave it to an employee of the Government to decide in matters of right, utterly irresponsible to anybody. You give him an amount of patronage in respect to the press relating to a large job that ought not to be intrusted to any irresponsible individual on the face of the earth, unless he wants to open the floodgates of corruption. It is better that a little more should be paid for printing than that this state of things should be permitted to exist. I agree with the Committee of Ways and Means in respect to that matter.

Now I come to the point on which I disagree with them, on which the Senate proposes that the Executive printing should be divided equally between the two printers. Well, it does not follow that when one thousand copies of a circular are to be printed, that five hundred copies are to be printed by one office, and five hundred by the other, and that both are to be paid for composition. The obvious meaning of the clause is, that there shall be an equitable distribution of the printing between the printers of the two Houses. Well, is not that right? Is not equality equity? Why, sir, do you mean, in a country where more depends on the purity and independence of the press than upon anything else on the face of the earth, to put it into the hands of the Departments to foster the printer of one House of Congress at the expense of the printer of the other House? When the two Houses, for political or other purposes, choose different printers, are you to put it into the hands of the Departments to crush one and to build up the other? Are you to put it into their power to hold a rod of terror over both presses?

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky. I understand the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri is to strike out. I am instructed by the Joint Committee on the Public Printing to move the following amendment to what is proposed to be stricken out:

Provided, That composition in no case shall be paid for where the work is not actually performed.

The object of that amendment is simply to prevent the Government's having to pay for composition which is not actually performed; for instance, in cases where the headings and so forth are changed, and the same type is used to print documents for the Senate which have been ordered by the House, or for the House which have been ordered by the Senate.

Mr. PRATT. I am opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky, and certainly there is no reason why I should not be opposed to the whole amendment of the Senate; for there is no more propriety in incorporating such a section in the deficiency bill, than there would be in incorporating a section to organize two companies of United States dragoons. It is entirely out of place. I hope the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky will not prevail, and that the good sense of this committee will reject the section entirely.

The question was then taken on Mr. STANTON's amendment, and it was agreed to.

Mr. HAVEN moved a pro forma amendment, and said: Mr. Chairman, I desire to say a word or two in reference to this matter. It is true that the Committee of Ways and Means have recommended the course which has been stated by the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. PHELPS,] but that committee will do me the justice to say, that I told them, in reference to this particular amendment, that I could not concur with them in that committee, in this committee, in the House, or anywhere else; and that I would consider myself at full liberty to oppose it here and everywhere.

I agree, Mr. Chairman, with the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. PRATT,] who has just addressed the committee, that this whole section ought to be stricken out of this deficiency bill. It has no business here; it has no business anywhere. The law that was passed at the first session of the last Congress, after great labor and much discussion, tribulation, and difficulty, answered our purpose very well. Since then our printing has been well done, and upon good paper, and, as it happens, upon not unreasonable terms. Whether it is wise or unwise that the two Houses should have power to elect different printers, is not a matter which I propose now to stop to discuss; for the law gives them that power. But I do intend to say, that if the two Houses choose to elect different printers, I am opposed, and, in my opinion, sound policy is opposed, to any increase of the pay for the work.

Sir, what will the people of the country say of this Congress? Let us pause for a moment and see where we are, and what we are doing. There are bills upon your table in relation to all the organized Territories of the Union, proposing to separate the office of superintendent of Indian affairs from that of Governor, and to give additional compensation to the Governors; and an entirely new, independent, and additional salary to the superintendents of Indian affairs.

We have been making with a liberal hand new ports of entry, to make places for new custom-house officers and appointees. We have created new land districts and established new land offices, drawing after them new registers, receivers, clerks, and employees; and in the bill which passed this House the other night, (at the hour when burglaries are generally committed,) for the organization of the two Territories of Kansas and Nebraska, where the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, speaking from the spot, says that on the 11th of October last there were but three white men to be governed, you propose to make two new Governors, two superintendents of Indian affairs, two secretaries, six judges, two marshals, and two district attorneys, giving them all as high salaries as the officials in any other Territories receive; and I may be allowed to add, I hope, Mr. Chairman, by way of parenthesis, and as showing the beauties of non-intervention as contained in that bill, not one of this brood of officers are to be elected or chosen by the people of those Territories, (if there are any people there;) but they are to be selected, commissioned, and forced upon that people by a non-intervention Administration in this city of Washington—more than a thousand miles from the people to be governed—the people having not one word to say on the subject, and nothing to do with it but submissively to bow to this central Government. And the selection is to be made from the expectant and anxious men who are singing praises to the great doctrine, or principle, as they say, of non-intervention, and of allowing the people of the Territories to govern themselves in their own way. What fallacious reasons can be made satisfactory to men who can find none more substantial for perpetrating a great wrong.

In addition to all these new places, as a reward to faithful followers, you have on your table bills for the creation of the office of a new surveyor general for New Mexico, for Utah, and, I believe, for Washington and Minnesota, with a corps of clerks and employees to each. Sir, I will not go further with the enumeration now.

All of these places, and many more of like character, seemingly made for the occasion, are to be filled, and the officers are to be paid by this General Government.

Well, sir, this is by no means all; for here, in this bill, it is proposed to raise the salaries of officers in California, and now we have this proposition to increase the pay for the public printing. We cannot move a step in this House, without voting away money, money, and voting for patronage, patronage, and voting plunder, plunder, in every way and shape; we are fastened to this system of legislation, and cannot escape; we are like poor Mr. Pickwick, who had to lead his terrible horse round and round all day, and could not get rid of him. Now I would be liberal, and I would give money and patronage where the good of the country requires it. Nay, I have gone further, and voted it when there was any reason for it whatever; but I put my foot down here; I intend this House shall know, and I want the country to know, that all of this legislation is nothing, and means nothing but money, patronage, plunder, and jobs, and is only needed to stop the cry of hungry partisans, who can be quieted only in this way, and by these means.

Sir, if the Senate have seen fit to go into a foolish crusade for the purpose of getting up an additional office or printing establishment, so as to give additional pay, let them take care of their own children; let them provide for their own offspring. It is sufficient for my purpose to know that, under the law passed, through much difficulty, the printing business has so far worked well; and there is no occasion, in my opinion, here or in the country, to have it disturbed for the single and simple purpose of putting money into the hands of men who have been appointed under the law as it now is, and entered upon their duties with a full knowledge of what that law contains.

Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia. Putting money merely into the hands of somebody! Into whose hands is money put by this bill? I am amazed at the argument made by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HAVEN,] because I am conscious that the effect of this amendment is to take a terrific source of patronage from the hands of the Executive. Although I am friendly to the Executive, yet I do not think that the power ought to be vested in the Executive Department, or with an appointee of the President, to enable him, by his own will, by his own diction, to build up the organ of one branch of Congress at the expense of another. In comparison with the control of such a power as that gives, what is the sum of $15,000 in a Government like ours? Taking the relation of the two Houses of Congress to each other—each electing its own printer, the editor of a paper—what is the sum of $15,000 in comparison with the power and patronage you put into the hands of the Executive in controlling these presses. Divide the printing, and when the two Houses elect two printers, let the printer of each House do the work of the particular House to which he was elected. What could be more proper than that? Would it not be far better to do that, although you pay a little more extra compensation, than to have these parties in court, engaged in a controversy and strife about it? The court have decided that the Committee on Printing was the tribunal to settle this matter; but that committee say that they have no jurisdiction over the matter. I undertake to say, from my knowledge of the subject, that the merits of the case are against the position of the Superintendent of Printing; and though both tribunals, in the precise case that has gone before them, erred in the matter, each one decided they had no authority to correct it.

Is it not better that the printer of the House should execute the printing of the House, and the printer of the Senate the printing of the Senate, and that the printing of the Executive documents should be divided between them? I understand the position of my friend from New York, [Mr. HAVEN,] but I hope he is reckoning without his host. He thinks the next House of Representatives is going to be Whig, and that is the secret of his zeal about this matter. [Laughter.] I think he is mistaken. He desires to retain the printing as at present, knowing that the Senate will continue Democratic, so that a Whig printer may be elected for the next House of Representatives, and have the whole patronage of this body. But, I repeat, the gentleman is reckoning without his host.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now pending is the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HAVEN.]

Mr. HAVEN. I withdraw it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. PHILPS.]

Mr. ORR. I renew the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HAVEN.] Mr. Chairman, I concur with the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. PRATT,] as to the propriety of the amendment which he offered—

Mr. LETCHER, (interrupting.) I rise to a question of order. The amendment of my friend from South Carolina [Mr. ORR] has been defeated before.

Mr. ORR. No; it was withdrawn, and I renew it.

Mr. LETCHER. Well, still it is not in order.

Mr. ORR. It is in order, and I have a right to do it.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina is in order.

Mr. ORR. I concur, Mr. Chairman, with the sentiment of the gentleman from Connecticut, that this amended section here is just as legitimate in this bill as if a section had been incorporated in it to raise two additional regiments of mounted volunteers. What is the title of the bill? It is "A bill to supply the deficiencies in the appropriation for the service of the fiscal year ending 30th June, 1854." And yet you have an independent section here, the object of which is not to make the appropriation of a single dollar. No, not a single cent is appropriated in this section which proposes to repeal a material part of an act of Congress on a subject which is wholly different, and totally disconnected from the bill itself.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it has been very much the habit, during the last few years, to send back to this House, from the other wing of the Capitol, bills loaded down with matter illegitimate—which ought to be out of order in any deliberative assembly at all—with the expectation that this House will be forced, by combinations of the various matters introduced, to pass measures which otherwise would be objectionable.

Now, sir, we passed this bill to regulate the printing, as has been observed by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HAVEN,] a year and a half ago. I believe, myself, that it has worked well. There has but one difficulty sprung up, and that is a controversy between the printers as to certain printing ordered by the two Houses. This is not, sir, in my judgment, a serious difficulty. It is not a difficulty which requires to be remedied by us. And, besides, Mr. Chairman, if this section be adopted in the way in which it came from the Senate, it will devolve on the Government an additional expenditure of not less than $20,000 per annum. What is the necessity of this additional expense? Is it simply for the purpose of preventing the quarreling of the two printers? Does this quarreling affect us at all?

Mr. COBB. Oh, no; let them keep at it.

Mr. ORR. What, then, is the necessity of changing this law, and devolving this $20,000 additional expense on the Government? It might have been proper at the outset. The bill should have provided against any difficulty arising. I think that the only arrangement which could have been made, was made in saving the extra cost of double composition in the work which the two Houses might order to be printed.

But, Mr. Chairman, if the first part of the section recommended by the Committee of Ways and Means should be adopted, there is no chance of a controversy arising. And the only excuse for making the change here, is, that the two printers may, if the change is not made, continue to get into controversies. But I think that it is time for this House and this committee to assert its independence. It is time that the committee should declare its opposition, its hostility to this system of legislation, which is to incorporate everything into a deficiency bill, whether legitimate or illegitimate, and which comprises propositions to repeal general laws, which, perhaps, if they were taken on their own merits, it would be impossible to get through the two Houses. I hope the section, in the first place, will be stricken out; and if this is not done, then I hope that the amendment recommended by the Committee of Ways and Means will be concurred in.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky. I am opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. ORR,] and I simply desire to say a single word in reference to it. It is this: Some inconvenience and difficulty does ensue to the House in consequence of the controversy arising out of the different constructions of this law. A few weeks ago one of the printers to Congress made an application to the courts for a writ of mandamus to compel the Superintendent of Printing to discharge his duty in giving to him the printing of matter ordered by the House of Representatives. The court granted a temporary injunction, which tied up the two printers; and neither of them could do the work which was required, and which we were all clamoring for every day. The work which we wanted performed has thus been stopped by order of the court, because the printers were not allowed to proceed with it.

Mr. HAVEN, (interrupting.) And the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BAYLY] says it was done on his advice.

Mr. STANTON. I do not know on whose advice the mandamus was applied for; I merely desire to show that, under the present law, some inconvenience and difficulty has ensued in the printing ordered by this House.

Mr. DEAN. I wish to ask the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. STANTON] if the injunction of which he speaks has not been dissolved?

Mr. STANTON. It was dissolved; but the injunction created a delay in the public printing of a week or more.

Mr. ORR. If there is no objection, I will withdraw my amendment.

No objection being made, the amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. BARRY. It seems to me that this is merely a contest and squabble between two public printers, in which neither this House nor the Senate have any interest; for, by whomsoever the printing is done, it is well done.

I submit this further proposition: If there is a suit pending upon the construction of a law which has been passed by Congress, whether it is competent for Congress to step in and settle the difficulty by passing another law, or giving a construction to the existing law? Rights have already accrued under the law as it was passed.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky, (interrupting.) That is not contemplated by this amendment. Its provisions are to apply hereafter.

Mr. BARRY. The reason alleged for passing this amendment is, that difficulties have arisen between the printers already elected; and I supposed the inference to be, that the object of the amendment was to settle those difficulties.

Mr. STANTON. Not at all. The object is to prevent future difficulties.

Mr. BARRY. Then there is no necessity whatever for the passage of a law. The sole purpose seems to be to pay $25,000 for fear that the printers of the two Houses may have a contest—about what? About what they are to receive for doing the public printing. If they are so well paid that they can afford to spend a portion of their receipts in litigation, what business is that to the Senate and the House? It is admitted that, under the present law, their duties are well discharged. But it is said that the object is to prevent the possibility of future difficulties; and they are willing to incur $20,000 additional expense for that.

Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia, (interrupting.) I would say to the gentleman that the printing of the agricultural part of the Patent Office report is hung up in the Supreme Court, and I do not believe that the matter can be decided at this term. Is not that an inconvenience to the House, the Senate, and the country? Is it not an inconvenience which ought to be avoided in future? The object of this amendment is to provide against the recurrence of such an evil.

Mr. BARRY. I do not know how Congress can prevent the printers of the two Houses, who are waxing fat upon the profits of that printing and that of the Departments, from spending as much as they please in litigation. If the object is to prevent the possibility of future litigation, I know of no way to accomplish that object, except by paying them so little that they will become so poor that they cannot litigate further.

Mr. ORR. I desire to make one additional remark. If there be a defect in the existing law, the Committee on Printing ought to be aware of the fact. They are specially charged with that duty. Let that committee bring in a bill to amend the law, wherever there exists a defect; but let us not attempt, in this side-bar sort of a way, to change the law, when we cannot have the opportunity to investigate the subject, and before the matter has been referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. HAVEN. And let me add to the remarks of the gentleman from South Carolina by saying, that by the rules of the House, a report from that committee is admitted at any time, and the report so made takes precedence of any other subject.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky. But that committee has no right to originate anything, but can only act upon matters which are referred to them. That is provided for by the law of the land, as well as by the rules of the House.

Mr. ORR. Would not this very thing give that committee sufficient grounds to report a bill?

Mr. STANTON. Not at all. We have no jurisdiction over it—none in the world.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. BARRY. If there is no objection, I will withdraw it.

There being no objection, the amendment was withdrawn.

The question then recurring upon the amendment offered by Mr. PHELPS, it was put; and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DEAN. I now move to strike out the remainder of the Senate amendment.

Mr. HOUSTON. The question is upon the non-concurring in the Senate amendment, as amended; and by voting in the negative, the gentleman will accomplish the object of his motion.

Mr. DEAN. That being the case, I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky. I again propose the amendment to the section, as it now stands, which was previously submitted by me, and adopted, but which fell by the rejection of the section in which it was incorporated. I take this occasion, also, to say that I know the sentiments of the Committee on Printing upon this subject, and they are in favor of this portion of the section, with the amendment I now offer. I move the following:

Provided, That compensation in no case shall be paid where the work is not actually performed.

The question was then taken; and the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The question was then taken on concurring in the amendment of the Senate, as amended; and decided in the negative.

The fifty-second amendment was read, as follows:

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That so much of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1853, and for other purposes," as provides for compensation to the Spanish consul and others, for losses occasioned by violence at New Orleans and at Key West, in the year 1851, shall be so construed as to place Michael Papprenitza, a subject of Austria, on the same footing with the subjects of Spain.

Mr. PHELPS. The Committee of Ways and Means recommend a non-concurrence in the amendment of the Senate. The act referred to in this section provides compensation to the Spanish consul and other Spanish subjects, for property destroyed by a mob in New Orleans, about the time of the Lopez expedition to Cuba. It appears that this Michael Papprenitza, an Austrian subject, in some way also suffered losses by this same mob. We did not see any good reason, however, why a subject of Austria should be embraced within the provisions of this act, and we therefore recommend a non-concurrence in the amendment.

Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia. I will tell my friend from Missouri what is the propriety of including this Austrian subject within the provisions of this act. He comes precisely in the same category as the Spaniards who are embraced in the provisions of that act did. He was an Austrian, but he was mistaken for a Spaniard. He suffered in the same manner, by the same mob, that the Spaniards did. The law to which this section refers I drew myself, and I confined it to Spanish subjects. The law was put upon the ground that it was not right that innocent persons should suffer for the offenses of the Spanish Government. The outrages were committed because of certain acts of the Spanish Government in Cuba, and we did not think these persons ought to suffer for it. Well, now, sir, this Austrian subject presents a much stronger case than the Spanish ones did. His property was destroyed by the same mob, they supposing him to be a Spanish subject. It was purely through a mistake. But the law does not provide for his case. I really do think this is an amendment which we ought to adopt. I have looked into the case, and know all about it. It really presents a stronger case than that of the Spaniards.

Mr. HAVEN. I have not looked into this matter with any great degree of care. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BAYLY] says he has, and that it should be adopted. I have great confidence in his judgment as chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, to which this case more properly belongs. But, sir, I will state to the committee the reasons which led me to come to the conclusion which I did in reference to it; and I think the Committee of Ways and Means came to the same conclusions, for the same reasons. We thought that if we undertook to pay this gentleman, who was not a Spanish subject, it would be recognizing a principle by which the Government would be made responsible for all the loss which was suffered by everybody on that occasion. This man had no connection with Cuba whatever, nor with Spanish affairs, more than any of the citizens of New Orleans. The committee thought there was no principle upon which this claim could be allowed, and that it would be setting a dangerous precedent to allow it. I do not understand the claim itself, however, to be one of any very great moment. It involves only a small amount; and if the gentleman who is at the head of the Committee on Foreign Affairs says it is proper that it should be paid, I will yield to the confidence I have in his judgment. The committee recommended a non-concurrence because they thought it would be setting a dangerous precedent.

The question was taken; and the amendment of the Senate was non-concurred in.

The fifty-third amendment of the Senate was next read by the Clerk, as follows:

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That, for custom-houses and marine hospitals, and to complete the same, the following sums be, and they are hereby, appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, namely:

For completing the custom-house at St. Louis, Missouri, $100,000;

For completing the custom-house at Mobile, Alabama, $65,000;

For completing the custom-house at Cincinnati, Ohio, $40,000;

For completing the custom-house at Louisville, Kentucky, $40,000;

For completing the custom-house at Bangor, Maine, $20,000;

For completing the custom-house at Bath, Maine, $20,000;

For completing the custom-house at Wilmington, Delaware, $12,000;

For purchasing a site for a custom-house at Providence, Rhode Island, $24,000;

For the purchase of a new site for the custom-house in San Francisco, $250,000; and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized, if, in his judgment, the public interest will thereby be promoted, to apply this appropriation, and as much as may be necessary of former appropriations, for the erection of a custom-house on the land reserved for said purpose, to the purchase of a building or buildings for a custom-house and other public offices; and the said Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to take all legal proceedings which may be necessary or advisable to maintain and secure the possession and title of the United States to the lot heretofore selected for the site of a custom-house;

For the erection of a custom-house at Portland, Maine, including rooms for the United States court, and for a post office, $200,000;

To complete the marine hospital at Cleveland, Ohio, $25,000;

To complete the marine hospital at St. Louis, Missouri, $10,000;

To complete the marine hospital at Chicago, Illinois, $8,000;

To complete the marine hospital at Louisville, Kentucky, $12,500.

To complete the marine hospital at Paducah, Kentucky, $5,000;

To complete the marine hospital at Evansville, Indiana, $2,000;

To complete the marine hospital at San Francisco, California, $44,000; and to construct a marine hospital at Burlington, Iowa, $15,000.

Amend the title by adding at the end thereof—and for other purposes.

Mr. PHELPS. I merely rise to state the recommendation of the Committee of Ways and Means, and not to enter into a discussion of the subject. This matter was discussed when the deficiency bill was last before us.

Mr. WALSH. And rejected.

Mr. PHELPS. We recommend a non-concurrence in the amendment, which appropriates $892,500.

[Cries of "Let us take the vote!"]

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. By leave of my friend from Missouri, I would suggest that we have no discussion, no controversy on these items in committee, but to let them go by default. Let them be voted down. I doubt whether there is a quorum here. If the friends of the items desire to unite them to the bill, they can have the yeas and nays in the House.

[Cries of "That's right!"]

Mr. PHELPS. I am much obliged to my friend from Kentucky for his suggestion, and hope that it will be adopted by the committee.

Mr. HAVEN. Let me make a suggestion; I will not occupy a minute. I would like, though I do not know that it will meet with the approbation of the committee, to strike out all the amendments, with the single exception of the appropriation for the Providence custom-house.

Mr. WALSH. Providence will take care of that. [Laughter.]

Mr. McDougall. The appropriation for the California custom-house is the heaviest of the entire amendments. While I shall support it, yet thinking that, for the expedition of business, this matter should not be discussed, I am willing to accept the suggestion of the gentleman from Kentucky.

[Cries of "That's right!"]

Mr. KNOX. I move to strike out the appropriation of $65,000 for the custom-house at Mobile, Alabama.

Mr. Chairman, I submit the amendment for the purpose of expressing the reasons which will govern me in voting against this bill. If I were to wait until we got into the House, I should be deprived of an opportunity to do so by the previous question. I object to all these appropriations for custom-houses. I object to the whole bill, as commencing at the wrong end of legislation. What is the bill? Look at the first item in it. It provides for the pay of the Secretary of State; and if you look under all the headings into which it is divided, you will see that the first item under each is to provide for the pay of some high officer of the Government. The bill provides for the Government, and leaves the people to take care of themselves.

Mr. PHELPS. Does not the gentleman from Illinois know that at the last session of Congress the compensation of all the heads of Departments was raised?

Mr. KNOX. I do; but so much the worse. I cannot yield to the gentleman. I come now to the appropriations which I desire to have stricken out. What is the object of all these appropriations for custom-houses? It is to provide splendid palaces in your large cities, in which to exact your customs, which are collected from the whole country. There is not a word in this bill that looks to the interests of the great American people. It appropriates not one dollar for the improvement of the navigable waters of the country, over which is carried the commerce which is to create the necessity for these expensive custom-houses. It is upon this ground that I shall vote against these appropriations for custom-houses, and against the whole bill. It commences at the wrong end. It is the duty of the Representatives of the people here to look first to the interests of their constituents. We are not here to legislate for the Government or for large cities. I, for one, am not here to legislate for the exclusive benefit of the large cities and the high officers of the Government.

Mr. DEAN. I do not rise to discuss this matter. I hope the suggestion of the gentleman from Kentucky and others will be complied with, and that we shall come to a vote at once.

Mr. KNOX. I withdraw my amendment.

The question was then taken on concurring in the amendment of the Senate, and it was decided in the negative.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. PHELPS. I move that the committee do now rise, and report its action upon the amendments to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the Chairman (Mr. CHANDLER) reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had the Union generally under consideration, and particularly the amendments of the Senate to the deficiency bill, in some of which they had concurred, in others non-concurred, and others they had directed him to report with amendments.

Mr. PHELPS. I demand the previous question upon the report just made.

Mr. KEITT. I simply desire to say, in connection with some remarks I made yesterday, that the commissioner, General Campbell, to whom I alluded, designed to be understood that the estimate sent to the House by the Secretary was ample for all the purposes contemplated, and that the $10,000 appropriated in the deficiency bill was sufficient for the current expenses of the year.

The previous question was seconded.

Mr. LETCHER. I move a call of the House. There are but very few members present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is too late, as the previous question has been seconded, and the question now is upon ordering the main question to be put.

The main question was then ordered to be put.

Mr. CHASTAIN. I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. ORR. I hope the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CHASTAIN] will withdraw that motion, as I think we can get through most of the amendments this afternoon.

Mr. CHASTAIN. I withdraw the motion.

Mr. WALSH. I renew the motion to adjourn.

Mr. HOUSTON. I hope the gentleman from New York [Mr. WALSH] will not insist upon his motion. Let us go through with the bill, and agree to the amendments that are not controverted.

Mr. WALSH. I would prefer having the opponents of the bill present as well as its friends, who, by an express order, have been hunted up by the boys.

Mr. HOUSTON. There are some amendments upon which we can all agree.

Mr. WALSH. There is not one which I am in favor of.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The amendments will all be read through; and if any gentleman desires a separate vote upon any amendment he will designate it, and then the House will proceed to vote on such amendments upon which a separate vote was not asked.

Mr. WALSH. I withdraw my motion that the House adjourn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendments.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. I desire simply to ask whether the same object cannot be attained with a great saving of time by gentlemen naming the amendments upon which they require a separate vote, without having them all read?

Mr. WALSH. I wish to inquire whether, in the first reading of the bill, if a vote is not demanded upon an amendment, it is considered as equivalent to passing it?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is upon concurring with the amendments of the Senate as amended by the Committee of the Whole. They have been considered in Committee of the Whole, and reported to the House. The question now is in concurring or non-concurring with these various amendments.

Mr. TRACY. I desire a separate vote upon each one of these amendments.

Mr. KNOX. Has the previous question been seconded?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It has been seconded, and the main question has been ordered to be put.

Mr. KNOX. I would inquire whether a motion to adjourn would now be in order?

The SPEAKER. That motion is in order.

Mr. KNOX. I move, then, that the House adjourn.

The question was taken; and the House refused to adjourn.

The first, second, third, and fourth amendments of the Senate (published in the proceedings of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union in yesterday's proceedings) were read consecutively, and severally agreed to.

The fifth amendment of the Senate, providing certain payments to John Bozman Kerr, was read.

Mr. LETCHER. Mr. Chairman, I ask the yeas and nays on that amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is it the desire of the committee to take the question now, or wait till we have disposed of all the amendments to which there may be no objection?

Mr. HAMILTON. It is better for the committee to pass on now, and take the yeas and nays afterwards.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there be no objection that course will be pursued.

Mr. WALSH. I object.

Mr. HAMILTON. If the yeas and nays are called now we may not have a quorum.

Mr. WALSH. And is it proper to pass this bill without a quorum?

Mr. HAMILTON. I do not mean to intimate that; but—

Mr. WALSH, (interrupting.) I ask the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, or the gentleman who has charge of the bill, [Mr. PHELPS,] whether, if there is no objection to the proposal to pass on now, and let the yeas and nays be called afterwards, he will press a final vote on this bill to-day?

Mr. PHELPS. Not upon any controverted question. I hardly understand the gentleman's question. If objection be made to any amendment, and the yeas and nays be ordered, the question will not be taken till to-morrow. I am desirous, myself, that there should be a full House to-morrow on passing the bill.

Mr. WALSH. Well, will you agree not to press the bill to a final vote to-day if I withdraw my objection?

Mr. PHELPS. Certainly.

Mr. WALSH. Then I withdraw my objection.

Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia. I rise to appeal to my friend and colleague [Mr. LETCHER] in reference to this matter of Mr. Kerr. It is a proposition which I believe to be just; and I beg he will withdraw his objection to it, and let it be agreed to. It is the first favor I have ever asked from my colleague, and if he grant this, I will never ask another from him.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BAYLY] is not in order.

Mr. LETCHER. I have the greatest respect for my colleague, and I shall be very willing to comply with his request so far as I can; but there is an important principle involved in this amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. All this is out of order.

Mr. LETCHER, (continuing.) And I know that if I do not, somebody else would call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The following Senate amendments, in which the Committee of the Whole recommended a concurrence, were agreed to by the House:

Nos. 6, 7, 8, 9, 11, 13, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 21, 22, 23, 27, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, 44.

The following amendments, in which the Committee of the Whole recommended a non-concurrence, were rejected by the House:

Nos. 11, 12, 14, 20, 26, 48.

The following amendments of the Senate, in which the Committee of the Whole recommended a concurrence with amendments, were so concurred in:

Nos. 38, 39, 43, 46, 47, 50.

The following amendments of the Senate coming up in order for concurrence, were objected to, and the yeas and nays demanded on their adoption, as indicated below:

No. 10, by Mr. LETCHER.

No. 24, by Mr. McDougall.

No. 25, by Mr. LETCHER.

No. 36, by Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky.

No. 37, by Mr. BRIDGES.

No. 40, by Mr. TRACY.

No. 41, by Mr. McDougall.

No. 42, by Mr. LATHAM.

No. 45, by Mr. RUSSELL.

No. 49, by Mr. ———.

No. 51, by Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia.

No. 52, by Mr. MORRISON.

No. 53, by Mr. ORR.

Mr. PHELPS. The Clerk need not read the fifty-fourth amendment, as there will be a separate vote demanded upon it.

Mr. WALSH. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was put; and the motion was agreed to.

The House then (at a quarter to three o'clock, p. m.) adjourned until to-morrow at twelve, m.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, May 25, 1854.

Prayer by Rev. WILLIAM H. MILLBURN.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

CREDENTIALS.

Mr. SEWARD presented the credentials of Hon. FRANCIS GILLETTE, chosen by the Legislature of Connecticut a Senator from that State for the unexpired term of Hon. Truman Smith, resigned.

The credentials were read, and the oath prescribed by law having been administered to Mr. GILLETTE, he took his seat in the Senate.

RAILROAD IN MISSISSIPPI.

Mr. BROWN. I have been waiting for several days to get an opportunity to introduce a little bill which is interesting and very important to a portion of my constituents, if to nobody else. I now ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to allow me to introduce, at this time, a bill further to amend an act entitled "An act to appropriate the proceeds of the sales of the public lands, and to grant preemption rights," &c., approved September 4, 1841.

Leave was granted; and by unanimous consent the bill was read a first and second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes further to amend the sixteenth section of the act of 1841, so as to give the consent of Congress to the change of the route of the railroad therein mentioned, authorized by the act of the Legislature of the State of Mississippi, entitled "An act further to amend the several acts incorporating the Southern Railroad Company," approved the 4th of February, 1854; and that the two per cent. of the sales of the public lands, relinquished by the act of Congress of 1841 to the State of Mississippi, may be applied to the construction of a railroad on the route adopted by that company, under said act of the Legislature of Mississippi.

Mr. BROWN. As I wish to have this bill passed now, I ask the Senate to indulge me for a moment in explaining it. It simply proposes to change the route of a railroad so as to avoid a very heavy grade—one which is found, upon survey, to be impracticable, but which, by the act of Congress making the grant of two per cent. on the proceeds of the public lands to the State of Mississippi, it is required to pursue. The State of Mississippi has asked for this; and I suppose no one else is interested in it. That is the whole bill, though it has a very potential title.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read a third time, and passed.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

On motion, it was Ordered, That when the Senate adjourns to-day, it be to meet on Monday next.

RESCUE OF LIEUTENANT STRAIN.

Mr. CLAYTON. I have been unanimously directed by the Committee on Foreign Relations to report back to the Senate the joint resolution introduced by me a few days since, "manifesting the sense of Congress towards Commander Edward Marshall, commanding her Britannic Majesty's ship Virago, and the officers and crew who were detached by his order for the relief of the surveying party under the command of Lieutenant J. G. Strain." I trust that, by the unanimous consent of the Senate, this resolution may now be considered and passed.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded, as in Committee of the Whole, to the consideration of the joint resolution.

It proposes to request the President to procure gold medals, with suitable devices, one to be presented to Commander Edward Marshall, commanding the Virago; another to William C. Forsyth, first lieutenant; one to Dr. William Ross; and another to Paymaster W. H. Hills, as a testimonial of national gratitude for their generous and humane conduct, and well-directed efforts in extending relief to the surveying party of Lieutenant Strain, and saving thirteen suffering Americans from death.

It proposes, also, to authorize the President to cause to be paid to each of the boat's crew who were engaged in the rescue of the surveying party, the sum of one hundred dollars, as evidence of the high sense entertained by Congress of their generous assistance.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read a third time, and passed.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Mr. FISH presented two petitions of citizens of the State of New York, remonstrating against the repeal of the Missouri compromise; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. SEWARD presented resolutions adopted at a meeting of the Cortland District Theological Society, of the Methodist Episcopal Church, held at Cincinnati, New York, protesting against the repeal of the Missouri compromise, or the organization of the Territories of Nebraska and Kansas, without a prohibition of slavery therein; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Also, a petition of citizens of the city of New York, remonstrating against a repeal of the Missouri compromise; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. FOOT presented documents in support of the claim of Sarah Movey, late the wife of James Movey, a revolutionary soldier, to a pension; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Also, documents in relation to the claim of Francis Hutinack, a revolutionary pensioner, to arrears of pension; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. RUSK presented a memorial of the route agents of the Post Office Department, praying an increase of compensation; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. NORRIS presented a memorial of the officers of the penitentiary of the District of Columbia, praying an increase of compensation; which was referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

Mr. BAYARD. I desire to present the petition of J. L. Collins. That gentleman called on me yesterday in reference to his claim on Congress, connected with the decisions of the recent board to examine the Mexican claims. It was a subject upon which my judgment, as a member of the special committee on that matter, was asked. The committee decided against the claim; but he thinks he has now such documentary testimony as will enable him to justify Congress in interfering in his behalf. I know nothing of the character of the individual, but I feel it my duty to present the petition, and I ask that it be referred to the Committee on Claims.

It was so referred.

Mr. WRIGHT presented the petition of Andrew Rankin, praying an extension of his patent for an improvement in the manufacture of hats; which was referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

REPORTS FROM STANDING COMMITTEES.

Mr. ALLEN, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the report of the Secretary of the Interior, communicating a list of rejected applications for pensions, and recommending that the act of February 3, 1853, "to continue half pay to certain widows and orphans, be amended," submitted a report, accompanied by a bill extending the provisions of the act of February 3, 1853, to widows of officers, non-commissioned officers, seamen, and marines, who served in the Navy of the Revolution; which was read, and passed to a second reading. The report was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Margaret Chandler, mother of Walter S. Chandler, of the Army, who was drowned while in the discharge of his duty, praying a pension, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. PETTIT, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred a bill for the relief of L. E. L. A. Lawson, sole surviving heiress of General Eleazar Ripley, deceased, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. BENJAMIN, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to whom was referred a bill for the relief of the Pine Grove Academy in Louisiana, reported it back without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a bill to confirm the claim of William H. Henderson, and the heirs of Robert Henderson, to five hundred acres of land in the Bastrop grant, reported it back without amendment.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I am directed by the Committee on Private Land Claims, who made adverse reports on a bill to authorize T. H. McManus to enter, by preemption, certain lands in the Greensburg land district, Louisiana, and a bill for the relief of John Boyd, to move that they be recommended to that committee. There has been an error, for which I was in fault, and we desire to repair that error.

The motion to recommit was agreed to; and the order for printing the adverse reports in these cases was rescinded.

Mr. HAMLIN, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred a resolution of the Senate directing that committee to inquire into the expediency of making an appropriation for a marine hospital at Pensacola, reported a bill providing for the erection of a marine hospital building at Pensacola, in the State of Florida; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a petition of ship-owners and others residing in Clinton and Westbrook, in Connecticut, praying that those towns may be annexed to the collection district of New Haven, reported a bill for that purpose; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a memorial of citizens of Florida, praying the erection of a marine hospital at Appalachicola, asked to be discharged from the further consideration thereof; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom were referred resolutions of the Legislature of the State of Texas, in favor of changing the port of entry from Point Isabel to Brownsville, and sundry memorials against the same, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

NEBRASKA AND KANSAS.

On motion by Mr. DOUGLAS, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the House bill to organize the Territories of Nebraska and Kansas; the pending question being on the amendment of Mr. PEARCE to the fifth section, to strike out the words:

"And those who shall have declared on oath their intention to become such, and shall have taken an oath to support the Constitution of the United States, and the provisions of this act,"

—so that the proviso shall read:

"Provided, That the right of suffrage, and of holding office, shall be exercised only by citizens of the United States."

Mr. BELL resumed the speech in which he was interrupted by the adjournment yesterday, and spoke an hour and a half.

Mr. TOOMBS replied.

Mr. BELL responded.

The debate was continued by Messrs. CLAYTON, WADE, BROWN, BENJAMIN, SEWARD, CASS, MASON, MALLORY, and BAYARD.

Mr. WELLER called for the yeas and nays on the amendment, and they were ordered, and, after some observations from Messrs. JONES of Iowa, BUTLER, and JONES of Tennessee, at seventeen minutes past ten o'clock, p. m., were taken; and resulted—yeas 7, nays 41; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Bell, Brodhead, Brown, Clayton, Pearce, and Thompson of Kentucky—7.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Atchison, Benjamin, Butler, Cass, Chase, Clay, Dawson, Dodge of Wisconsin, Douglas, Fish, Fitzpatrick, Foot, Gillette, Gwin, Hunter, James, Johnson, Jones of Iowa, Jones of Tennessee, Mallory, Mason, Morton, Norris, Pettit, Pratt, Rusk, Sebastian, Seward, Shields, Slidell, Stuart, Sumner, Thomson of New Jersey, Toombs, Toucey, Wade, Walker, Weller, Williams, and Wright—41.

So the amendment was rejected.

Debate was continued by Messrs. CHASE, BROWN, BUTLER, and WELLER.

The bill was reported to the Senate.

Mr. SUMNER next addressed the Senate, and was followed in explanation by Mr. MASON. Mr. TOUCEY also spoke, and Mr. DOUGLAS rose to close the debate. He spoke until one o'clock, a. m.

Mr. TOUCEY made a few remarks, in which he said he should not obey the instructions of the Whig Abolition Legislature of Connecticut, as to the vote he should give on this bill, for which he assigned reasons.

The vote was taken on ordering the bill to a third reading; and resulted—yeas 35, nays 13; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Atchison, Badger, Benjamin, Brodhead, Brown, Butler, Cass, Clay, Dawson, Douglas, Fitzpatrick, Gwin, Hunter, Johnson, Jones of Iowa, Jones of Tennessee, Mallory, Mason, Morton, Norris, Pearce, Pettit, Pratt, Rusk, Sebastian, Shields, Slidell, Stuart, Thompson of Kentucky, Thomson of New Jersey, Toombs, Toucey, Weller, Williams, and Wright—35.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Bell, Chase, Clayton, Fish, Foot, Gillette, Hamlin, James, Seward, Sumner, Wade, and Walker—13.

The bill was then read a third time, and passed, at ten minutes past one o'clock, a. m.

The Senate then adjourned.

[The above debate will be found in the Appendix.]

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, May 26, 1854.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. WILLIAM H. MILBURN.

TREASURY REPORT ON BANKS.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky. I desire to introduce, from the Committee on Printing, a resolution, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That fifteen hundred copies of the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the condition of the banks of the United States, communicated to this House on the 11th instant, be printed for the use of the Treasury Department.

Mr. STANTON. I move the adoption of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. That can only be done by unanimous consent, as the House is acting under the previous question upon the amendments to the deficiency bill. No other business can be done, except by unanimous consent, while that matter is undisposed of.

Mr. STANTON. I hope the House will give its unanimous consent to its being put upon its passage.

Mr. LETCHER. What does the Secretary of the Treasury want with them?

Mr. STANTON. I suppose he wants them for the use of the Department.

Mr. LETCHER. If there is any necessity for having that number of extra copies printed, I should like to know what that necessity is?

Mr. DEAN. Gentlemen all over the country are sending for that report. It is to supply that want that these copies are needed.

Mr. LETCHER. The House, I suppose, prints enough to supply that demand. It prints some fifteen hundred copies, I believe.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made by the gentleman from Virginia, and the resolution cannot now be put upon its passage.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move that when this House adjourns, it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. On that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered, only sixteen members seconding the demand.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I call for tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. Cox and VAIL were appointed; and, on a division, the tellers reported—ayes fifteen; not a sufficient number. So the yeas and nays were not ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to adjourn over till Monday next.

Mr. JONES. I ask for a division on the question.

Mr. DRUM. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to propose a resolution.

The SPEAKER. There is a question pending which must be disposed of before the gentleman's resolution can be presented.

The question was then taken by division; and the Speaker announced 67 in the affirmative, and 32 in the negative; not a quorum.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move that there be a call of the House.

Mr. JONES. I call for tellers on the motion to adjourn over.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. Cox and VAIL were appointed.

The question was taken; and the tellers reported—ayes 80, noes 38.

So the House agreed that when it adjourns today, it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

Mr. DRUM. I send to the Clerk's desk a resolution, which I ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce.

The resolution was read for information, as follows:

Resolved, That the several standing committees of the House having at this time in charge bills relating to private claims of whatsoever kind, be allowed to report the same respectively, by filing them with the Clerk, who will place them in their order upon the Calendar, and the same shall be printed.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I call for the regular order of business.

Mr. DRUM. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his objection. We have our desks full of bills ready to report.

Mr. JONES. I am willing to set apart a time for making these reports in a legitimate manner, but I am not willing that they should be made in this wholesale manner.

Mr. DRUM. The gentleman will observe that this is only for those reports which are now ready to be made. It does not propose to change any rules.

Mr. JONES. Let them be made one at a time. I object.

Mr. LANCASTER. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce one or two territorial bills for the purpose of having them referred.

There was no objection, and

Mr. LANCASTER introduced bills, which were read a first and second time by their titles, as follows, and referred as indicated:

A bill to establish the office of surveyor general in the Territory of Washington. Referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

A bill for the construction of military roads in the Territory of Washington. Referred to the Committee on the Territories.

THE DEFICIENCY BILL.

The SPEAKER stated the business first in order to be upon concurring with the Senate in the following amendment to the deficiency bill:

For payment to John Bozman Kerr, in addition to his salary and allowances as chargé d'affaires to Nicaragua, the amount of his expenses on the journey to San Salvador and Guatemala, and of his expenses at those capitals under his commissions to the Governments of those Republics, together with a full outfit as chargé d'affaires to the national representation of Central America.

The SPEAKER. The Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union recommend a concurrence in the amendment.

Mr. PHELPS. I wish to know if the question cannot be taken directly upon concurring in the amendment? It seems to me we should save time by adopting such a course.

The SPEAKER. The question will be put in that form, if there be no objection.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. The yeas and nays were called upon that amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has heard no call.

Mr. JONES. The yeas and nays were yesterday called upon every amendment which was not then disposed of.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hardly sees how the yeas and nays could be called upon propositions beforehand; but if that was the understanding, he will so regard it.

Mr. JONES. If there is any misunderstanding upon the subject, I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia. I hope the yeas and nays will be ordered. The amendment certainly ought to be adopted.

Mr. JONES. I think it ought not to be adopted. I ask for tellers upon ordering the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. TAYLOR, of Tennessee, and CLINGMAN, were appointed.

The House was divided upon ordering the yeas and nays; and the tellers reported twenty-seven in the affirmative, (more than one fifth of those present.)

So the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken upon concurring; and decided in the affirmative—yeas 64, nays 61; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Willis Allen, Ashe, David J. Bailey, Thomas H. Bayly, Ball, Banks, Benton, Bocoek, Chandler, Clingman, Cox, Cullom, Curtis, Thomas Davis, Dean, De Witt, Drum, Dunbar, Edmundson, Etheridge, Florence, Gamble, Green, Hamilton, Aaron Harlan, Hunt, Roland Jones, Kerr, Knox, Kurtz, Lamb, McNair, May, Middle-swarth, Millson, Morgan, Orr, Parker, Peckham Pennington, Puryear, Riddle, David Ritchie, Ruffin, Russell, Sapp, Shower, Gerrit Smith, Frederick P. Stanton, Richard H. Stanton, Alexander H. Stephens, Andrew Stuart, John L. Taylor, Nathaniel G. Taylor, Thurston, Upham, Vail, Vansant, Walley, Ellihu B. Washburne, John Wentworth, Tappan Wentworth, Witte, and Yates—64.

NAYS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Barksdale, Barry, Belcher, Boyce, Breckinridge, Bridges, Caruthers, Chastain, Chrisman, Clark, Cobb, Cutting, John G. Davis, Dawson, Dowdell, Dunham, Eastman, Ellison, Flagler, Fuller, Giddings, Grow, Hendricks, Hill, Hillyer, Johnston, Johnson, Daniel T. Jones, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Latham, Letcher, Lindsley, McCulloch, Maurice, Maxwell, Smith Miller, Morrison, Nichols, Norton, Andrew Oliver, Peck, Phelps, Powell, Pratt, Pringle, Shaw, Skelton, William Smith, William R. Smith, George W. Smyth, Snodgrass, Stratton, Straub, Tracy, Trout, Walsh, Wells, Wheeler, and Hendrick B. Wright—61.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Tenth amendment:

For completing and keeping in order the grounds south of the President's House, $9,770.

The SPEAKER. The Committee of the Whole recommend a concurrence in the amendment, with the following amendment to the amendment:

And for furnishing an additional number of settees in the President's and Capitol grounds, $1,000.

Mr. WHEELER. I demand tellers upon the yeas and nays.

Tellers were not ordered; and the yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. WHEELER. I demand tellers upon the adoption of the amendment.

Tellers were not ordered.

The question was then taken; and the amendment to the amendment was adopted—aye 70, noes 56.

[A message was here received from the Senate, by the hands of ASBURY DICKINS, Esq., their Secretary, informing the House that the Senate had passed a bill of the House of the following title:

An act (No. 236) to organize the Territories of Nebraska and Kansas.

Also, that they had passed bills of the Senate of the following titles:

An act (No. 382) further to amend the act entitled "An act to appropriate the proceeds of the sales of the public lands, and to grant preemption rights," approved September 4, 1851.

A resolution (No. 16) manifesting the sense of Congress towards commander Edward Marshall, commanding her Britannic Majesty's ship Virago, and the officers and crew who were detached by his order for the relief of the surveying party under the command of Lieutenant J. G. Strain.]

The question then recurred on the tenth Senate amendment, as amended.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and decided in the affirmative—yeas 83, nays 59; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abercrombie, James C. Allen, Willis Allen, Thomas H. Bayly, Belcher, Bell, Bocoek, Boyce, Breckinridge, Bridges, Chandler, Clingman, Curtis, Cutting, Dawson, Dean, De Witt, Dowdell, Drum, Dunbar, Eddy, Edmunds, Thomas D. Eliot, Ellison, Everhart, Florence, Gamble, Giddings, Green, Hamilton, Aaron Harlan, Sampson W. Harris, Houston, Hunt, J. Glancy Jones, Roland Jones, Keitt, Kurtz, Lane, Latham, Macdonald, McDougall, McNair, Maxwell, May, Smith Miller, Milson, Orr, Peck, Peckham, Pennington, John Perkins, Phillips, Pratt, Preston, Richardson, Riddle, David Ritchie, Robbins, Seymour, Shannon, Shaw, Gerrit Smith, Samuel A. Smith, William Smith, William R. Smith, George W. Smyth, Snodgrass, Frederick P. Stanton, Richard H. Stanton, Alexander H. Stephens, John L. Taylor, Thurston, Upham, Vail, Vansant, Walley, Wells, John Wentworth, Tappan Wentworth, Westbrooke, and Hendrick B. Wright—83.

NAYS—Messrs. David J. Bailey, Ball, Barksdale, Barry, Caruthers, Chastain, Chrisman, Clark, Cobb, Cox, Cullom, John G. Davis, Thomas Davis, Dunham, Etheridge, Flagler, Haven, Hendricks, Henn, Hill, Hillyer, Johnson, Daniel T. Jones, George W. Jones, Knox, Lamb, Letcher, Lilly, Lindsley, McCulloch, Maurice, Middle-swarth, Morgan, Morrison, Nichols, Norton, Andrew Oliver, Mordecai Oliver, Parker, Phelps, Powell, Pringle, Puryear, Thomas Ritchey, Ruffin, Russell, Sapp, Stratton, Andrew Stuart, Nathaniel G. Taylor, Tracy, Trout, Wade, Ellihu B. Washburne, Wheeler, Daniel B. Wright, and Yates—59.

So the Senate amendment was concurred in.

The Clerk next read the twenty-fourth Senate amendment, as follows:

For the transportation of Governor Stevens and his party, and for explorations made by him between the Mississippi river and the Pacific ocean, $40,000.

The SPEAKER. The Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union recommend a non-concurrence in the amendment.

Mr. LATHAM. I made the call for the yeas and nays yesterday, and, with the unanimous consent of the House, I now withdraw that call.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I renew the call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. LATHAM. I demand tellers on the amendment.

Tellers were not ordered.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I would say to the House, that the friends of the amendment are willing that it should go to a committee of conference for correction.

The question was taken; and the amendment was not concurred in.

The twenty-fifth Senate amendment was next reported by the Clerk, as follows:

For continuing the works for bringing water into the city of Washington, $500,000.

The SPEAKER. The Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union recommend a non-concurrence in the amendment.

Mr. LETCHER demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

The question was taken; and the amendment was non-concurred in—yeas 47, nays 100; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abercrombie, Thomas H. Bayly, Banks, Barry, Bell, Breckinridge, Chandler, Clingman, Cullom, Cutting, John G. Davis, Dawson, Dean, De Witt, Dunbar, Eddy, Edmunds, Edmundson, Thomas D. Eliot, Florence, Green, Hamilton, Wiley P. Harris, Hillyer, Hunt, Keitt, Macdonald, May, Morrison, Packer, Peckham, John Perkins, Phillips, Riddle, Russell, Sabin, William R. Smith, Alexander H. Stephens, John J. Taylor, John L. Taylor, Upham, Vansant, Walker, Walley, John Wentworth, Tappan Wentworth, and Westbrooke—47.

NAYS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Willis Allen, David J. Bailey, Barksdale, Belcher, Benton, Boyce, Campbell, Caruthers, Caskey, Chastain, Chrisman, Clark, Cobb, Colquitt, Cox, Curtis, Thomas Davis, Dowdell, Dunham, Eastman, Ellison, English, Etheridge, Everhart, Flagler, Fuller, Gamble, Giddings, Goodrich, Grow, Aaron Harlan, Haven, Hill, Houston, Johnson, Daniel T. Jones, George W. Jones, Roland Jones, Knox, Kurtz, Lamb, Lane, Latham, Letcher, Lilly, Lindsley, Lindsley, McDougall, Maurice, Maxwell, Middle-swarth, John G. Miller, Smith Miller, Milson, Morgan, Nichols, Norton, Andrew Oliver, Mordecai Oliver, Orr, Parker, Peck, Pennington, Bishop Perkins, Phelps, Powell, Pratt, Pringle, Puryear, Richardson, David Ritchie, Thomas Ritchey, Sapp, Seymour, Shannon, Shaw, Shower, Skelton, Gerrit Smith, William Smith, George W. Smyth, Snodgrass, Frederick P. Stanton, Richard H. Stanton, Stratton, Straub, Nathaniel G. Taylor, Thurston, Tracy, Trout, Vail, Wade, Ellihu B. Washburne, Wells, Wheeler, Witte, Daniel B. Wright, Hendrick B. Wright, and Yates—100.

So the amendment was non-concurred in.

The thirty-sixth and thirty-seventh Senate amendments were next read by the Clerk, as follows:

For rent of paper warerom from the 1st of January to the 30th of June, 1854, at $250 per annum, $125.

For cartage of printing paper from warerom and office of the Superintendent of Public Printing to the printing offices, and labor, from the 1st January to the 30th of June, 1854, at $550 per annum, $275.

The SPEAKER. The Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, recommend a non-concurrence in both amendments.

The question was taken; and both amendments were non-concurred in.

Fortieth amendment:

For completion of the bridge across the Potomac river at Little Falls, and painting thereof, $75,000.

The Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union reported the following amendment to the amendment:

Provided, That the work shall be done, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, by competent civil engineers, and according to a plan, the whole cost of which, in no event, exceeds the sum now appropriated.

The question was taken on the amendment to the amendment; and it was agreed to.

Mr. BANKS. Mr. Speaker, I desire permission to correct a remark I made yesterday, in relation to the responsibility of the Government for the accident that occurred at this bridge.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I object.

Mr. BARRY. I hope the gentleman from Massachusetts will be allowed to make the statement. He was led to do unintentional injustice in some remarks which he made, and he desires to correct it. It will take but a moment.

Mr. TRACY. I object.

The question now being on agreeing to the fortieth amendment of the Senate, as amended,

The yeas and nays were ordered thereon.

The question was then taken; and there were—yeas 44, nays 101; as follows:

NAYS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Willis Allen, David J. Bailey, Barksdale, Barry, Belcher, Boyce, Brooks, Campbell, Caruthers, Chrisman, Clark, Cobb, Cox, Cullom, John G. Davis, Dean, Disney, Dowdell, Dunham, Eastman, Eddy, John M. Elliott, Ellison, English, Etheridge, Flagler, Florence, Fuller, Gamble, Grow, Aaron Harlan, Haven, Hendricks, Hill, Hillyer, Houston, Johnson, Daniel T. Jones, George W. Jones, Roland Jones, Kerr, Knox, Kurtz, Lamb, Lane, Latham, Letcher, Lindsley, Lindsley, McCulloch, McNair, Maurice, May, Mayall, Middle-swarth, John G. Miller, Smith Miller, Milson, Morgan, Morrison, Nichols, Norton, Andrew Oliver, Mordecai Oliver, Parker, Peck, Bishop Perkins, John Perkins, Phelps, Pratt, Pringle, Puryear, Richardson, David Ritchie, Robbins, Sapp, Shannon, Shaw, Shower, Skelton, Gerrit Smith, Samuel A. Smith, George W. Smyth, Straub, Andrew Stuart, John J. Taylor, Nathaniel G. Taylor, Tracy, Trout, Upham, Vansant, Wade, Walsh, Ellihu B. Washburne, Wells, Westbrooke, Wheeler, Witte, Daniel B. Wright, and Hendrick B. Wright—101.

So the amendment was disagreed to.

The forty-first amendment of the Senate was then read, as follows:

Page fourteen, line three hundred and twenty-eight, after the word "California" strike out "$37,500," and insert in lieu thereof "$42,000; and that $5,000 of said sum be paid to Robert Greenhow, assistant law agent to said board, for services performed during the absence of the law agent."

The SPEAKER. The Committee of the Whole recommend a disagreement to this amendment.

Mr. LATHAM. I made a demand for the yeas and nays upon this amendment, but I withdrew it, and ask for tellers.

Tellers were not ordered.

The question was then taken upon the amendment; and it was disagreed to.

The forty-second amendment of the Senate was then read, as follows:

And the marshals of the northern and southern districts of California shall have the same mileage and compensation for serving processes issuing from said commission as are allowed to the sheriffs for serving similar processes by the higher courts of California; and the same mileage and per diem shall be made to witnesses as are allowed to witnesses by the State of California.

The SPEAKER. The Committee of the Whole recommend a non-concurrence with this amendment.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I withdraw the demand I made yesterday for the yeas and nays upon this amendment, and ask for tellers.

Mr. LETCHER. I renew the demand for the yeas and nays. I wish to see who will vote for this partial legislation.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I withdraw the demand for tellers.

The question was then taken on the amendment; and it was disagreed to.

The forty-fifth amendment of the Senate was then read, as follows:

Strike out from pages fourteen and fifteen the following: For compensation for the discharge of the United States consular duties at Constantinople, in conformity with the act of Congress approved August 11, 1848, $3,594 50, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be paid, under the direction of the Secretary of State, to such person or persons as may be entitled to the same, or any portion thereof.

The SPEAKER. The Committee of the Whole recommend a concurrence with this amendment.

The question was then taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

The forty-ninth amendment was then read, as follows:

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That the compensation of the special mail agent of the Post Office Department in California shall be $5,000 per annum; such rate to take effect in virtue of this provision from July 1, 1853.

The SPEAKER. The Committee of the Whole recommend a disagreement to this amendment.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I withdraw the demand I made for the yeas and nays upon this amendment, and ask for tellers.

Mr. HAMILTON. I renew the demand for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. CUTTING and COX were appointed.

The question was taken; and the tellers reported—yeas 78, noes 53.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I move that the yeas and nays on this vote be entered on the Journal; and I ask the Speaker to have that provision of the Constitution read which authorizes that to be done by a vote of one fifth of the members present.

Mr. WHEELER. I move for a reconsideration of the vote just taken; and on that I call for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. JONES] moves that the provision of the Constitution, in reference to spreading on the Journal the yeas and nays, be read. The Chair, in the mean time, and in advance, decides that the gentleman has no such right.

Mr. JONES. I hope, Mr. Speaker, that the provision referred to will be read.

Mr. DRUM. I object.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, then read the following clause of the Constitution:

"Each House shall keep a Journal of its proceedings, and from time to time publish the same, excepting such parts as may, in their judgment, require secrecy; and the yeas and nays of the members of either House on any question, shall, at the desire of one fifth of those present, be entered on the Journal."

Mr. TAYLOR, of Ohio. But one fifth did not desire to have them entered.

Mr. JONES. I say the refusal at that time does not deprive a member of his right.

The SPEAKER. The Chair decides that a refusal to order the yeas and nays by one fifth does deprive a member of his right of having them entered on the Journal.

Mr. JONES. Then I appeal from that decision of the Chair.

Mr. ORR. Mr. Speaker—

The SPEAKER. The question must be taken without debate.

Mr. JONES. I call for the yeas and nays upon the appeal.

Mr. WHEELER. I rise to a question of privilege. I move to reconsider the vote last taken.

The SPEAKER. That motion will be entered, but it cannot be acted upon until the question upon the pending appeal is disposed of. The history of this matter is this: The yeas and nays were demanded by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. JONES], and refused by the House. The gentleman repeats that demand, and says that under the Constitution he has the right to spread the yeas and nays upon the Journal.

Mr. BOGOCCK. How often has the gentleman the right to repeat that demand?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has not consulted the gentleman. Upon the appeal from the decision of the Chair the yeas and nays are demanded.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. HAVEN. Did I understand the gentleman from New York [Mr. WHEELER] to move to reconsider the vote last taken?

Mr. WHEELER. I did make that motion.

Mr. HAVEN. Then I demand the yeas and nays upon the motion to reconsider.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York made that demand, and it has been entered.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I move to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The question then being "Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?" it was put; and decided in the affirmative.

So the decision of the Chair was sustained.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was adopted, and upon that proposition demanded the yeas and nays. The gentleman from California moves to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

Mr. BOGOCCK. Is it too late to inquire if the gentleman from New York voted in the affirmative?

The SPEAKER. The Chair presumes he did.

Mr. WHEELER. I did so vote for the purpose of moving to reconsider.

The yeas and nays were then ordered upon the motion to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The question was then put; and decided in the affirmative—yeas 81, nays 74; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Aiken, James C. Allen, Willis Allen, David J. Bailey, Thomas H. Bayly, Banks, Barry, Bell, Benton, Bockock, Breckinridge, Brooks, Caruthers, Caskie, Chandler, Chastain, Chrisman, Clark, Colquitt, Cutting, Dawson, Dean, Disney, Dunham, Eastman, Eddy, Edmundson, John M. Eliot, Farley, Florence, Fuller, Gamble, Green, Henn, Houston, Hunt, Johnson, J. Glancy Jones, Roland Jones, Kerr, Kurtz, Latham, Lindsley, McDougall, McNair, May, John G. Miller, Smith Miller, Nichols, Norton, Olds, Mordecai Oliver, Orr, Parker, Peckham, Phillips, Powell, Pratt, Preston, Richardson, Riddle, Shannon, Shaw, Shower, Gerrit Smith, Samuel A. Smith, William Smith, William R. Smith, George W. Smyth, Frederick P. Stanton, Richard H. Stanton, Alexander H. Stephens, Hester L. Stevens, Straub, John J. Taylor, John L. Taylor, Vansant, Walker, Westbrook, Witte, and Hendrick B. Wright—81.

NAYS—Messrs. Belcher, Boyce, Bridges, Campbell, Cobb, Cox, Cullom, Cumming, Curtis, John G. Davis, Thomas Davis, Drum, Dunham, Edmonds, Thomas D. Eliot, Ellison, Etheridge, Everhart, Flagler, Giddings, Goodrich, Grow, Hamilton, Aaron Harlan, Wiley P. Harris, Haven, Hendricks, Hill, Daniel T. Jones, George W. Jones, Knox, Lamb, Lane, Letcher, Lilly, McCulloch, Maurice, Mayall, Meacham, Middlesworth, Milson, Morgan, Morrison, Andrew Oliver, Peck, Pennington, Bishop Perkins, Phelps, Pringle, Puryear, David Ritchie, Thomas Ritchey, Robbins, Russell, Sabine, Sapp, Skelton, Snodgrass, Stratton, Andrew Stuart, Nathaniel G. Taylor, Thurston, Tracy, Trout, Upham, Vail, Wade, Walley, Walsh, Ellihu B. Washburne, Wells, Tappan Wentworth, Wheeler, and Daniel B. Wright—74.

So the motion to reconsider was laid upon the table.

The fifty-first amendment was then read, as follows:

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That the portion of the seventh section of the act of 26th August, 1852, entitled "An act to provide for executing the public printing and establishing the prices thereof, and for other purposes," which provides "that when any documents shall be ordered to be printed by both Houses of Congress, the entire printing of such documents shall be done by the printer of that House which first ordered the same," is hereby repealed; and when there are different printers for the respective Houses, each shall do the printing which may hereafter be ordered by the House electing him; and so much of the printing for the Executive Departments and bureaus of the Government as is ordered by the said act to be done by the public printer, shall be equally divided between the printers of the two Houses.

Mr. HAVEN. Upon that amendment I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was then taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 33, nays 102; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Aiken, Ashe, Thomas H. Bayly, Bell, Bockock, Brooks, Caskie, Chandler, Colquitt, Cutting, Disney, Drum, Dunbar, Eastman, Edmundson, Grey, Hill, Keitt, Letcher, Maurice, Powell, Richardson, Riddle, Snodgrass, Richard H. Stanton, Alexander H. Stephens, Hester L. Stevens, John L. Taylor, Upham, Wells, Witte, and Daniel B. Wright—33.

NAYS—Messrs. Abramcrombie, James C. Allen, Willis Allen, David J. Bailey, Banks, Barksdale, Barry, Belcher, Benton, Bridges, Campbell, Caruthers, Chastain, Clark, Clingman, Cobb, Cullom, Cumming, Curtis, John G. Davis, Thomas Davis, Dean, Dunham, Eddy, Edmonds, Ellison, Etheridge, Everhart, Farley, Flagler, Florence, Goodrich, Green, Grow, Hamilton, Wiley P. Harris, Haven, Hendricks, Henn, Hillyer, Houston, Johnson, Daniel T. Jones, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Roland Jones, Knox, Kurtz, Lane, Latham, Lilly, Lindsley, McCulloch, Macdonald, McNair, Meacham, Middlesworth, John G. Miller, Smith Miller, Morgan, Morrison, Nichols, Norton, Olds, Andrew Oliver, Mordecai Oliver, Orr, Parker, Peck, Pennington, Bishop Perkins, John Perkins, Phelps, Pratt, Pringle, Puryear, David Ritchie, Robbins, Rufin, Sabine, Sapp, Seymour, Shaw, Skelton, Gerrit Smith, Samuel A. Smith, William R. Smith, George W. Smyth, Frederick P. Stanton, Stratton, John J. Taylor, Nathaniel G. Taylor, Thurston, Tracy, Trout, Vail, Vansant, Walley, Ellihu B. Washburne, Tappan Wentworth, Westbrook, and Hendrick B. Wright—102.

So the amendment was disagreed to.

The fifty-second amendment, in which the Committee of the Whole recommended a non-concurrence, was then read, as follows:

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That so much of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1853, and for other purposes," as provides for compensation to the Spanish consul and others for losses occasioned by violence at New Orleans and at Key West, in the year 1851, shall be so construed as to place Michael Pappenritza, a subject of Austria, on the same footing with subjects of Spain.

The question was taken; and the amendment was not agreed to.

The fifty-third amendment was then read, as follows:

Sec. 9. And be it further enacted, That for custom-houses and marine hospitals, and to complete the same, the following sums be, and they are hereby, appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, namely:

For completing the custom house at St. Louis, Missouri, $100,000;
For completing the custom house at Mobile, Alabama, $65,000;
For completing the custom-house at Cincinnati, Ohio, $40,000;
For completing the custom-house at Louisville, Kentucky, $40,000;
For completing the custom-house at Bangor, Maine, $20,000;
For completing the custom-house at Bath, Maine, $20,000;
For completing the custom-house at Wilmington, Delaware, $12,000;
For purchasing a site for a custom-house at Providence, Rhode Island, $24,000;
For the purchase of a new site for the custom house in San Francisco, $250,000; and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized, if, in his judgment, the public interest will thereby be promoted, to apply this appropriation, and as much as may be necessary of former appropriations, for the erection of a custom house on the land reserved for said purpose, to the purchase of a building or buildings for a custom house and other public offices, and the said Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to take all legal proceedings which may be necessary or advisable to maintain and secure the possession and title of the United States to the lot heretofore selected for the site of a custom house;
For the erection of a custom-house at Portland, Maine, including rooms for the United States court, and for a post office, $200,000;
To complete the marine hospital at Cleveland, Ohio, $25,000;
To complete the marine hospital at St. Louis, Missouri, $10,000;
To complete the marine hospital at Chicago, Illinois, $8,000;
To complete the marine hospital at Louisville, Kentucky, $12,500;
To complete the marine hospital at Paducah, Kentucky, $5,000;

To complete the marine hospital at Evansville, Indiana, $2,000;

To complete the marine hospital at San Francisco, California, $4,400; and to construct a marine hospital at Burlington, Iowa, $15,000.

Mr. PECK. Upon that amendment I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was then put; and decided in the negative—yeas 40, nays 104; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bell, Benton, Thomas Davis, De Witt, Disney, Dunbar, Edmonds, Thomas D. Eliot, Ellison, Everhart, Farley, Florence, Giddings, Goodrich, Green, Aaron Harlan, Henn, Hill, Hunt, Johnson, Latham, Lindley, Lindsley, Macdonald, Smith Miller, Phillips, Preston, Riddle, Gerrit Smith, Frederick P. Stanton, Richard H. Stanton, Alexander H. Stephens, Hester L. Stevens, John L. Taylor, Thurston, Upham, Wade, Walley, John Wentworth, and Tappan Wentworth—40.

NAYS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Willis Allen, Ashe, David J. Bailey, Banks, Barksdale, Barry, Belcher, Boycock, Boyce, Bridges, Campbell, Chastain, Chrisman, Clark, Clingman, Cobb, Colquitt, Cullom, Curtis, Cutting, John G. Davis, Dawson, Dean, Drum, Dunham, Eastman, Eddy, Edmundson, Etheridge, Flagler, Gamble, Grow, Hamilton, Sampson W. Harris, Wiley P. Harris, Haven, Hendricks, Hillyer, Houston, Hughes, Daniel T. Jones, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Roland Jones, Keitt, Knox, Lamb, Lane, Letcher, Lilly, McCulloch, McNair, Maurice, Maxwell, May, Mayall, Middlesworth, Millson, Morrison, Nichols, Norton, Olds, Andrew Oliver, Orr, Parker, Peck, Peckham, Pennington, Bishop Perkins, John Perkins, Phelps, Powell, Pringle, Puryear, Richardson, David Ritchie, Robbins, Ruffin, Russell, Sapp, Seymour, Shaw, Shower, Skelton, William Smith, George W. Smyth, Snodgrass, Stratton, Straub, John J. Taylor, Nathaniel G. Taylor, Tracy, Trost, Vail, Vansant, Walsh, Elihu B. Washburne, Wells, Westbrook, Witte, Daniel B. Wright, and Hendrick B. Wright—104.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Immediately after the commencement of the call of the yeas and nays,

Mr. BENTON addressed the Chair, and said: I believe this is a vote upon the custom-house amendment?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. BENTON. Then I desire a separate vote upon each appropriation.

The SPEAKER. It is questionable whether an amendment, coming to the House as a whole, is divisible. However that may be, it is too late to make the request, a response having been made to the call of the yeas and nays.

Mr. PRATT, pending the call, gave notice that he had paired off with Mr. HARRISON of Ohio, upon several questions, of which this was one; and that otherwise he should have voted in the negative.

Mr. HOUSTON. I rise to a privileged motion. I move to reconsider the vote just taken, and to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The question was taken upon the latter motion; and it was agreed to.

So all the amendments were disposed of.

SECRETARY'S REPORT ON BANKS.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky. I now offer the resolution which I desired to offer this morning.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That one thousand five hundred extra copies of the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the condition of the banks of the United States, communicated to the House of Representatives on the 11th instant, be printed for the use of the Treasury Department.

Mr. STANTON. I move to put the resolution upon its passage.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I would ask the gentleman if the Secretary of the Treasury could not order it to be printed? This House has ordered it to be printed. The form is already up, and an appropriation is made every year to pay the expenses of printing for the Executive Department. I ask the gentleman whether the Secretary could not order the report to be printed, without coming here and having it ordered to be done by the House?

Mr. STANTON. The Secretary of the Treasury addressed a note to the Superintendent of Public Printing, requesting that this document should be published by him for the use of the Treasury Department. The Superintendent and the Committee on Printing thought that the Superintendent himself had no power to authorize a document of this kind to be printed for the use of this Department, or for any other Department; hence the necessity of referring the matter to the House. He had no right to order the republication of a document which has been ordered to be published by Congress. If he had, he could republish the President's message, or the Patent Office report, or any other document which this House has previously ordered to be printed.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I would inquire of the gentleman if he knows whether the forms for the printing of this document have been distributed or not; or whether it has been so long since we ordered it to be printed that we shall be obliged to pay again for its composition?

Mr. STANTON. You will not have to pay for its composition; for three weeks have not elapsed since the House ordered it to be printed. If ordered to be printed to-day, but one composition will have to be paid for.

Mr. JONES. Then I propose to modify the resolution by inserting a proviso, as follows:

Provided, That it shall not cost for second composition.

Mr. STANTON. There is no necessity for that, because the law now provides for the same thing.

Mr. LETCHER. I should like to know what particular necessity there is for having these fifteen hundred copies printed for the use of the Treasury Department? If there is no necessity for it, and the Treasury Department have authority to print their own documents, I do not think it is our business to supply them. What do they want them for?

Mr. ORR. I suppose for distribution.

Mr. LETCHER. Well, sir, I do not think it is our business to authorize the printing of these extra numbers for that purpose. I am opposed to it. If the law does not authorize them to do it at the Department, let it not be done.

I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was put; and the motion agreed to; and thereupon,

At three o'clock, p. m., the House adjourned until Monday next, at twelve, m.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, May 29, 1854.

Prayer by Rev. WILLIAM H. MILBURN.

The Journal of Thursday was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, transmitting a report from the Secretary of State, in answer to a resolution of the Senate of the 9th instant, directing him to furnish the Senate with a communication from H. S. Sanford, late chargé d'affaires at Paris, on the different systems of penal codes in Europe; and also a report on the administration changes in France since the revolution of 1848; which was read, and ordered to be printed.

A motion by Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, that one thousand additional copies of the message and documents be printed, was referred to the Committee on Printing.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented the memorial of A. S. Robinson, cashier of the bank of the State of Missouri, at St. Louis, praying the payment of a balance due to that bank for advances for the use of certain companies of Missouri volunteers called into service during the late war with Mexico; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. BADGER presented a petition of citizens of the United States, professing the Jewish religion, praying that measures may be taken to secure to American citizens of every creed, their civil and religious rights while in foreign countries; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. BROWN presented a memorial of citizens of De Soto county, Mississippi, praying a repeal or suspension of the duty on railroad iron; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. MASON presented a petition of inhabitants of the town of Wheatland, Virginia, praying a reduction of the rates of ocean postage; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. CLAY presented the petition of Sarah Griffin, praying compensation for the services of her father, Colonel James Williams, and the destruction of property during the revolutionary war; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. FITZPATRICK presented the memorial of the heirs and legal representatives of William Turvin, praying permission to enter, on any of the public lands subject to private entry, a quantity of land equal in value to certain lands claimed by them under a Spanish grant, and sold as Government lands; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

REPORTS FROM STANDING COMMITTEES.

Mr. MASON. The Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the memorial of John Randolph Clay, Minister of the United States at Peru, on the subject of affording relief to destitute citizens of the United States in foreign countries, have directed me to submit a report on the subject, accompanied by a bill "making provisions for the relief of destitute citizens of the United States in foreign countries."

The bill was read, and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. MASON. The same committee, to whom was referred the memorial of G. M. Farnham, commercial agent of the United States at Port Lewis and the Mauritius, have directed me to make a report, accompanied by a bill to authorize the payment of his drafts. I desire to say to the Senate that these reports and bills were prepared by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. EVERETT], who, I am very much concerned to say, has informed me that in consequence of the condition of his health, fears he cannot resume his place in the Senate. He was instructed by the Committee on Foreign Relations to report a bill in each of these cases, and I have taken his place by request. I must take occasion to express my own sincere regret at the loss of that very distinguished Senator, and I am sure I express in this the common sense of the Senate—I certainly do of his colleagues on the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The bill was read, and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. BRODHEAD, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the memorial of Francis A. Gibbons and F. X. Kelly, praying payment of their claim for the erection of certain light-houses on the Pacific coast, submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

ADJOURNMENT SINE DIE.

Mr. GWIN submitted the following resolution for consideration, which he said he would call up to-morrow:

Resolved, (the House concurring,) That the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives adjourn their respective Houses sine die on Monday, the 3d of July next, at twelve o'clock, m.

NEBRASKA AND KANSAS.

Mr. ADAMS. I desire to say, Mr. President, that if I had been present on the night on which the Kansas and Nebraska bill was passed; I should have voted in favor of its passage. I did not expect that a final vote would be taken on it then; and the state of my health would not have justified me, unless I had deemed it indispensably necessary to remain up during the night, in consequence of which, knowing that the friends of the bill had a majority, I retired from the Senate. If I had been present, I should have voted for its passage.

A message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McKean, Chief Clerk, announcing that the Speaker had signed the bill to organize the Territories of Nebraska and Kansas.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore thereupon signed the above named bill.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. BADGER. I desire to seize this opportunity to make an explanation in justice to my two friends from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BRODHEAD and Mr. COOPER.] It will be recollected by the Senate that some time ago, when we had under consideration the bill allowing a credit for a limited period for the payment of duties on railroad iron imported into the United States, in answer to an application made that the bill should be postponed until the two Senators from Pennsylvania should be present, I made jocosely a remark to the effect that I could hardly agree to the application; for it might be equivalent to an indefinite postponement.

It was suggested to me immediately afterwards, and I saw the propriety of it, that the remark was calculated to be misunderstood. I at once requested that it should be left out of the official report of the proceedings; but, sir, it has got into the newspapers, and I have been excessively mortified to see that it has been quoted over and over again in the Pennsylvania papers, as if it had been intended to convey some serious reflection on those gentlemen as being causelessly absent, or otherwise inattentive to the public business, especially business in which their State is concerned. I have felt mortified that a joke (a poor joke it was) uttered by me at the time without any ill intention, should have been used for a purpose so far from my mind, and so exceedingly unjust to those gentlemen. I expressed to both the gentlemen at an early moment my exceeding regret for my indiscretion, and I have been looking for a convenient and proper time to make this statement in the Senate. It was very far from my thoughts to make any reflection on the gentlemen, and I am very far from believing that either of them is ever causelessly absent from the performance of his duties here, or negligent, or otherwise inattentive to them. I very sincerely regret that I ever made a remark capable of being used in an ill sense to either of them. I hope my honorable friends will accept this statement as the best reparation in my power, and pardon me for the remark which made this statement necessary.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the House bill "making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending June 30, 1855."

Mr. HUNTER. The bill is open to amendment. If there be no proposition to amend the bill, the question is on ordering it to be read a third time.

Mr. WALKER. I had an amendment which I designed to offer. It was what is known as the Menomonee claim. But I am informed by the chairman of the committee, that he has received information from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, that a treaty has lately been made with that tribe of Indians, in which some arrangement of this matter, or an arrangement of it to some extent, has been made. Not knowing to what extent the treaty goes, I shall, and the committee will also be, unable to give the necessary information to the Senate, to enable it to judge how far it could go, and yet not do injustice either to the Government or to the Indians. On this account, I shall, for the present, and upon this bill, withhold the amendment until we can see the treaty.

Mr. BROWN. I have the following amendment to propose from the Committee on Indian Affairs, as an additional section to the bill:

Sec. — And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Interior be authorized and required to investigate the claim of the Brotherton tribe of Indians against the United States, and report the facts to Congress at its next session, or earlier if practicable, together with a statement of such amount as may be found justly due to said Indians.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BROWN. I now return the memorial of this tribe of Indians, and ask that the Committee on Indian Affairs be discharged from its further consideration, and that the Secretary of the Senate be instructed to transmit it to the Secretary of the Interior.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. Since the last discussion of this bill I have received from the Department of the Interior several estimates; and I have some amendments to propose in conformity with them. The first amendment from the Committee on Indian Affairs is to insert:

For payment of A. V. Brown and others, Chickasaw traders, for ransom of George W. and Meredith Wilson from the Caniache Indians, and to reward the services of persons engaged in that service, ——— dollars.

Mr. HUNTER. This is a private claim, as I understand it. There is no law and no treaty to authorize it, I believe.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. It is recommended by the Department.

Mr. BROWN. It ought to go into the bill.

Mr. RUSK. Certainly; it ought by all means.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair would call the attention of the Senator from Arkansas to the fact that there is a blank in the amendment.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. The sum of $1,000 is suggested by the committee as appropriate for the purpose of filling the blank.

The blank was so filled; and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. I am also instructed by the Committee on Indian Affairs to offer the following amendment, which is in pursuance of the estimates:

To enable the President to negotiate a treaty with the Indians in Michigan, $10,000.

The object of this amendment is to place a fund of $10,000 in the hands of the President, to enable him to treat with the Chippewa Indians, in Michigan, of whom there are some seven or eight thousand. We have a treaty with them which will expire in two years, when there will be suddenly thrown into their hands about a quarter of a million of dollars. It is very desirable that that fund shall be diverted from disposition among them, for the purpose of securing them a permanent home. For this purpose it will be necessary to make a new treaty with them.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. The next amendment of the committee is to insert:

For salary of five Indian agents of the second class, according to existing laws, at the rate of $1,500 per annum, inure, $2,500.

The object of that amendment I will explain. By the act of 1851, reorganizing the Indian department, there were two classes of Indian agents allowed. The first class were to receive a salary of $1,500, and the second class $1,000. Five of the six agents were located in the proposed Territories of Nebraska and Kansas. In consequence of treaties lately made with all those Indians, the class of duties imposed on those agents, as I am advised by the department, is such as pertain to the duties of first class agencies. It is proposed, therefore, to put their salary on the same footing as their duties.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. I have one other amendment. The last day, when this bill was under consideration, we rejected a proposition to give clerks to the superintendents of Indian affairs in Washington and New Mexico Territories. The committee have since had that subject under consideration. The result of their deliberations was that they were unanimously satisfied that there was a great necessity for allowing clerks in those two particular superintendencies. The reason of it is briefly this: Where the duties of superintendent and Executive are united, as in the persons at present incumbents of the office of Governor in these two Territories, it is obvious to every man that it is impossible for them, of themselves, to discharge the duties as they ought to be done without that clerical assistance which seems to be denied by existing laws. We propose to allow to the clerk in Washington Territory $1,800, and in New Mexico $1,000. The difference in the salaries arises out of the difference in the circumstances in each case. The services can be obtained for a much less amount in the one Territory than in the other, and that accounts for the difference between the salaries recommended.

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendments were then ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time. The bill was read a third time and passed.

On motion by Mr. HUNTER, its title was amended by adding "and for other purposes."

DEFICIENCY BILL.

A message was received from the House of Representatives by Mr. McKean, its Chief Clerk.

Mr. PRESIDENT: I am directed to convey to the Senate, with the action of the House of Representatives on the amendments of the Senate thereto, the bill of the House to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the fiscal year, ending June 30, 1854.

Mr. HUNTER. I ask, by unanimous consent, that that bill be taken up for consideration now.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. HUNTER. I move that the Senate insist on its amendments disagreed to by the House of Representatives, disagree to the amendments of the House to the amendments of the Senate, and ask for a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

Mr. ADAMS. I hope not.

Mr. SLIDELL. I hope we shall not insist on all our amendments.

Mr. HUNTER. We had better have a committee of conference at once. That is the usual course.

The PRESIDENT put the question on Mr. HUNTER's motion; but it was found there was not a quorum voting.

Mr. STUART. I hope the Senator from Virginia will allow these amendments to be read. I do not know that I have objection to insisting on any of them, except one. There is one amendment, about which I said something when it was under the consideration of the Senate, and that is respecting the public printing. I think the Senate had better recede from them now.

Mr. JOHNSON. I have no doubt that there is a quorum present. I did not vote when the question was up, and I saw a number of others who did not vote on either side. I would suggest, therefore, that there be a recount. As to the mere matter of insisting or non-insisting upon every particular amendment, I suppose no gentleman is committed to that by the proposed motion. It seems to me, however, that the proposition of the Senator from Virginia is entirely proper. That course evidently saves time. A great many of these amendments will be conceded at once by the Senate committee of conference. As the course suggested by the motion of the Senator from Virginia saves time, and as it has been the usual practice of the Senate, I hope the motion will be agreed to. I ask for a recount.

Mr. ADAMS. The only reason why I objected to a committee of conference is, that I, as an individual, approve of every amendment made by the House of Representatives, and am willing to recede from every amendment made by the Senate which the House have not agreed to. If a majority should concur with me in opinion, as the amendments are read they can be disposed of, and there will be no necessity for any committee of conference.

Mr. PETTIT. If I understand this is the bill upon which we put the appropriation of $500,000 for the water-works in this city, and the House has refused to concur in that amendment.

Mr. GWIN. And various others.

Mr. PETTIT. For one, then, I shall not vote to insist upon our amendments, for I am toto calo against that amendment. I will therefore vote against the motion of the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. HUNTER. I would simply refer to the past practice of the Senate. We have found that we can dispose of appropriation bills more readily and more conveniently by raising committees of conference at once instead of attempting to debate each particular amendment in the Senate. Imagine the points of difference will be arranged by the committee in a manner which will probably be satisfactory here. If not, the Senate can reject the report of the committee of conference.

Mr. STUART. Does not a motion to recede from that amendment take precedence of the motion of the Senator from Virginia?

The PRESIDENT. Such is the opinion of the Chair.

Mr. STUART. Then I submit the motion that the Senate recede from that amendment.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair will suggest the propriety of reading the amendments which have been disagreed to by the House, and then a vote can be taken on each proposition separately, if necessary.

Mr. STUART. That is the course I suggested at first.

The PRESIDENT. If there be no objection that course will be pursued.

Mr. JOHNSON. I object, if it is in the power of one member to do so.

Mr. BRODHEAD. It is unnecessary to read all the amendments.

Mr. WALKER. Has not any one Senator a right to demand that they be read?

The PRESIDENT. Certainly, any Senator has a right to demand it.

Mr. WALKER. Then I call for the reading of the amendments.

The Secretary read the first amendment which the House had amended, which was the fourth amendment of the Senate.

The House agreed to this amendment, which was to pay Thomas M. Johnson for his services as marshal at the port of Shanghai, with an amendment reducing the amount of the appropriation from $1,798 91 to $1,781 74.

Mr. ADAMS. If it be in order, I now move that the Senate concur in this amendment of the House to our fourth amendment.

Mr. HUNTER. I think all the amendments ought to be read before we take the question on any of them, and then the Senate can determine whether to pass upon all together or separately.

The PRESIDENT. The amendment is with the Senate to act upon.

Mr. GWIN. Can any one Senator force the question to be taken on a particular amendment?

The PRESIDENT. Any one Senator can demand that the amendment be read.

Mr. GWIN. I hope Senators will single out such as they wish read. It will take an hour to go through all of them.

Mr. WALKER. It will be an hour well spent. Mr. GWIN. I think not.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair is informed that it will take but a short time to read the amendments. The Secretary will proceed.

The House concurred in the following amendments with amendments:

No. 10, which was to insert the following:

For completing and keeping in order the grounds south of the President's House, $9,770.

The amendment of the House was to add:

For furnishing an additional number of iron settees for the President's and Capitol grounds, $1,000.

No. 38, which was to insert after the appropriation of $50,000 for arrearages incurred in running the boundary line between the United States and Mexico, the following:

And the limitations imposed by the provisions contained in the act of 15th May, 1850, entitled "An act to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1850;" and the act of 3d March, 1853, entitled "An act making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1854," be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

The amendment of the House was to strike it all out, and insert:

And that the period limited for the appointment of commissioner, surveyor, and chief astronomer, by the act of May, 1850, shall be, and the same is hereby, extended to the 30th of June, 1855.

No. 39, which was to insert:

For engraving maps, views, sections, and natural history of the survey of the boundary between the United States and Mexico, $10,000; to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior.

The amendment of the House was to add:

For wood cuts purchased by the Commissioner of Patents for illustrating the mechanical part of the Patent Office report of 1853-4, ordered by the House of Representatives, $1,500.

No. 43, which was to insert:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to examine the claims presented by certain counties of the late Territory of Iowa for expenses of the United States district court which were paid by said counties prior to the admission of said Territory into the Union as a State; and if, upon such examination, he is satisfied that, prior to said time, the said counties have paid money which, in accordance with the instructions of the First Comptroller of the Treasury, dated December 19, 1843, should have been paid by the marshal of the United States for said Territory, he is directed to audit and allow the same.

The amendment of the House was in the form of a substitute, as follows:

That the First Comptroller of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to examine the claims presented by certain counties of the late Territory of Iowa, for expenses of the United States district court, which were paid by said counties prior to the admission of said Territory into the Union as a State; and if, upon such examination, he is satisfied that, prior to said time, the said counties have paid money which, in accordance with the instructions of the First Comptroller of the Treasury, dated 19th of December, 1843, as construed in the report of said First Comptroller to the Secretary of the Interior, under date of 13th of October, 1853, in reference to said subject, should have been paid by the marshal of the United States for said Territory, he is directed to audit and settle the same.

No. 46, which was to insert:

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That all books, papers, documents, and records, in the Department of the Interior, may be copied and certified, under the seal of that Department, (which is hereby recognized as legal,) in the same manner as those in the other Executive Departments may now by law be, and with the same force and effect.

The amendment of the House was to add:

And in all cases where a seal is necessary by law to any commission, process, or other instrument, provided for by the law of Congress, it shall be lawful to affix the proper seal by making an impression therewith directly on the paper to which the seal is necessary; which shall be as valid as if made upon wax or other substance.

No. 50, which was to insert as follows:

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That from and after the passage of this act, there shall be, in addition to the clerks authorized by the third section of the act of March 3, 1853, entitled "An act making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1854," in the office of the Register of the Treasury, three clerks of class four, to include the clerk now authorized to take charge of the redemption of stocks; and in the office of the Commissioner of Pensions five clerks of class two, and fifteen clerks of class three; and said clerks shall be paid, according to the provisions of said section, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The amendments of the House were to strike out

—to include the clerk now authorized to take charge of the redemption of stocks,

—to insert after the words "Register of the Treasury,"

—"in lieu of the temporary clerks now employed therein,"

—and to insert after the word "section" the words

—"until the 30th of June, 1854."

The House non-concurred in the following.

No. 11, which was to insert:

For iron flagging in front of the old portion of the Patent Office Building, and altering windows and private stairway, $5,730.

No. 12, which was to insert:

For altering streets and repaving in front of the east wing of the Patent Office Building, iron railing and flagging, and painting new saloon, $14,250.

No. 14, which was to insert:

For completing the improvement of Pennsylvania avenue from Seventeenth to Twenty-sixth street west, $9,000: Provided, That all appropriations herein made for repairs and improvements of the public buildings or grounds within the District of Columbia, shall be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior.

No. 20, which was to insert:

For the actual and necessary expenses incurred by the provisional government of Oregon, in defending the people of said Territory from the attacks and hostilities of the Cayuse Indians, in the years 1847 and 1848, and for such allowances for the expense of adjusting the claims on that account as the Secretary of the Treasury may deem proper, $75,000. But the said claims and accounts shall be settled and adjusted, at such place, and in such manner, as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe; and no claims shall hereafter be allowed on account of this war which are not presented within the next fiscal year.

No. 24, which was to insert:

For the transportation of Governor Stevens and his party, and for explorations made by him between the Mississippi river and the Pacific ocean, $40,000.

No. 25, which was to insert:

For continuing the works for bringing water into the city of Washington, $500,000.

No. 26, which was to insert:

For the payment of Richard H. Weightman, for mileage and per diem compensation as an agent claiming to be a Senator elect from New Mexico, $2,464.

No. 36, which was to insert:

For rent of paper wareroom from the 1st of January to 30th of June, 1854, at $250 per annum, $125.

No. 37, which was to insert:

For cartage of printing paper from wareroom and office of the Superintendent of Public Printing to the printing offices, and labor, from the 1st of January to the 30th of June, 1854, at $350 per annum, $275.

No. 40, which was to insert:

For the completion of the bridge across the Potomac river at Little Falls, and painting thereof, agreeably to the plan adopted under the direction of the President of the United States, $75,000.

Nos. 41 and 42, which were to amend the clause

For salaries and incidental expenses of the commission appointed under the act of March 3, 1851, for settling land claims in California, $37,500,

—by striking out $37,500 and inserting $42,500, and by adding:

And that $5,000 of said sum be paid to Robert Greenhow, assistant law agent to said board, for services performed during the absence of the law agent; and the marshals of the northern and southern districts of California shall have the same mileage and compensation for serving processes issuing from said commission as are allowed to the sheriffs for serving similar processes by the higher courts of California; and the same mileage and per diem shall be made to witnesses as are allowed to witnesses by the State of California.

No. 48, which was to add:

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That before any payment shall hereafter be made to any invalid pensioner whose name shall have been upon the pension list two years, he shall produce to the agents for paying pensions, to whom he shall apply for payment, the affidavit of two surgeons or physicians, satisfactory to the Secretary of the Interior, stating, from personal examination, the continuance of the disability, describing it, for which the pension was originally granted, and the rate of such disability at the time of making such affidavit, blank forms of which shall be furnished by the Commissioner of Pensions to agents for paying pensions, for the use of pensioners; and if in said affidavit the disability shall be stated at a rate below that for which the pension was originally granted, he shall only be paid at the rate stated in said affidavit. Said affidavit shall be filed by said agents, and carefully preserved, and copies thereof shall be transmitted, with the semi-annual returns of said agents, to the Commissioner of Pensions, who shall file them with the original papers of said pensioner, respectively: Provided, That when the pension shall have been originally granted by a special act of Congress, or for a total disability for the loss of a limb or other cause, which cannot be removed, either in whole or in part, the above affidavit shall not be required.

No. 51, which was to add:

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That the portion of the seventh section of the act of the 28th of August, 1852, entitled "An act to provide for executing the public printing and establishing the prices thereof, and for other purposes," which provides "that when any documents shall be ordered to be printed by both Houses of Congress, the entire printing of such documents shall be done by the printer of that House which first ordered the same," is hereby repealed; and when there are different printers for the respective Houses, each shall do the printing which may hereafter be ordered by the House electing him; and so much of the printing for the Executive Departments and bureaus of the Government as is ordered by the said act to be done by the public printer, shall be equally divided between the printers of the two Houses.

No. 52, which was to add:

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That so much of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1853, and for other purposes," as provides for compensation to the Spanish Consul and others for losses occasioned by violence at New Orleans, and at Key West, in the year 1851, shall be so construed as to place Michael Pappenzita, a subject of Austria, on the same footing with the subjects of Spain.

No. 53, which was to add:

Sec. 9. And be it further enacted, That, for custom-houses and marine hospitals, and to complete the same, the following sums be, and they are hereby, appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, namely:

For completing the custom-house at St. Louis, Missouri, $100,000;

For completing the custom-house at Mobile, Alabama, $65,000;

For completing the custom-house at Cincinnati, Ohio, $40,000;

For completing the custom-house at Louisville, Kentucky, $40,000;

For completing the custom-house at Bangor, Maine, $20,000;

For completing the custom-house at Bath, Maine, $20,000;

For completing the custom-house at Wilmington, Delaware, $12,000;

For purchasing a site for a custom-house at Providence, Rhode Island, $34,000;

For the purchase of a new site for the custom-house in San Francisco, $250,000; and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized, if, in his judgment, the public interest will thereby be promoted, to apply this appropriation, and as much as may be necessary of former appropriations, for the erection of a custom-house on the land reserved for said purpose, to the purchase of a building or buildings for a custom-house and other public offices; and the said Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to take all legal proceedings which may be necessary or advisable to maintain and secure the possession and title of the United States to the lot heretofore selected for the site of a custom-house;

For the erection of a custom house at Portland, Maine, including rooms for the United States court, and for a post office, $200,000;

To complete the marine hospital at Cleveland, Ohio, $25,000;

To complete the marine hospital at St. Louis, Missouri, $10,000;

To complete the marine hospital at Chicago, Illinois, $8,000;

To complete the marine hospital at Louisville, Kentucky, $13,500;

To complete the marine hospital at Paducah, Kentucky, $5,000;

To complete the marine hospital at Evansville, Indiana, $2,000;

To complete the marine hospital at San Francisco, California, $44,000; and to construct a marine hospital at Burlington, Iowa, $15,000.

Amend the title by adding at the end thereof—and for other purposes.

Mr. PETTIT. If it be in order, I will move that the Senate concur in the action of the House on our amendment appropriating $500,000 for the water-works in this city.

The PRESIDENT. Then the motion will be that the Senate recede from that amendment.

Mr. HUNTER. If we intend to insist upon anything, the usual course is to insist upon all, and arrange the whole by a compromise, through a committee of conference. If we do not intend to insist upon anything, but concur in the action of the House, that motion might perhaps be proper enough. But, sir, I would suggest to the Senator from Indiana, that while some of us would be willing to give up the water-works if other things were also given up, we might not be willing to give up that appropriation if other things should be insisted upon. I, for one, am not disposed to insist upon the amendments in relation to the water-works and the custom-houses. I am willing to get rid of them all; but I am not disposed to act upon them separately. I think the matter had better be arranged through a committee of conference, so that we may have a general view of all the amendments. I suggest that to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. PETTIT. I suppose after the bill goes to a committee of conference, and they agree upon their recommendation, the two Houses will almost take their report and adopt it; and if this should come back, the House committee receding from their non-concurrence in the amendment, we should almost feel bound to take that amendment. I should not be satisfied with that. I believe, indeed, I would rather, under existing circumstances, and just at this time particularly—I need not name why—lose the bill than pass this appropriation.

Mr. MASON. The course of the Senate has certainly been, so far as I know, when the two Houses differ upon a proposition, to have a committee of conference. This appropriation was made by the Senate. The House has rejected it. It is to be presumed that the Senate voted the appropriation for reasons which will induce them to adhere to it, unless they find it may be a matter of expediency and propriety upon their part to adjust them by the course which is usual, namely: through a committee of conference. That committee of conference between the two Houses, we know very well, represent, as far as they understand it, the disposition of the two Houses to accommodate the difference, by yielding certain amendments, and insisting on others; and they recommend accordingly. Whatever report they may agree upon, may be adopted by the respective bodies; but it is not incumbent upon them.

In reference to this appropriation for the water-works, I was one of those who thought that economy in the expenditure of the public money would be subserved by making the appropriation now. Other gentlemen thought differently. I presume it will be found, if the House makes really a point about it, the committee will recommend receding from it, and endeavor to obtain it on some other appropriation bill. If we take up the amendments one by one, and take some and disregard others, in the way proposed by the Senator from Indiana, I think it will not be expediting the great object of bringing the bill to a conclusion.

Mr. PETTIT. If the Senator will allow me, I will withdraw the motion. It will be still in our hands to reject the report of the committee of conference.

Mr. ADAMS. If it be in order, I move that the Senate recede from all the amendments to which the House has disagreed, so as to get a general vote.

Mr. DAWSON. I hope the motion will not prevail. We have commenced the construction of these water-works, and it will be unjust to ourselves to stop them. It will, undoubtedly, be a saving of the public money to make the appropriation now. I cannot see why we should hesitate. I took occasion, on Saturday, to view the work; to see its magnitude and its character; and the work which has been done would be a mere monument if we stop now—to say the least of it—of the indiscretion of this body. Why, sir, look at it. An American who feels pride in the character of his country would be greatly gratified to see this work accomplished. As it has gone so far, I do not think, if this body would visit it that it would hesitate to carry it on. When we consider the amount of property belonging to the Union; when we consider, Mr. President, the structures which we have already erected in this city, and those which are now going on, and the necessity of water for their protection, as well as for the convenience and comfort of those who carry on the machinery of the Government, I cannot, for one, consent by any act of mine, to suspend this great work. If we stop to-day, what are we to do? The brick work, and all kinds of masonry, will be subject to inundation and to destruction; and if we ever undertake hereafter to carry the work through, the appropriation which has already been made will have been in vain, and the expense will be much increased. If the appropriation proposed be too high, cut it down to $250,000, or any other amount which may be thought proper to carry the work forward. Why, we might as well stop the erection of the two wings of our Capitol, and leave all that has been done to go to ruin. We must have water in the city. We all know it, and it is the duty of every patriot, while our Treasury is full, to ornament this city, to give it all the interest we can in the feelings of every one throughout the country, and make them proud of their national capital. By doing that, sir, we are strengthening the ligaments that bind the whole together. I fear that the intimation now is, that there is no telling how long the seat of Government will be here; whether it will not be changed, or whether other circumstances will not render it necessary to remove it. That is an idea which, I am sure, ought not to be indulged by any patriot for a moment. Then, the country asks, why stop the internal improvements at this period, while our Treasury is full? The character of the nation, the security of the public property, the health and prosperity of the city, and the health of the Representatives in Congress, and of the officers of the Government, are intimately connected with this work.

I did not wish to say anything upon this subject, but I consider this a vastly important work. Why should we stop it now? There are more than one hundred and fifty hands now engaged, and we have already expended more than $100,000 upon it. If you withdraw the work for one winter, the cold will destroy the whole that has been done. All the machines, all the materials, all the instrumentalities which are necessary to carry it on, have already been purchased, and are there; and if the appropriation is refused all will be lost. I hope, instead of agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Mississippi, and thus at once yield up the amendment, we shall at least permit it to be discussed by a committee of conference. I hope, therefore, the Senator will withdraw his motion to recede from all the amendments rejected by the House, and that then a committee of conference will be appointed to consider the subject; and when they have reported to us, we can determine whether we will insist upon our amendment or not.

Mr. CLAYTON. I concur with the Senator from Georgia. If the question were a new one, whether we should make an appropriation to commence this work, it would be a different question; but we have begun it, and I am for going through with it according to the plan on which it has been commenced. Sir, I would have this city looked upon as a monument erected to Washington. I am for improving it; I am for improving it because our countrymen regard it as a sort of common property, and are proud of it. I would do nothing to diminish the feeling which exists in all parts of the country, in regard to it, but do all I can to increase it; so that when an American, from any part of the Union, comes here and sees the buildings which are in course of construction, and sees what has been done, and what is contemplated to be done, his bosom may swell with pride and pleasure. He does not look upon it as an improvement going on for the especial benefit of a particular section of the country. He sees great works going on which will redound to the honor of the nation. Sir, in progress of time, this work will become necessary at this seat of Government; and why should we now abandon it on the plan which has been proposed? On that plan it will answer for all time to come. We might draw water enough from Rock Creek, or some small stream, to supply the wants of the city at this time; but certainly, by and by, that will not be sufficient.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair will inform the Senator from Delaware that the Senator from Indiana has withdrawn his proposition.

Mr. CLAYTON. But the Senator from Mississippi moves to recede from all our amendments in which the House has not concurred, and that includes the amendment to which I am referring.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair is of opinion that the motion made by the Senator from Virginia is first in order.

Mr. CLAYTON. Is his motion to insist on our amendment, and ask a committee of conference?

The PRESIDENT. It is.

Mr. CLAYTON. Then my remarks will apply to that, as well as to the other motion. I am in favor of the motion of the Senator from Virginia. I am not for receding from our amendment without striking a blow for it, because the House has refused to concur in it. I trust, therefore, that the motion of the Senator from Virginia will prevail, and that the chairman of the committee will not understand that we all agree with the Senator from Indiana.

The PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Virginia, that the Senate insist upon their amendments, and ask for a committee of conference.

Mr. ADAMS. I have no objection to the vote being taken upon that question. My object in making my motion was to take the sense of the Senate upon the question of concurrence with the action of the House. If the majority of the Senate prefers to have a committee of conference, I have, of course, no objection. The only difference between the Senator from Delaware and myself is, that I prefer to excite the admiration and love of the country for the institutions of the country by the simplicity and purity of our free institutions, rather than by the magnificence of our buildings.

Mr. HUNTER's motion was agreed to.

Mr. BADGER. Did the Senator from Virginia move that the managers on the part of the Senate be appointed by the Chair?

The PRESIDENT. He did not.

Mr. BADGER. That is necessary; and I make the motion.

The motion was agreed to; and Mr. HUNTER, Mr. GWIN, and Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, were appointed.

PATENT OFFICE REPORT.

On the motion of Mr. STUART, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of the motion submitted by Mr. BROADHEAD, to reconsider the following order:

Ordered, That there be printed for the use of the Senate thirty-seven thousand five hundred additional copies of the agricultural portion of the Patent Office report, with the plates accompanying the same, two thousand five hundred of which shall be for the use of the Patent Office.

Mr. BROADHEAD. I made the motion to reconsider, and I will state, in a very few words, the reason why I did so. I find by the Journal of the House of Representatives, that they have directed the printing of the extra number of the agricultural portion of the Patent Office report desired by them to be done by the printer of the House. So it is entered upon the Journal, contrary to what I supposed was the spirit of the law. But it seems they have placed a construction upon the law, under which the printing of Congress is now done; and having done so, I desire to place a construction upon it, and to order that the printing of the agricultural portion of the Patent Office report which we desire, shall be done by the Senate printer. I will read from the Journal of the House, in support of the position which I assume. On the 21st of March, 1854, I find the following:

"Mr. MURRAY, from the Committee on Printing, on the part of the House, to whom was referred the resolution to inquire into the expediency of printing extra copies of the agricultural portion of the Patent Office report, reported the following resolution, namely:

"Resolved, That there be printed by the printer of the House, one hundred thousand copies of the agricultural portion of the report of the Commissioner of Patents, for the use of members of the House, and that ten thousand be for the use of the Patent Office, &c."

"The same being read, Mr. Murray moved the previous question, which was seconded, and the main question ordered, and under the operation thereof, said resolution was agreed to."

"Mr. Murray moved to reconsider," &c.

We there find, Mr. President, that the House of Representatives has placed a construction upon the act of 1852, under which the printing of Congress is now done, and has ordered the number of the agricultural portion of the Patent Office report, which they desire, to be printed by the printer of the House. I propose so to amend the resolution we have adopted, as to have the printing of the extra numbers that we desire, done by the printer of the Senate. I think the reason is a good one.

Mr. STUART. I must say that the proposition submitted by the Senator from Pennsylvania, seems to me to be very improper in principle, and one which I certainly hope the Senate will not adopt. The House of Representatives, if the statement be correct, have done at least a work of supererogation. I think it will not be going too far to say they have done what they had no right to do; but, sir, I am unable to conceive how that would justify the Senate in committing an error of the same kind. The law, in emphatic and clear terms, defines how this printing shall be done; and if the Senate should now reconsider this resolution, and embrace in it such a clause as that proposed by the Senator from Pennsylvania, if it should produce any effect at all, it would be that the Senate had taken upon itself to order thirty-seven thousand five hundred copies of this report, extra. If it could have any effect at all, I repeat, that would be the effect. The law provides that the printer of the House, first ordering a document to be printed, shall do the printing of that document for the other House. It is conceded in this case that it was first ordered in the House. The resolution of the House might perhaps be excused upon that ground, if full knowledge were entertained by both Houses; but I am not disposed to excuse it, because the House could not know that it had not been ordered by the Senate. The utmost extent of the power of either House, is to order such additional number of extra copies, as that House thinks proper, of any document of this character, and there its duty and power ends, unless it sees fit to order an extra number to be paid for out of its own fund, irrespective of the provisions of law. If we want seventy-five thousand of these documents, we can reconsider the order, and adopt the amendment suggested by the Senator from Pennsylvania, because that will be its effect, if it has any effect at all.

But, Mr. President, I have another objection to it. If there is any subject respecting which difficulty is likely to grow up between the two Houses of Congress, it is this subject of the printing; and I submit to the Senate, respectfully, whether we had not better, on our part, treat the matter very discreetly, and not undertake to raise or perpetuate the issue. We have discharged our duty when we have directed a certain number of this document to be printed. The law is then to be executed by the Superintendent of Printing, according to its terms; and I submit that, to undertake to embrace in the Senate resolution a provision of this sort, would not only be against the provisions of the law, but it would be engaging in a contest with the House of Representatives, which, if it produced any result, would produce a very undignified controversy—such a one as I hope not to see.

Mr. HAMLIN. I hope the motion to reconsider will not prevail. The Senate has already adopted a resolution, and if the document is to be printed for distribution, it seems to me it should be in the hands of the printer, and the number which is to be printed should be known by us. I think the reasons which have been stated by the Senator from Michigan, render it very clear that no effect can follow the adoption of such a proposition as that which the Senator from Pennsylvania intimates he shall move as an amendment to the resolution, if the motion to reconsider prevails. If the law designates who shall print this work, our vote cannot change it; and the law clearly does designate it. There is, however, one construction which may be given to the action of the House which does not apply to the action of the Senate. This document was first ordered to be printed by the House. It was subsequently ordered to be printed by the Senate; and, after these two orders had been made, the Committee on Printing, with the full knowledge of the fact, reported to the House the resolution which the Senator from Pennsylvania has read, to wit: that an additional number should be printed for the House by the printer of the House. They were, therefore, but acting in accordance with the law in making their report; while, if we were to adopt such a resolution, it would be one directly in face of the law. It was an act of supererogation on the part of the House, I grant, because the printing of the extra number followed the printing of the original document; and that having been determined, it would go precisely, as the resolution directs it, without the words of the resolution. The House, therefore, might be justified in doing what they did; while the Senate would not be justified, because in one case it would be in accordance with the law; and in the other case, clearly adverse to the law.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Have you the law?

Mr. HAMLIN. I have not it here by me, but it provides that the printer for the House first ordering the printing of the document shall do it for both branches. That is the idea of it. There is no dispute about what it is. The House had ordered this, the Senate had ordered it, and after both had done it, the Printing Committee reported to the House a resolution that the printing of the extra number for the House should be done by their printer. I hope no further delay will be had in the case. If you were to reconsider the vote, and adopt the amendment indicated by the Senator from Pennsylvania, it would not change one single thing; it would only be a vote of the Senate, directly in violation of the existing law; and the officer now under oath, who is sworn to carry it out, I apprehend, however highly he might respect the opinion of the Senate, would not be quite willing to violate his oath of office.

Mr. BRODHEAD. I will make one additional remark. This is the second part of the Patent Office report. The first part was the mechanical portion. The Senate has ordered the printing of that part.

Mr. HAMLIN. The mechanical?

Mr. BRODHEAD. I mean the mechanical, and I am of opinion, that this part—the agricultural—is a portion of the report, and the Senate having first ordered the printing of the first part, this being the second part, follows it. And, sir, this may be the reason why the House of Representatives directed, in their resolution, that the second part should be printed by the printer of the House. I cannot conceive any other reason, than that the House wished to hand over to its printer the printing of the second portion, when there might be, at any rate, a question as to whether it did not properly pertain to the printer of the Senate. I think it did, and, therefore, we should be doing exactly what the Senator from Maine says the House of Representatives has been doing. He asserts that that House ordered this document to be printed by the printer of the House, because it was in accordance with the law. Now, we might do the same thing, and order it to be done by the printer of the Senate, because we believe he is legally entitled to do it, it being the second branch of the same report. For this reason, and another which I might perhaps add, and that is, that the Senate has already acted upon this question, and inserted a provision in the deficiency bill requiring all documents ordered to be printed by the Senate to be printed by the printer of the Senate, I hope the motion which I have made to reconsider will prevail, and that then the Senate will amend the resolution in the way I have suggested. I ask for the yeas and nays on my motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. PRATT. Before the vote is taken I should like to hear the section of the law read to which reference has been made, so that we may know distinctly what are its provisions.

The Secretary read the following:

"SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That when any document shall be ordered to be printed by both Houses of Congress, the entire printing of such document shall be done by the printer of that House which first ordered the same; and whenever the same person, or the same firm shall be printer for both Houses of Congress, and both Houses shall order the same document to be printed, then the cost of composition shall be charged but once for said document; and no sum shall be paid to said printer for altering the heads from the form in which he printed them first to the form or forms in which such document shall afterwards be printed."

Mr. PRATT. Having voted originally for this proposition, and intending to vote for the reconsideration, I am not willing that the argument of the Senator from Michigan should be unanswered. According to my understanding it is a plain, legal proposition. Under the law, when one of the Houses of Congress first orders a public document to be printed, the printing is to be done by the printer of that House. Now, assuming for the purpose of the argument, that the Senator from Michigan is right in his construction of this law, that it is to be printed for both Houses, if the Senate will look for a moment to the facts, I think they will find that the law, even as interpreted by him, requires that the printer of the Senate should print the whole of this document.

I understand the Patent Office report to be one document. I speak now from memory; but I have sent for the document of last year, and I think the mechanical portion is called Part No. 1; the agricultural portion Part No. 2; and that they are both marked on their face as one document, document No. so-and-so. Therefore, when this Patent Office report was originally presented to Congress, having been presented in this branch, and having been ordered to be printed by this branch, under the true construction of the law, the whole document should be printed by the printer of this House; and therefore, as it appears to me, it is not a mere idle ceremony that we should indicate, in our resolution, that this printing should be done by the printer of this body. I think it is due to our printer that we should so indicate it, because the House, for the reasons assigned by the Senator from Michigan, have illegally declared that the printing of this document for that House should be done by their printer. Therefore, it is due to the printer of this body that we should say that he should execute the work now ordered by the Senate. That is my understanding of the position of the question.

Mr. BRODHEAD. Certainly.

Mr. PRATT. I shall vote for the reconsideration of the resolution for the reason which I have already assigned, and for the additional reason, that for the first time, by the reading of the extract from the House Journal this morning, I have ascertained that the House had directed one hundred thousand copies to be printed—ten thousand to go to the Patent Office. The resolution which we propose to reconsider, directs the printing of thirty-seven thousand five hundred—five thousand of which, I think, go to the Patent Office.

A SENATOR. Two thousand five hundred.

Mr. PRATT. My impression was that five thousand were to go to the Patent Office. I cannot imagine, valuable as this document may be considered by many of its advocates, why we should have five thousand copies of it printed to be placed in the Patent Office. The only argument that I have heard in favor of printing it at all is, that the agriculturists of the country want it, and I presume that the representatives of the agricultural interest would be the proper parties to distribute it. Why these five thousand copies should be printed at the public expense to be placed in the Patent Office, is really beyond my conception. For the only reason, therefore, of amending the resolution to prevent the giving five thousand copies to the Patent Office, I should vote for the reconsideration.

Mr. MASON. I have not looked at this thing at all; but the statement made by the Senator from Maryland, as I understand it, is in conflict with that just made by the Senator from Michigan. The law under which the printing is done, as has been read, clearly directs that the House first ordering the printing of the document shall have it printed by its own printer, and if the other House then orders the same document, it shall be printed by the printer of that House which first ordered it. The honorable Senator from Maryland says that this document, which consists of Part No. 1 and Part No. 2, was first communicated to the Senate, and first ordered to be printed by the Senate, but in making the communication the Department communicated the first part alone, not having the second part ready, I presume. But it is just as much one document as the President's message and accompanying documents. It is one document, although printed in two or three parts. This communication coming from the Patent Office, making a report of its proceedings, consists of two parts, one the mechanical, the other the agricultural, and it is printed in two volumes for convenience; but it is one document. Now, even if the House, in directing the agricultural part of it to be printed, have, as we have been shown by the Senator from Pennsylvania, undertaken to direct that that part of this document should be printed by their own printer, they seek the very collision which is deprecated by the Senator from Michigan. They seek the collision, if collision arises. Whether the Senate will entertain it, is another question; but, clearly, if we do not, admonished by the House, indicate the intention of the Senate to require that the law shall be executed so far as it has directed, in my humble judgment we shall have yielded to an apparent usurpation on the part of the House.

I think, therefore, without ascribing anything to the House, that this expression of theirs, that the documents which they have ordered shall be printed by their printer, is more than mere surplusage. It has a specific object, and if the Senator is right in his construction of the law, which I apprehend he is, the effect of it will be to violate this law, which requires the whole document to be printed by the printer of the House first ordering it. I trust, therefore, the Senate will vindicate

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

33d CONGRESS, 1st Session.

TUESDAY, MAY 30, 1854.

NEW SERIES.....No. 84.

cate its own right by reconsidering the resolution, and adopting the amendment suggested by the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. HAMLIN. It is to me a matter of entire indifference who does the printing of this document; but it is desirable it should be done, and I think it is desirable that the Senate should vote understandingly upon the matter, or I would not again trespass upon its attention. Having been somewhat familiar with it, I beg to state in a very few words what is my view of the matter.

The law provides that when the printing of a document is first ordered in the Senate, and subsequently in the House, it shall be printed for both Houses by the Senate printer; and when first ordered in the House, and subsequently in the Senate, it shall be done by the House printer. Now, sir, the first part of the Patent Office report was communicated to the Senate early in the session. I have not before me the day, but it was early in the session. Subsequently, and long afterwards, the second part of that report was communicated to Congress. The first part of it was ordered to be printed in the Senate; the second part in the House. What is the true construction in relation to this matter? What is the law? What constitutes a document? That is the true question to be settled. By the law of 1837, it is made the duty of the Commissioner of Patents to make an annual report upon the arts and manufactures. That is all the law there is in existence which requires any report from the Commissioner of Patents. The law, therefore, is complied with when he sends here what we call his mechanical report. That is all the report he is required to make by law. That was ordered to be printed, first in the Senate, next in the House, and both editions were printed, or are in process of being printed, by the Senate printer. What number the document bears has no earthly connection with the subject. What the Senate vote, by its order, to make a document, is a document under the law. We vote to print the President's message and accompanying documents. It is subdivided into three or four parts, as the Superintendent of the Public Printing shall deem proper, but it makes but one document, because—and I beg Senators to bear in mind what I say—there is but one order of Congress in ordering it to be printed. What we order to be printed at this time, by this vote, constitutes a document, whether it is two, ten, or one hundred pages. That is, in the language of the law, a document; and the whole number of documents that we order to be printed must be printed by the printer of the Senate, if it is first ordered here. Now, sir, if the second part were the same document, only one vote was necessary in the House or Senate for the printing of both. You might want an additional vote for an additional number, but a vote to print the first part, if the two be one document in law, must necessarily have carried the printing of the second. What was the view of the Senate? They took no such view of it. We ordered, by a separate vote, the second part to be printed. The House did the same; and by its own order made it a document.

This, sir, is my view of the matter; and I think I could cite here a great many illustrations of it. We find the President's message and accompanying documents sent to us, but we find additional reports emanating from the Departments. I have one in my recollection now. I recollect very well that the Secretary of War, either this year or last year, stated in his report that there was a certain matter upon which he was not fully prepared at that time to report. Was it not in regard to the surveys for the Pacific railroad? I think it was. He therefore did not communicate them as a part of his annual report, because he had not them complete. What did he do? Subsequently, when he got them, he sent them in. What did we do? Printed them separately, and made, by our own order, a separate document of them. I hold, under this law, that the President may send in his annual message, accompanied by the annual reports of the heads of the different Departments; and if the Senate should so choose, it is perfectly competent, under that law, to say that we would order the President's message and the report of the Secretary of the Treasury to be printed, and stop there; and by so doing we would make it a document. That is the language of the law. What we order to be printed is a document; and, taking the case which I have stated, if we take the President's message and report of the Treasury Department, and say that we will order them to be printed alone, and pass no vote in relation to the others, what would be the document? Why, it would be the President's message and report of the Treasury Department. Suppose we subsequently ordered the reports of the other Departments to be printed, the order of the Senate would make another document of them. If the order to print them was made at a different time from that when the first order was made, they would be another document, no matter what the number would be. That would not vary it, because it would be an order of the Senate to print a certain number at a certain time, while the other would have been another order, at another time, for an entirely distinct thing.

So it is in relation to this matter. While this report is by law a thing which has two parts, the one coming here under the direction and by the requirement of law, and the other under only an annual appropriation requiring the Commissioner of Patents to collect certain reports; and while they have the same number put upon them here, we stamp upon them the character of two documents by our own votes, and by our own distinct orders; I hold that notwithstanding the number, they are two distinct reports—one mechanical, the other agricultural.

I think that there is but one case to be found where the printing of the second part of a document has followed that of the first; and that was the document upon the exploration of the river Amazon. That report consisted of a first and second part, and the vote ordering the first part to be printed, also, at the same time, ordered the second part to be printed, and consequently the Senate at that time, although they both made one report, looked at them as two documents, drawing a distinction between a report and a document. There were two parts to a report, and the Senate made two documents of it; but to supersede the necessity of a subsequent motion to print the second part, which was the second document, the motion was made for the whole when the first part was printed. Now, if when the Senate ordered the mechanical portion of the Patent Office report to be printed, it had, at the same time, ordered the agricultural portion to be printed, one would have followed the other. But by its own action, by a distinct and separate order, it has made them two documents. It has made two documents, even if they were one report; though I deny that they are the same report. One is in relation to mechanics, and the other in relation to agriculture. This is the view I take of the matter; and it is in accordance with the uniform practice of the Senate. It is the opinion of the Superintendent of the Public Printing; and, in accordance with that opinion, I understand he has delivered the work to the public printer. It is a question for him to decide, and not for the Senate. I think, myself, that it was inappropriate for the House to declare that theirs should be printed by the printer of the House, because it was what was beyond their control, and what they could not do. You have a law placing that power in the hands of an executive officer; and that power he was bound to discharge under the sanction of an oath and under a bond. If he believed that one printer or the other, under the law, was entitled to it, he had nothing to do but to discharge his duty, and to discharge it as he understood the law.

I have nothing further to say upon the subject. If the Senate shall be disposed to reconsider and pass the order with the amendment proposed by the Senator from Pennsylvania, I can only say that I shall make no further objection to it; but I will regard it as a vote directly in opposition to the law.

Mr. PRATT. While the Senator was speaking I referred to the law, and also to copies of the Patent Office report. To show that I was entirely right in the remarks which I made when I addressed the Senate, I shall read a sentence from the seventh section of the law:

"That when any document shall be ordered to be printed by both Houses of Congress, the entire printing of such document shall be done by the printer of that House which first ordered the same."

There is no dispute in reference to this matter, that the mechanical part of the report was first presented to the Senate, and by the Senate was first ordered to be printed. If, therefore, the agricultural portion of the report constitutes a part of the same document, the Senator concedes that it comes within the letter of that clause of the seventh section of the act of 1852, which I have read for the information of the Senate. I hold in my hand the Patent Office report for 1852. Part first is the mechanical part, and the Commissioner says:

"I have the honor to transmit to you, as required by law, that portion of the report of this office, for the year 1852, which relates to arts and manufactures."

It is marked Document No. 55. I come to the agricultural portion of the same report; and the Commissioner goes on to say that he now has the honor to transmit that portion of the report relating to agriculture. It is marked Document No. 55, precisely the same as the other.

I think, therefore, that I have stated what must convince every impartial mind that this is one report, the whole and entire report, constituting one and only one document; and that, under this clause of the act of 1852, wherever a document has been ordered to be printed, it is to be printed entirely by the printer of the House in which it is first ordered. That is the proposition for which I contend. I know that the honorable Senator from Maine does not desire to do injustice to anybody; but it is a proposition which there is not a legal mind here—I venture to say my honorable friend from Michigan, who espouses the other side, cannot get up and say I am wrong—that does not see that, under this law, the printer of the Senate is entitled to the printing of the entire document. I know that neither my honorable friend from Maine nor any other Senator, desires to do injustice; but the effect of not agreeing to the amendment suggested by the Senator from Pennsylvania would be illegally to deprive our printer of the emoluments of the office to which he is entitled.

Mr. HAMLIN. I desire to state the fact that while each part of the Patent Office report has the same number, it is only and entirely our number. It comes here with no earthly number upon it. The Commissioner of Patents communicates his report separately and distinctly, at two different times, with no number upon it.

Mr. PRATT. But as one document.

Mr. HAMLIN. No, sir; not as one document. And then numbers are placed upon them by the Secretary of the Senate, when he sends them out, simply as an arbitrary method of designating them, not for the purpose of consolidating them or making them either one report or one document.

Mr. STUART. I think that if I can have the attention of the Senator from Maryland, we shall not disagree about this question; certainly, I hope not. I am not going to discuss the question as to whether this report is one or two documents. I will only suggest to the Senator and to the Senate, that it may very well be one report, and yet two documents, within the meaning of the law. But, for the purpose of my argument, that does not alter the question. I submit that the Superintendent of Public Printing is the agent, selected by the law to determine the question as to who shall do the printing. This being my view of the law—and I think the Senator himself will not dispute it—I submit again respectfully to the Senate that if the Superintendent disagrees with us, he will disregard our resolution; and he ought to do so. It would be no excuse for him, if it did not meet his judgment, to say that the Senate had ordered it.

Then, sir, how do we stand? Either our construction of the law is right, and the Superintendent of the Public Printing will decide it to be right, and will give this printing to the printer of the Senate, or else the construction contended for here is wrong, and our resolution will be disregarded by the Superintendent, under his opinion of his duty under the law. Then how stands the Senate of the United States? The Superintendent of Public Printing is not an officer who we can control by our resolution. He is not an officer of the Senate. He is an officer of the law of the United States, and gives to it such construction as, in his opinion, the law demands. Then I ask Senators again, in what position will our action place the Senate of the United States? Why, sir, as seeking to control an officer over whom we have no control at all, and subjecting our action, therefore, to be set at defiance; or, if we are right, the resolution will be no more with those words in than it is now.

It seems to me that there can really be no two opinions about this matter; and in order that some Senator may answer, if he can, I will state my proposition again. I submit, that if the construction of the law which is contended for by the Senator from Maryland be the correct construction, this resolution now carries on its face all that it would carry if it were altered as suggested by the Senator from Pennsylvania; but if that be not the true construction of the law, then we subject ourselves to the humiliating position of having our resolution expressly disregarded by the Superintendent of Public Printing. In either case, the result arrived at, as to our action, is the same. The Superintendent is an officer whose action we cannot control. He will decide for himself as his oath and the law compel him to do. At best, then, according to the construction contended for by the Senator from Maryland, it is a work of supererogation to put in the words suggested; but if that construction be wrong, then, by adopting the suggestion of the Senator from Pennsylvania, the Senate of the United States will have undertaken a business which it has no right to transact. Therefore, the fact whether this be one or two documents does not at all alter the propriety of changing the terms of the resolution. As I suggested, I think it very probable that although this be one report, it may form two documents; but the Senate of the United States is not the body to decide that question; the law has expressly given its decision to another tribunal—the Superintendent of Public Printing.

Mr. BADGER. Mr. President, I intended, by the vote which I gave upon this resolution before, what I intend to make manifest by the vote which I shall give upon the present proposition; that is, that this printing should be done by the printer of the Senate. Now, the honorable Senator from Michigan says that we have no authority to direct the printing to be done by the printer of the Senate.

Mr. STUART. That is not precisely my statement; but perhaps the honorable Senator did not hear the remarks which I made a short time ago. I stated that the Senate could undoubtedly order a document to be printed, and have it printed by whom they chose; but that would be an extra document, outside of the law. I said further, that if this document should be printed under the law, the Superintendent would decide who should have it.

Mr. BADGER. Then I understand the Senator concedes we have a right to direct this document to be printed by our printer. That being so, if it is the wish and intention of the Senate that our printer should print it, it seems to me that every objection to modifying the resolution, as proposed by the Senator from Pennsylvania, is gone. I take it that, if we pass this order that this printing is to be done by the printer of the Senate, it will be done by him, or it will be done by nobody. I take it for granted, if we pass this order, the officers of this House will know that at least it is not their business to dispute our authority, and the Secretary will take care that the printing is done by the person whom we direct shall do it.

Now, sir, that is sufficient for me. The question may come up hereafter, whether it is printing ordered beyond the scope of the law which regulates the public printing, or falls within it. I do not think it necessary to investigate the question now. I wish the printing done, and I wish it done by the officer of the Senate; and therefore I shall vote to direct that it be done by him.

There is a question, however, now pending, Mr. President, as I have collected from some statements I have seen in the newspapers, with regard to the construction of the printing law of 1852; and I understand the circuit court of the United States for this District, upon an application being made to them for some process in behalf of the printer of the Senate, have refused to grant it, not upon the ground that the Superintendent of Public Printing is, under the law, authorized to decide the questions with regard to printing which have created this difficulty, but that the ultimate power of decision belongs, under the law, to the Committees on Printing of the two Houses. I understand, further, that from that refusal an appeal has been prosecuted to the Supreme Court; so that what is the true construction of the law is now in a process of judicial interpretation. It may turn out that the opinion that the committees of the two Houses of Congress are the ultimate authority will receive the sanction of the highest tribunal of the country, who will decide that question calmly, and who can have no preference or feeling in the matter. But, in the mean time, we propose to print this document. We have power, it is confessed, to have it printed by our own printer, and the other question will arise hereafter.

Mr. PRATT. And this will not increase the expense.

Mr. STUART. I will state my position in a few words; for I am reluctant to detain the Senate. I insist that this is the construction of the law: If this body orders a certain number of documents to be printed, and, in the opinion of the Superintendent, the printing of them belongs to the House printer, he will print them. If this body incorporates in a resolution additional words, that that number shall be printed by the printer of the Senate, and the officers of the Senate carry out that resolution, he will print them, as the printer of the Intelligencer might print them, or any one else whom we might order. Thus we shall have thirty-seven thousand five hundred additional documents printed, and we shall have to pay for them out of our contingent fund.

Sir, we cannot change the law. The printer of the House of Representatives and the printer of the Senate have certain rights under the law, to be determined by the Superintendent of Public Printing. If we incorporate in our resolution an order that these documents shall be printed by the printer of the Herald, or the printer of the Star, or anybody else, we cannot take away the right which the law gives to the public printer. Then, if our officers go on and obey our resolution, the result is, as I said before, that we shall have an additional number of this document. We shall have seventy-five thousand instead of thirty-seven thousand five hundred; and we shall have to pay for thirty-seven thousand five hundred out of our contingent fund, in addition to paying for thirty-seven thousand five hundred from the Treasury. It is therefore a mistake to say that this will not cost us any more.

I take it that this position I assume cannot be disputed. This law, I repeat, confers rights upon the printers of both Houses. Those rights are fixed and determined, so soon as the Superintendent acts; and the terms of our resolutions cannot deprive any one of rights vested by law. If we order the document to be printed, the Superintendent determines who shall print it. We cannot change the law. It is not in our power to change it. But if the argument of the other side be right, there was no necessity for our amendment to the deficiency bill. We undertook by that amendment so to change the law as to pay for extra composition. Now we can as well change it, and do change it, by this resolution; and if the argument be sound, we do not need the concurrent action of the other House and the President of the United States at all, to change the law. That argument, therefore, it seems to me, cannot bear examination.

Mr. PRATT. I wish the Senator to answer this argument, if he can. The proposition submitted by the honorable Senator from North Carolina, and, as I understand, it was conceded by the honorable Senator from Michigan, is, that the Senate have a right to order any number of copies to be printed, and to direct that number of copies to be printed by whom they please. Now, the Senator says he number so printed under the order of the Senate would have to be paid for out of the contingent fund of the Senate. The Senator must further concede that it is not obligatory upon the Senate to order any number to be printed at all, and therefore if they do not take action under the general power which they have under the law of 1852, there is nothing for the public printer to do. They have ordered no part of the document to be printed which will come within that view. According to the Senator's own argument, if he is right in the law, (which I humbly conceive he is not,) the number we order for ourselves would be printed by our own printer, and we should have to pay for it out of this fund; but I say it would not be an additional number.

Mr. STUART. The Senator asks me to answer the argument if I can. Now, sir, I may be exceedingly confident—not in my own power, but in the reason of the case. I will, however, state my proposition in a few words; and I hope so clearly that the Senator cannot misunderstand me. The law of the United States has provided for the election of a public printer, and it has provided that when he is elected, he shall do all the printing for both Houses of Congress, and for the Executive Departments. That is the law. That being the law, I ask where the power rests—in the Senate, or the House of Representatives of the United States—to divert that printing to somebody else? Is there any such power?

Mr. BENJAMIN. Does the law say "all the printing?"

Mr. STUART. The law says that all the public printing shall be done by the public printer, and each House is to elect a public printer. The two Houses may elect the same printer, or they may elect different ones. If two are elected, these two are to do all the public printing. Now, do they not have a right to that printing, the moment the House orders any public printing, and the moment the Senate orders any public printing? Does it not go immediately to these persons under the law, and is there any power to divert it from them?

Mr. PRATT. Did not the Senator concede that we had a right to order whomever we pleased to print anything?

Mr. STUART. I have stated my proposition three or four times already, but I will state it again, so that I cannot be misunderstood. I say, that if the Senate, in ordering the printing of this document, goes on to say that it shall be printed by the printer of the Senate, it is an additional number to be printed beyond the provisions of the law. If the House printer is entitled to this printing, without these words being inserted in the resolution, he will print these thirty-seven thousand five hundred additional copies under that law, and it is not in our power to prevent him. Then, I say, if the Senate printer prints thirty-seven thousand five hundred also, he does it under the resolution of the Senate, and not under the law, and is to be paid for it out of the contingent fund of the Senate. It is not in the power of the Senate of the United States to direct printing to be done by anybody else, so as to affect the rights of the public printers under the law. Suppose we order ten thousand copies of a document to be printed by the printer of the New York Herald; the moment we order this, it gives to the printer of Congress a right to print the same number, because the law gives it to him. He can print it; he will print it; and it will be paid for out of the Treasury of the United States. We can have the same number printed by the printer of the Herald, and pay him for it also; and that is this case precisely. If the officers of the Senate, as suggested by the Senator from North Carolina, obey our resolution, and have this printing done through the medium of the printer of the Senate, and the Superintendent shall determine that he is not entitled to it, the House printer will take his pay for it under the law, and will print the document. We cannot avoid it by any action of ours. It is for this reason, and this reason alone, that I am opposed to the reconsideration; for, as between these printers, I beg leave to say now, once and forever, that I have no choice at all. I care not, individually, who does the printing; but I have some care that we do not pay twice for printing a document when we do not intend to pay for it but once.

Mr. GWIN. What is the resolution? Is it proposed that the printer of the Senate shall print these extra numbers?

Mr. BADGER. The motion is to reconsider. Mr. GWIN. For that purpose?

Mr. BRODHEAD. To make this resolution read the same as the resolution of the House, only striking out the words "printer of the House," and inserting "printer of the Senate."

Mr. GWIN. Mr. President, on the 31st of March last the Senate ordered this document, about which so much has been said, to be printed, and after that order was issued it was transmitted, according to law, to the Superintendent of Printing, and handed by him to the printer of the House, and he has printed the document, so that it is entirely out of the control of the Senate. We have no further control over it. This is a motion to print an extra number of that document, which has already been printed by the printer of the House. That document has passed from the hands of the Senate. It is in the hands of the printer who is declared by the law to be entitled to it, and he is the printer of the House.

Mr. BRODHEAD. My friend from California, I think, is mistaken in regard to a matter of fact. The mechanical branch of the Patent Office report came here a long time ago, but the agricultural part did not come till recently, and therefore I take it for granted it cannot be printed already.

Mr. GWIN. I am not mistaken. The order to print this very document was made by the Senate on the 31st of March, and it is printed.

Mr. BRODHEAD. Not for the Senate.

Mr. GWIN. Yes, sir, for the Senate.

Mr. BRODHEAD. I will read the resolution of the House: "That there be printed by the printer of the House, one hundred thousand extra numbers of the agricultural report of the Commissioner of Patents," &c.

Mr. GWIN. That is an order for "extra numbers." I spoke of the printing of the document—the original document. We ordered that to be printed on the 31st of March.

Mr. BRODHEAD. Why, then, is this now proposed?

Mr. GWIN. It is now proposed to provide for the printing of extra numbers of that document; but it has already been ordered to be printed, and is in the hands of the printer of the House. If we order this printing to be done by any printer but he who has the original document to print, we shall have to pay both for it. The original document is out of our possession. It was, according to law, transmitted to the Superintendent, and by him delivered to the printer of the House, as he had a right to deliver it. The question is now whether we shall print an extra number of that document. That is the precise question. The document is printed. The original was handed to the printer of the House, set up, and printed, and now we are asked to print an extra number of that document. If we order any other printer to do it but the one who did the original printing, we do it outside of the law, because our power is exhausted. The document has gone to the hands of the printer. We have no control over it, and cannot have any control over it. If we order any one else to do it, we pay him out of the contingent fund, as the Senator from Michigan says, because the document has passed from our control. We may adopt as many resolutions as we please, but we cannot get hold of it, nor can the Secretary. If you were to ask him for it, he would tell you that it had gone long ago to the Superintendent of Printing, and been handed over by him to the printer entitled to it by law.

Mr. CASS. I wish to ask the Senator from California a question. He says that if we order this printing to be done by any one but the public printer, we must pay for it out of our own funds. I want to know how we can order it to be printed by anybody else? The printing must be done by the public printer. If we order it to be done by any one else we cannot pay for it.

Mr. GWIN. There are two printers, one for the Senate and one for the House. I say that if we order this printing to be done by any one but the printer to whom the document has already been transmitted by the Superintendent—the printer of the House—we have to pay for it out of the contingent fund.

Mr. TOUCEY. I have myself given no attention to this question until the present moment; but I find by the seventh section of the act of 1852, it is directed, that when "any document shall be ordered to be printed by both Houses of Congress, the entire printing of such document shall be done by the printer of that House which first ordered the same." Now, this document has been ordered to be printed by both Houses of Congress, as I understand. If so, the law is clear and unequivocal that "the entire printing of such document shall be done by the printer of that House which first ordered the same." Until this law be repealed, I deny that either branch of Congress can make an order for printing which is contrary to its terms. I do not understand that either branch of Congress can repeal a law, or make an order in opposition to a law while that law remains in force. It seems to me there is no room for any doubt on this question. Here is a document. Whether it is part of one report, or part of another, it is a document. It has been ordered to be printed by both Houses of Congress, and the law declares in the most unequivocal terms, by whom the printing shall be done. The law makes the order as long as it stands upon the statute-book unrepealed; and for one I hold the supremacy of the law over a resolution of either branch of Congress.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, upon the motion to reconsider, resulted—yeas 21, nays 16; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Atchison, Badger, Brodhead, Brown, Dawson, Fish, Foot, Gillette, Hunter, James, Jones of Tennessee, Mallory, Mason, Pratt, Rusk, Seward, Sumner, Thompson of Kentucky, Toombs, Wade, and Weller—21.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Allen, Benjamin, Cass, Clay, Dodge of Wisconsin, Evans, Fitzpatrick, Gwin, Hamlin, Norris, Pettit, Slidell, Stuart, Toucey, and Walker—16.

So the motion to reconsider was agreed to; and the question recurred on agreeing to the resolution, as follows:

Ordered, That there be printed, for the use of the Senate, thirty-seven thousand five hundred additional copies of the agricultural portion of the Patent Office report, with the plates accompanying the same; five thousand of which shall be for the use of the Patent Office.

Mr. BRODHEAD. I now move to amend the resolution by inserting, after the word "printed," the words, "by the printer of the Senate."

Mr. GWIN. Was there not a law passed at the last Congress, that one House should have no right to order the printing of a book to be paid for out of the contingent fund?

Mr. BADGER. Except public documents.

Mr. GWIN. Can we order a public document to be paid for out of the contingent fund?

Mr. BADGER. The provision of the act to which the Senator refers, is that neither House shall distribute to the member of that House any books, except public documents, unless an appropriation be first made.

Mr. GWIN. This is a document ordered without authority of law, if we order it to be printed by the printer of the Senate; and it is to be paid for out of the contingent fund. It is clearly out of the power of the Senate to order it to be done outside the printing act. I move to lay the resolution on the table, and I ask for the yeas and nays on that motion.

Mr. HAMLIN. I hope the Senator from California will withdraw that motion.

Mr. GWIN. I will withdraw it to accommodate the Senator; but I really wish to stop debate.

Mr. HAMLIN. I asked the Senator to withdraw the motion simply for this reason: I apprehend that this vote will of itself be a nullity, and be treated as such by the Superintendent of Public Printing. I have no doubt he will so treat it; and I have no doubt that if we do not pass the vote to print the extra number, we shall not have it. If we pass this resolution—which I will not vote for—ordering this additional number to be printed by the printer of the Senate, I apprehend the Superintendent of Public Printing will go on and execute the order just so far as it is lawful; and where it is unlawful I apprehend he will not violate his oath of office. We have ordered this document to be printed. It has been sent to the Superintendent of Printing, and he has sent it to the printer of the House, and it has been printed. Now, under the law, if we pass an order for printing the extra numbers, the printer of the House will get it. I have no doubt the Superintendent will carry out the law; therefore I have no objection to the resolution being passed, but I shall not vote for it.

Mr. RUSK. I hope the Senator will allow the Superintendent to construe his own duty; and I hope officers of the Government will not be invited to disregard what action may be taken by the Senate, or the two Houses of Congress.

Mr. HAMLIN. I will say, then, that I understand the Superintendent to say such is his view of the law, and such will be his action.

Mr. BRODHEAD. Then I understand the Superintendent to deliver his judgment in advance, and have it announced here on the floor of the Senate to influence our votes.

Mr. HAMLIN. Not at all.

Mr. SLIDELL. I renew the motion which was made by the Senator from California, to lay the resolution and amendment on the table; and on that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 9, nays 26; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Adams, Clay, Fitzpatrick, Gwin, Norris, Pratt, Slidell, Toombs, and Walker—9.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Atchison, Badger, Brodhead, Brown, Cass, Dawson, Evans, Fish, Foot, Gillette, Hamlin, Hunter, James, Jones of Tennessee, Mallory, Mason, Rusk, Sebastian, Seward, Stuart, Sumner, Thompson of Kentucky, Toucey, Wade, and Weller—26.

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. PRATT. I hope the Senator from Pennsylvania will consent to alter the clause giving five thousand for the use of the Patent Office, by reducing the number to two thousand five hundred. The House has already provided for giving ten thousand to the Patent Office. I do not see that they need fifteen thousand.

Mr. HAMLIN. They ask for twenty-five thousand.

Mr. PRATT. They might ask for one hundred thousand, but we should not be bound to give it to them.

Mr. BRODHEAD. Then I will move to strike out five thousand, and insert two thousand five hundred, if that be agreeable to the Senate.

Mr. GWIN. Let us have one amendment at a time. I ask for the yeas and nays on inserting the words proposed to be inserted by the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. TOUCEY. I have given no attention to the controversy that has arisen, as to which printer is entitled to print this document. I have not investigated the subject, nor formed any opinion upon it. The vote I have given, and the vote I shall give, is upon the ground merely that the law which we passed in 1852, directs, unequivocally, by whom every public document, ordered to be printed by both Houses of Congress, shall be printed. This document is ordered to be printed by both Houses of Congress, and the law applies directly to the question who shall print it. I deny that either House has the power to direct it to be printed by any one else. When, therefore, without repealing that law, you undertake here to authorize anything to be done which is in conflict with it, I think the order is without authority, and is void. If I am right in my premises, I think my conclusion is inevitable; and I have not understood any Senator to state different premises from what I have. For this reason, I shall vote against the amendment. If the amendment directs the printing to be done by the officer who is entitled to do the printing, it is superfluous. If it directs it to be done by a printer who is not entitled to print it, then it is in conflict with this law. Now I confess, for one, that I deem it of the highest importance, not only in Congress, but in the country, that the laws should be obeyed.

The question being taken by yeas and nays on the amendment, resulted—yeas 23, nays 11; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Atchison, Badger, Brodhead, Brown, Dawson, Evans, Fish, Foot, Gillette, Hunter, Jones of Tennessee, Mallory, Mason, Pratt, Rusk, Sebastian, Seward, Sumner, Thompson of Kentucky, Toombs, Wade, and Weller—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Cass, Clay, Fitzpatrick, Gwin, Hamlin, Norris, Slidell, Stuart, Toucey, and Walker—11.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BRODHEAD. If it be the general sense of the Senate that five thousand is too large a number to be given to the Patent Office for distribution by it, I will move to reduce the number to two thousand five hundred.

Several SENATORS. Oh, no!

Mr. BRODHEAD. Several Senators around me say I had better leave it as it is; I will not, therefore, move the amendment.

Mr. STUART. I should like to have the resolution amended, so as to increase the whole number to be printed. It was the intention, I understand, of the committee, if the amendment of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. FITZPATRICK] prevailed, increasing the amount to be placed at the disposal of the Patent Office to five thousand, to ask that the whole number be increased to forty thousand. I move, therefore, to strike out "thirty-seven thousand five hundred" and insert "forty thousand."

The amendment was agreed to.

The question being on the adoption of the resolution, as amended:

Ordered, That there be printed by the printer of the Senate forty thousand additional copies of the agricultural portion of the Patent Office report, with the plates accompanying the same, five thousand of which shall be for the use of the Patent Office.

Mr. BRODHEAD called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered, and taken with the following result:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Atchison, Badger, Brodhead, Brown, Dawson, Douglas, Evans, Fish, Foot, Gillette, Hunter, Jones of Tennessee, Mallory, Mason, Pettit, Pratt, Rusk, Seward, Sumner, Thompson of Kentucky, Wade, and Waller—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Benjamin, Cass, Clay, Fitzpatrick, Hamlin, Norris, Sidel, Stuart, Toombs, Toucey, and Walker—12.

So the resolution, as amended, was adopted.

GOLD COINAGE.

Mr. GWIN. I move to take up the bill which has been reported from the Committee on Finance, "to authorize the coinage of gold pieces of the value respectively of ten eagles and five eagles, and for other purposes." It is important that it should be acted upon at once.

Mr. STUART. I hope the Senator from California now, when we are engaged in this business of printing, will allow us to dispose of another resolution which is also pending on a motion to reconsider.

Mr. GWIN. We are wasting more time on these resolutions than they are all worth. The measure which I propose to take up is of some national importance to the country, and I hope the Senate will permit me to have it acted upon. The Secretary of the Treasury is anxious that it should be passed.

Mr. BADGER. Will the Senator from Michigan state what resolution it is he wishes to have called up?

Mr. STUART. It is in relation to the printing of a document called the Compendium of the Census. The resolution was passed by the Senate some three or four months since, but it has been tied up by a motion to reconsider.

Mr. GWIN. I think there will be no opposition to my bill; and I hope it will not take ten minutes.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It provides that there may be coined and issued, by the Mint of the United States, or by such of the branch Mints as the Secretary of the Treasury may direct, a gold coin of the weight of two thousand five hundred and eighty grains, of the value of one hundred dollars, and another of the weight of one thousand two hundred and ninety grains, of the value of fifty dollars; each of which coins shall be of the standard fineness now prescribed by law for the gold coins of the United States, and shall be a legal tender, and shall be received at their respective values, as established by the bill, in payment of all dues to the United States.

It also proposes to enact that the Director of the Mint, in the regulations he is authorized to make for the assay office in New York, shall place depositors of gold bullion in that office upon the same footing as depositors of gold in the Mint at Philadelphia and branches; and that it shall be the option of persons depositing gold or silver in bullion or in foreign coins at the assay office in the city of New York, to receive the Mint value of the same, either in refined bars or in bars made from the identical metal without refining; but in either case to bear a stamp of the weight, fineness, and Mint value.

It further proposes to repeal all laws heretofore passed which authorize any foreign gold or silver coins to pass current as money and to be receivable in payment of debts.

It provides that the Director of the Mint may, under such rules and regulations, and upon such terms and conditions as the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe, provide for striking medals for such States, Territories, associations, societies, and individuals, as the rules shall include, and the Director, under like rules and regulations, shall acquire and keep a collection of all medals that have been or may be struck by the United States, or any of the States or Territories of the United States, and also of all such as may be struck at the Mint under the provision hereof: Provided, That all expenses incurred on account of the striking of such medals shall be paid by the said States, Territories, associations, societies, and individuals respectively, for which or whom they may be struck.

The bill is further designed to authorize the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate of the United States, to appoint an Assistant Director of the Mint, at an annual salary of $2,500; and allow the clerks in the Mint an annual salary of $1,800 each, at the discretion of the officers authorized by law to appoint, with the approbation of the President; and to allow to the clerks authorized to be employed in the branch Mint in California, $3,000 a year each, to take effect from and after the first of July, 1854.

It also provides that all appointments of clerks and assistants authorized to be employed in the offices of the Assistant Treasurers of the United States, and in the offices of the Mint and branches shall respectively be made, with the approbation of the President, by the Assistant Treasurer, Director, Superintendent, and Treasurers of the Mint and branches, as the case may be, whose bonds are held at the Treasury Department in trust for the proper and faithful performance of their respective duties.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I am not disposed to give my vote on this bill at this moment. It was only reported on the 23d of May. It certainly appears to me to be a very important bill. I have been looking over some of its provisions, and I find that it makes a great change in the public policy of the country; and I should like to have some explanations of its provisions, in order to vote on it understandingly. I find, for instance, that the sixth section proposes to repeal all laws heretofore passed for authorizing any foreign gold or silver coin to be passed current as money, and be receivable in payment of debts. I do not know for what reason the Committee on Finance has reported that section. I find numerous other sections increasing the salaries of different public officers, making some changes in relation to the mode of appointment of clerks and assistants, and different provisions of the bill, which I have not yet had time even to read. The bill has only been five or six days printed. I am not prepared to vote upon it now. If, however, the Senator from California can explain it, and satisfy me in relation to it, I shall be quite pleased to withdraw my request for delay.

Mr. GWIN. All the provisions alluded to by the Senator from Louisiana were prepared by the Secretary of the Treasury, and at his request examined by the Committee on Finance, and reported unanimously by that committee. The original proposition referred to the committee, was only as to the propriety of authorizing the large coins, provided for by this bill. That question was presented by a memorial of bankers and merchants of San Francisco, asking for large coins for that place. The Secretary of the Treasury was of opinion that it was a proper time, and a proper occasion, to make these other and necessary alterations. The bill was prepared at the Department, and sent to the Committee on Finance, after full consultation with the Director of the Mint. The alterations stated by the Senator from Louisiana have been fully digested by the head of the Treasury Department, and approved by the Committee on Finance. I have no doubt that every provision in the bill is useful and important. There is no doubt that we ought to banish foreign coin from our currency. Gold is one of the products of the country. We produce a hundred millions of gold annually. We have Mints all over our country. We have enough coin of our own. We do not want to drive any but foreign coinage out of the country. It is worn out, and not of its full value. The Mint has full capacity to coin enough for all the uses of the country. Every provision of the bill has been carefully examined by the Secretary of the Treasury, and sent to the committee for their approbation.

Mr. FISH. I hope the Senator will allow this bill to go over. There are some provisions in it which I should like to examine; but if he does not consent to have it postponed, I will now move an amendment to the fifth section.

Several MEMBERS. Let the bill go over.

Mr. GWIN. I have no objection now.

Mr. MASON. I move that the further consideration of this bill be postponed until to-morrow, with a view that we may proceed to the consideration of Executive business.

Mr. BRODHEAD. I should like to know whether it is to be the understanding that we are to go on to-morrow with this bill?

Mr. GWIN. Certainly; it will be the unfinished business.

Mr. HUNTER. I had supposed that to-morrow we should go on with the veto message.

Mr. GWIN. We can go on with this bill in the morning. It will not interfere with the veto message, of course.

The motion to postpone was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On motion by Mr. MASON, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of Executive business; and, after some time spent therein, the doors were reopened, and

The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, May 29, 1854.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. WILLIAM H. MILBURN.

The Journal of Friday was read and approved.

The SPEAKER stated that the business first in order was the consideration of a resolution reported on Friday from the Joint Committee on Printing.

Mr. FAULKNER. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to offer a resolution.

Mr. REESE. I rise to a privileged question. A motion was made on the 7th of last month, by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HAVEN,] to reconsider the vote by which the bill from the Senate (No. 256) "for the relief of the West Feliciana Railroad and the Georgia Railroad and Banking Companies" was referred to the Committee of Claims. I desire now to call up that motion to reconsider, for the purpose of having it acted upon by the House. My object is to have the bill referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia cannot take the floor from the gentleman from Virginia for the purpose of calling up that motion; not, at least, until the Chair has heard what proposition the gentleman from Virginia has to make.

FUGITIVE SLAVE CASE IN BOSTON.

Mr. FAULKNER. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the facts connected with the recent death of James Batchelder, a deputy marshal of the United States, who, it is alleged, was murdered on Friday last, whilst engaged in enforcing a law of the Union against a violent and treasonable mob in the city of Boston; and if they find, as reported, that he was killed whilst in the performance of this patriotic duty, and has left a widow and children, that they further be instructed to report a bill making some proper and liberal provision for their relief.

Mr. DEAN. I object to that resolution.

Mr. FAULKNER. I move to suspend the rules, and call for the yeas and nays on that motion.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I ask the gentleman from Virginia if he has any information that the Administration cannot execute the law?

Mr. FAULKNER. The resolution is only to instruct the Committee on the Judiciary to provide for the widow and children of the deputy marshal who has been killed.

Mr. JONES. Well, I hope the rules will not be suspended.

Mr. GIDDINGS. If it is the intention of the gentleman to debate the resolution, I hope the rules will be suspended, and that we may all have a hand in the discussion.

The yeas and nays were ordered on the motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. FARLEY. I move that there be a call of the House.

Mr. LETCHER. Is that motion in order? The yeas and nays have been ordered.

The SPEAKER. That does not alter the case at all. The House have only determined that when they take the question they will take it by yeas and nays.

The question was then taken on Mr. FARLEY's motion; and it was disagreed to.

So the House refused to order a call.

[Mr. GREEN, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported back as correctly enrolled the following bill; which thereupon received the signature of the Speaker: An act to organize the Territories of Nebraska and Kansas.]

The question was then taken on the motion to suspend the rules; and there were—yeas 55, nays 51; as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Aiken, James C. Allen, Ashe, Barry, Boccock, Boyce, Bridges, Caruthers, Chastain, Chrieman, Cobb, Cox, Cutting, Dunbar, Edmundson, John M. Elliott, Etheridge, Faulkner, Florence, Giddings, Greenwood, Wiley P. Harris, Henn, Hill, Hillyer, Roland Jones, Kerr, Lamb, Leicher, McDougall, McMullin, McNair, May, Mordecai Oliver, Orr, John Perkins, Phelps, Powell, Robbins, Ruffin, Seymour, Shaw, Shower, Singleton, William R. Smith, Frederick P. Stanton, Richard H. Stanton, Alexander H. Stephens, John J. Taylor, Vansant, Walbridge, Warren, Daniel B. Wright, and Hendrick B. Wright—55.

The SPEAKER. No quorum voting.

Pending the call of the roll,

Mr. LETCHER said: In voting to suspend the rules, I do not mean to be understood as committing myself in any way to the civil pension system, which the conclusion of the resolution indicates. I vote for it because I desire to ascertain, in a reliable form, the facts connected with the outrage.

Mr. JONES, of Louisiana, said: On the same principle upon which the gentleman from Virginia bases his vote I vote aye.

Mr. ABERCROMBIE, who was not in the Hall when his name was called, said: I do not know a resolution for which I would sooner vote.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Thinking the whole matter a humbug, I vote no.

Mr. HENN. I did not hear my name called, and I do not know whether I was in the bar or not. I would like to vote in the affirmative.

[Cries of "Agreed!" "Agreed!"]

The SPEAKER. There being no objection, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENN] will be allowed to record his vote.

Mr. LETCHER. I desire to offer a resolution.

The SPEAKER. There is no quorum present.

Mr. LETCHER. I move, then, that the House adjourn.

Mr. ELLISON. Upon that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. FLORENCE. I ask for tellers upon the motion to adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the demand for tellers upon adjournment.

Mr. DUNHAM. I called for tellers upon the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not recognize the gentleman from Indiana, nor did he hear him make the demand for tellers.

Mr. ROBBINS. Is it in order now to call for tellers upon the yeas and nays?

The SPEAKER. Only by unanimous consent. Objection was made by several gentlemen.

Upon the motion to adjourn tellers were ordered; and Messrs. CAMPBELL and CURTIS were appointed.

The question was then taken; and the tellers reported—yeas 37, nays not counted.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. HOUSTON. Would it be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union?

The SPEAKER. It would not be, unless there is a quorum present. The Chair will proceed to ascertain whether there is a quorum.

After a count, it appeared that one hundred and twenty gentlemen were ascertained to be in the Hall.

Mr. LETCHER. I withdraw my motion that the House adjourn.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky. I call for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business, as announced by the Chair this morning, is the consideration of the resolution reported by the gentleman from Kentucky, from the Committee on Printing.

Mr. STANTON, (interrupting.) Then I hope that matter will be taken up now.

The SPEAKER, (continuing.) But notwithstanding the fact that that is the regular order of business, it is also in order to move to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; and that motion has been submitted by the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. HOUSTON.]

Mr. STANTON. I was not aware, Mr. Speaker, that that motion had been made.

The SPEAKER. The question immediately pending is the motion submitted by the gentleman from Virginia to suspend the rules for the admission of his resolution.

Mr. OLDS. I rise to a privileged question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio will state his privileged question.

Mr. OLDS. I move that when the House adjourns, it adjourn to meet on Thursday next.

Mr. ELLISON. On that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. HOUSTON. Let me say to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. OLDS], and to the House, that a joint resolution is proposed to be introduced into the Senate for a final adjournment of both Houses on the 3d of July; and if we go away this week, we will only have three weeks more left to transact all the business before us.

Mr. ORR. Oh, they have no notion of adjourning at this time.

Mr. HOUSTON. If we adjourn over, the deficiency bill cannot be got at till next week.

Mr. OLDS. Well, then, I withdraw my motion.

The SPEAKER. The pending question now is the motion to suspend the rules. On that motion the yeas and nays have been ordered, and will again be called.

The question was then taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 50, nays 67, (the Chair voting in the negative, and thus making a quorum;) as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Abercrombie, Aiken, James C. Allen, Willis Allen, Ashe, Benton, Boccock, Boyce, Bridges, Brooks, Caruthers, Caskie, Chastain, Cobb, Cox, Cutting, Dunbar, Edmundson, John M. Elliott, Etheridge, Faulkner, Florence, Giddings, Greenwood, Henn, Hillyer, Kerr, Lamb, Leicher, McDougall, McMullin, McNair, Maxwell, May, Mordecai Oliver, John Perkins, Phelps, Phillips, Powell, Reese, Robbins, Ruffin, Seymour, Shaw, Singleton, William R. Smith, Richard H. Stanton, Alexander H. Stephens, Vansant, and Walbridge—50.

NAYS.—Messrs. Barksdale, Barry, Campbell, Chandler, Clark, Corwin, Cullom, Curtis, John G. Davis, Thomas Davis, Dean, Dick, Disney, Drum, Dunham, Eddy, Edmunds, Thomas D. Eliot, Ellison, Farley, Flagler, Fuller, Goodrich, Aaron Harlan, Hendricks, Johnson, George W. Jones, Knox, Latham, Maurice, Meacham, Middleswarth, Smith Miller, Morrison, Nichols, Norton, Olds, Orr, Parker, Peck, Peckham, Pennington, Pringle, David Ritchie, Russell, Sabin, Sapp, Shannon, Gerrit Smith, George W. Smyth, Hester L. Stevens, Stratton, Andrew Stuart, David Stuart, John J. Taylor, John L. Taylor, Thurston, Trout, Upham, Vail, Walley, Tappan Wentworth, Westbrook, Wheeler, Daniel B. Wright, Hendrick B. Wright, and Yates—67.

So the rules were not suspended.

Mr. HOUSTON. I now move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I wish to inquire whether a motion to suspend the rules for leave to introduce a resolution would not take precedence of the motion to suspend the rules for the purpose of going into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union?

The SPEAKER. Not according to the decision of the Chair the other day, which was, that the Chair should put privileged questions in the order of the time in which they were submitted.

Mr. MAXWELL. I desire the unanimous consent of the House, if the gentleman from Alabama will withdraw his motion for a moment, to take from the table the Senate bill for the relief of J. W. Perry, for the purpose merely of having it referred to a committee.

Mr. HOUSTON. The gentleman from California, [Mr. McDougall], who was accommodating to us all last week, desires that the House do now go into committee. I wish to say so to the House as a reason why I do not comply with the request of the gentleman from Florida, [Mr. Maxwell.]

The question was then taken; and the motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. Boccock in the chair.)

THE PACIFIC RAILROAD BILL.

The CHAIRMAN. The question before the committee is the special order of the House, being House bill No. 295, entitled "A bill for the establishment of a railroad and telegraphic communication between the Atlantic States and the Pacific ocean, and for other purposes."

Mr. OLDS. I move that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

It was so ordered; and the first section of the bill received a second reading.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California [Mr. McDougall] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. DRUM. I ask the gentleman from California to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. McDougall. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. DRUM. With the consent of the gentleman from California, I desire to make some remarks to the House on the subject of the proposed recommendations of the Secretary of the Treasury to take off the duty upon salt.

[Mr. DRUM presented his remarks, consisting principally of statistics, which will be published in the Appendix.]

Mr. McDougall said the bill before the committee has been postponed from time to time with his consent; not, however, for the reason that, in his opinion, it was of less importance to the country than any other measure which had been presented to the consideration of the committee. The present measure was, in his judgment, and he believed in that of the country, the most important one that has claimed the consideration of this body, in peaceful times, since the establishment of the Federal Constitution. He therefore asked a calm and just consideration of a question of the first magnitude, and of the greatest national importance. There was not merely a political, but a commercial and general necessity for this work.

He then proceeded to state the character of the bill reported by the Select Committee. The committee met for two months, deliberating with great care on this measure. The measure matured by them was now under consideration. It was different in its features from any bill heretofore introduced in Congress in aid of the construction of a railroad to the Pacific. He repeated, the provisions of the bill, granting lands for this purpose, are altogether more guarded, and the interests of Government more securely protected, than in any other bill yet presented.

He argued to show that, even according to the strict construction school, grants of lands, as guarded in this bill, are constitutional. It is about two thousand miles from the Mississippi to the Pacific coast. At present, the General Government pays $4,000,000 per annum for the transportation of its mails, troops, and military and naval stores to California. The bill now under consideration proposes to perform, not semi-monthly, or six or nine months trips, as now, but weekly trips, across the continent, at a maximum expense of $1,200,000—for postal, military, and naval supplies. This Government will thus effect a great saving in money, to say nothing of the facilities afforded in the calamity of war. With the present means of communication, the Federal Government is unable to maintain or afford protection to the Pacific coast. If the Government means to protect that coast, it must build a railroad to the Pacific.

He showed the commercial advantages which would result by the speedy conveyance of merchandise from the Pacific to the Atlantic coast. Seventy millions of dollars are annually lost by the present devious way to our possessions on the Pacific. He entered into a calculation of the benefits of a railroad to the Pacific, saying that when completed, there will be an immediate saving of over forty-eight millions of dollars per annum, equal to the entire annual expenditures of the General Government. In conclusion, he said that the entire country demand the construction of this road; social and political necessity demands it. Whether or not it shall be built by this Congress, the time will come when the road must be constructed.

Mr. YATES. I have an amendment which I desire to offer.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has not the floor for that purpose.

Mr. McDUGALL. I yielded to my friend from Illinois for that purpose.

Mr. YATES. I wish to offer an amendment, with a view to enable the gentleman from California to conclude his speech, and for no other purpose.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the circumstances, the amendment will be received.

It is as follows:

Strike out "fifteen," in the eighth line, and insert "sixteen."

Here the committee rose informally, and the Speaker having taken the chair, a message was received from the Senate by the hands of ASBURY DICKINS, Esq., its Secretary, announcing that the Senate had insisted on its amendments to the deficiency bill, had disagreed to the amendments of the House to said amendments, and asked for a committee of conference upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

Mr. PHELPS. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to submit a motion that the House insist on its own amendments, and on its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate; and that a committee of conference be appointed.

Mr. WALSH. I object.

Mr. PHELPS. Oh, I hope the gentleman from New York will withdraw that objection. It will avoid the necessity which I should otherwise be under, of moving that the committee rise, for the purpose of enabling me to submit the motion.

The objection was not withdrawn.

The Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union then resumed its session.

Mr. McDUGALL took the floor.

Mr. PHELPS. I ask my friend from California to yield me the floor, that I may make a motion that the committee rise. I desire, when we get into the House, to submit the motion which I submitted informally a few minutes since.

Mr. McDUGALL. I must decline to yield. I shall be through in a few moments.

Mr. McD. then resumed, and concluded his remarks in favor of the bill.

Mr. SHAW addressed the committee on the subject of the distribution of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands, and replied to the remarks heretofore delivered by his colleague, [Mr. ROGERS,] which he said contained many untenable propositions. In much, however, of what his colleague said in regard to the common and equal right of all the States to the public domain, he fully concurred.

He knew that at a former period a claim was set up in favor of the new States to all the public lands within their limits. That claim, however, met with but little favor, even from the new States; and he was sure there was no gentleman here who would controvert the proposition that the public lands of this country are the common property of all the States, and should be disposed of for the common benefit of all.

He then contended that Congress, under the Constitution, possessed no power to dispose of the public lands, only so far as it could dispose of money taken from the Treasury, to carry out any of those legitimate purposes which the Constitution has authorized Congress to accomplish, and no more.

[His speech will be found in the Appendix.]

Mr. SMITH, of New York, obtained the floor, and said that he proposed to speak against the Pacific railroad bill, but as it was late, preferred that the committee should rise.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Pennsylvania. Then I submit the motion that the committee rise.

The question was taken; and the motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the Chairman of the committee [Mr. BOGOCCK] reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, had, according to order, had the state of the Union generally under consideration, and particularly House bill No. 295, being a bill to establish the Pacific railroad, &c., and had come to no resolution thereon.

DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. PHELPS. I obtained the floor for the purpose of moving that the House insist upon its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate to the deficiency bill; and as the Senate have appointed a committee of conference upon their part, also to move that a committee of conference be appointed on the part of the House.

No objection being made, the motion was agreed to.

RESOLUTIONS FROM NORTH CAROLINA.

Mr. ASHE. I ask the consent of the House to present some resolutions, in order that they may be laid upon the table and printed.

The SPEAKER. Are they resolutions from the State Legislature of North Carolina?

Mr. ASHE. They are not, but from a convention held in North Carolina.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I would ask the gentleman if they are resolutions passed by a convention authorized by law, or of a political convention?

Mr. ASHE. They were passed by a convention representing a majority of the people of North Carolina. I received them from the Governor of that State, accompanied by a request that I would present them to the House for consideration.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. This is not usual, I think, unless the resolutions come from some State Legislature, or a convention called by authority of law in some State. This, it seems, was a voluntary meeting, and was not authorized by law.

Mr. ASHE. It was not authorized by law.

Mr. JONES. Then I object to the reception of the resolutions.

BRIG GENERAL ARMSTRONG.

Mr. PERKINS, of Louisiana, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, by unanimous consent, reported the following bill; which was read a first and second time by its title, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed:

A bill for the relief of the claimants of the private-armed brig General Armstrong.

ADJOURNMENT SINE DIE.

Mr. WALBRIDGE. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, (the Senate concurring,) That the President of the Senate, and the Speaker of the House of Representatives, adjourn their respective Houses sine die on Monday, the 3d of July next, at twelve o'clock, m.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I object.

Mr. WALBRIDGE. I move to suspend the rules to enable me to offer the resolution; but I will not ask for a vote upon that motion now, as there is such a thin attendance of members.

The SPEAKER. The motion will be entered.

Mr. JONES. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I move that when the House adjourns, it adjourn to meet on Thursday next.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I demand the yeas and nays on that motion.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Why, you will not have a quorum here to-morrow.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I would remind the gentleman from Ohio that the House has already adopted a resolution that when it adjourns on Wednesday, it will be till Thursday morning, at eight o'clock, and that it will then adjourn until Monday next.

Mr. CAMPBELL. But it is very evident that there will be no quorum here to-morrow.

Mr. JONES. I think there will.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I know a dozen members who are going away to-night.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I withdraw the call for the yeas and nays.

The question was then taken on Mr. CAMPBELL's motion; and it was disagreed to.

The question recurring on Mr. JONES's motion, it was put; and decided in the affirmative.

And thereupon (at half past three o'clock, p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow at twelve o'clock, m.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, May 30, 1854.

Prayer by Rev. WILLIAM H. MILBURN.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

WASHINGTON AND ALEXANDRIA RAILROAD.

Mr. FOOT. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to permit me at this time to introduce a bill, of which I have not given notice. I will state the object of the bill, and then I presume there will be no objection to its introduction. The Legislature of Virginia, at its recent session, incorporated a company for the purpose of constructing a railroad from Alexandria, in that State, to this city, upon the plan of Colonel French. The object of this bill is to authorize this company to extend their road into the cities of Georgetown and Washington, under such rules, regulations, and prescriptions as the municipal authorities of those cities may prescribe.

There being no objection, leave to introduce the bill was granted, and it was read a first and second time by its title, "A bill authorizing the extension of the Alexandria and Washington railroad into the District of Columbia," and referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

PENSION FOR SERVICES IN EXECUTING THE FUGITIVE SLAVE LAW.

Mr. ADAMS. I wish now to introduce a resolution which I intended to introduce yesterday morning, and should then have brought forward but for the press of business urged upon us by the chairman of the Committee on Finance. I offer the resolution now. If there be any objection of course it will lie over. The resolution is:

Resolved, That the Committee on Pensions be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law a suitable pension for the support of the widow and children, if any, of the late James Batchelder, of Massachusetts, who was killed while assisting the marshal of the United States, for that State, in executing an act of Congress."

Mr. SUMNER. Let it lie over.

The PRESIDENT. Objection being made to the consideration of the resolution, it must lie over until to-morrow.

ORGANIZATION OF THE NAVY.

Mr. MALLORY. I designed this morning to ask the Senate to indulge me with taking up, during the morning hour, the bill for the organization of the Navy. The honorable Senator from New York, [Mr. FISH,] however, informs me that he has some amendments to propose, which will be ready to-morrow. I therefore now give notice to the Senate that I shall ask, during the morning hour to-morrow, to take up that bill.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Mr. CHASE presented a petition of inhabitants of West Unity, Ohio, praying a reduction of the rates of ocean postage to two cents; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Also, a petition of citizens of New York, praying the recognition of the independence of the Republic of Liberia; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. JONES, of Iowa, presented a letter of F. W. Lander, late locating and estimating engineer under Governor Stevens in his exploration of a route for a railroad to the Pacific, accompanied by resolutions of the Legislature of Washington Territory, in favor of an appropriation to compensate him for service rendered by him distinct from that required of him by Governor Stevens; which was referred to the Select Committee on the subject of a railroad to the Pacific.

Mr. PRATT presented the petition of Jane Moore, widow of Captain Stephen H. Moore, praying to be allowed a pension; which, together with certain papers on the files of the Senate in regard to the subject, was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion by Mr. SLIDELL, it was Ordered, That the documents relating to the claim of William Pumphrey, legal representative of Jacques Monton, be withdrawn from the files of the Senate, and referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

On motion by Mr. RUSK, it was Ordered, That the petition of Rebecca J. Birdsell be withdrawn from the files of the Senate, and referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. SLIDELL asked and obtained the unanimous consent of the Senate to introduce a bill granting to the States of Louisiana, Mississippi, and Alabama, the right of way and a donation of public lands, in aid of the construction of a railroad from New Orleans to Mobile; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

GOVERNOR RAMSAY.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. I am instructed to ask the Senate to take up for consideration the resolution submitted by me in relation to printing certain additional documents in the case of Governor Ramsay. The Senator from Michigan, [Mr. STUART,] who objected to its consideration at that time, is now satisfied of the propriety of printing the documents.

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution; and it was adopted, as follows:

Resolved, That in addition to the documents in the case of Alexander Ramsay, late Governor of the Territory of Minnesota, ordered to be printed on the 8th instant, all the papers on file, as well as the correspondence between the commissioners and the First Comptroller, be printed with Executive Document No. 61 of the present session.

REPORTS FROM STANDING COMMITTEES.

Mr. ALLEN, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Michael Hanson, praying to be allowed a pension, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for his relief; which was read, and passed to a second reading. The report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. SEBASTIAN, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill from the House of Representatives, to provide for the extinguishment of the title of the Chippewa Indians to the lands owned and claimed by them in the Territory of Minnesota and State of Wisconsin, and for their domestication and civilization, reported it back without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the memorials of Overton Love and John Guest, of the Chickasaw nation, praying remuneration for property taken by white persons within the jurisdiction of that Territory, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for their relief; which was read, and passed to a second reading. The report was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a petition of the Lutheran Synod of Missouri, Ohio, and other States, praying that a grant of land may be made to the head of every family of Chippewa Indians residing in Michigan, and an appropriation for the support of schools among said Indians, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, on the ground that the prayer of the petition will be attained in the contemplated treaty with the Chippewa Indians; which was agreed to.

CHARLES D. ARFWEDSON.

On the motion of Mr. CLAYTON, the bill in favor of Charles D. Arfwedson was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to direct the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Charles D. Arfwedson, late consul of the United States at Stockholm, $1,681 25, in full for the balance of compensation due him as acting chargé d'affaires of the United States near the court of Sweden, from the 24th of July, 1849, to the 22d of April, 1850.

Upon the recall of Mr. Ellsworth, late chargé d'affaires of the United States to Sweden, he was directed by the Department of State to place the legation in the hands of the United States consul at Stockholm. In compliance with that direction Mr. Ellsworth transferred the legation to Mr. Arfwedson, on the 24th of July, 1849. From that time until April 22, 1850, when Mr. Schroeder entered upon the functions of the office, Mr. Arfwedson, in conformity with repeated instructions from the Department, corresponded with the Swedish Government and his own, upon diplomatic subjects of a delicate nature, and in a manner entirely satisfactory to his Government, and his services during that period were of great value to the interests of his own Government.

He acted as chargé d'affaires for a period of eight months and twenty-nine days; for which his compensation, at the usual rate of $4,500 per annum, would amount to the sum of $3,362 50. In the general civil and diplomatic appropriation act of August 31, 1852, provision was made for the payment of half that sum, leaving $1,681 25 still due, for which he now appeals to Congress.

When this application was before the committee during the last Congress, it was believed that the consul fees, together with the amount then allowed, would be equivalent to the full compensation of a chargé, and hence the whole was not then allowed. But it now appears, from a certificate of the memorialist, that the whole amount of consular fees received by him from the 1st of April, 1849, to the 1st of April, 1850, was but $89 75—a sum believed to be barely adequate to cover the expenses of the consular office itself.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read a third time, and passed.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. HAMLIN. I learn that what I said yesterday in the Senate, in relation to the Superintendent of Public Printing, was misapprehended. I think by several Senators, and I ask the indulgence of the Senate to say a word as to how, precisely, I meant to be understood. It had been stated in the Senate, by several Senators, that the Patent Office report had been referred to the Superintendent of Public Printing, and that, under the law, he had already decided to which printer it belonged. I so stated; I think the Senator from California so stated; and I think others so stated. When I made the remark that if any action of the Senate should be had it was the understanding of the Superintendent of Public Printing, that it would be his duty to act in accordance with the law, I meant to say only that such had been his decision. I did not mean to be understood as having any conference—as I had not—with him, in relation to the particular subject which was then before the Senate. But whilst I was a member of the Committee on Printing, I knew that he had carefully examined the subject, and after mature deliberation had come to the conclusion that such was the law. What I meant to say was simply that, acting under the law, in his judgment, and under his oath of office, such must necessarily be the direction which he would give it.

Mr. GWIN. I did not yesterday state that he so decided.

Mr. HAMLIN. I stated so.

Mr. GWIN. I asserted the fact that the Patent Office report had gone from his hands. I did not know what his decision was. I took it for granted it had gone there according to law. I know nothing of his action at all, except what I heard from Senators.

DEFICIENCY BILL.

A message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McKEAN, Chief Clerk, announcing that they had insisted on their amendments, disagreed to by the Senate, to the Senate amendments to the bill of the House to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1854; had adhered to their disagreement to certain amendments of the Senate; had agreed to a committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses; and had appointed Mr. PHELPS, Mr. CHANDLER, and Mr. LETCHER, managers on their part.

ADJOURNMENT SINE DIE.

On motion by Mr. GWIN, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of the following resolution submitted by him yesterday:

Resolved, (the House concurring,) That the President of the Senate, and the Speaker of the House of Representatives, adjourn their respective Houses sine die on Monday, the 3d of July next, at twelve o'clock, m.

Mr. GWIN. I will state very briefly my reason for offering this resolution. It is my opinion that we can dispose of all the business that is now before the Senate and the other House, which is required to be acted upon during this session, by the time mentioned in the resolution. So far as the Senate is concerned, I believe there are but two questions which will lead to any lengthened debate. Those are the Pacific railroad bill and the homestead bill. Those two questions will take several days in the discussion of each. Following them will be the appropriation bills. It seems to me that if we fix a day of adjournment now, the two Houses will go to work in earnest, and we shall dispatch the business by the time fixed. As a member of this body, I am anxious to bring the session to a close at as early a day as possible. No two Senators, I suppose, have more business before Congress than my colleague and myself; but I am clearly of opinion that the interests of the country can be properly taken care of by fixing the day of adjournment proposed in my resolution, if the two Houses will apply themselves assiduously to their duties. I hope, therefore, the resolution will meet the approbation of the Senate.

Mr. BELL. I would inquire of the Senator from California, if he has any information which satisfies him that there will be no bill making appropriations for the improvement of rivers and harbors during this session of Congress?

Mr. GWIN. When I spoke of the appropriation bills, I presumed that that bill would be one of them, though I have no knowledge of the fact. I said that the important measures to be disposed of were the Pacific railroad bill, the homestead bill, and the appropriation bills. I do not know whether the river and harbor bill will be one of the appropriation bills or not. I do not know whether it has been reported or not. I meant, however, to include all appropriation bills.

Mr. DAWSON. I was going to propose, by way of amendment, in connection with this matter, that we adjourn on the first Monday in July until the second Monday in October. That would be the better plan. By doing so, we should avoid the pressure of the heat here during the months of July and August, and would come back in the pleasant months of October and November, and transact the public business. I think we should do it more satisfactorily in that time than we can by hurrying matters now. I therefore propose that we amend the resolution by adding the words "from the first Monday in July until the second Monday in October."

Mr. EVANS. Say the third Monday in October. Our elections in South Carolina come off on the second Monday.

Mr. DAWSON. I will say the third Monday in October, if it be more acceptable. It would be more convenient for us all; for we discover that it is almost impossible on a hot day to keep this body together, and no great measure can be discussed thoroughly and a vote upon it fairly had.

Many of our members are old and distinguished statesmen of the United States, and it is wrong to oppress them during these hot months. [Laughter.] The younger men of us can stand it pretty well; but I think it is due to the interests of the country, and due to our own health, that we should pursue the course I have suggested. I have conversed with a great many Senators upon the subject. All seem exceedingly to desire it. They think it will best subserve the interests of the country; and they have come to the conclusion, that the plan that I have suggested in their behalf, and my own, would be the better one. I therefore hope the Senator from California will accept my proposition, and that we may agree unanimously to the resolution as amended. It would suit the convenience of nine tenths of both branches of Congress.

Mr. GWIN. My object is to bring about an adjournment on the first Monday in July. The distance which the members from California are from home is well known; and it is important that we should be at home at as early a period as possible. I am very willing, if it is agreeable to the Senate, to accept the amendment of the Senator from Georgia, to adjourn from the first Monday in July to the third Monday in October. That would give us some time to be at home.

Mr. CLAYTON. Like the young Senator from Georgia, I join with the other young members of the Senate, in generously tendering this amendment for the benefit of the older ones. [Laughter.] I think we shall gain by adjourning through the hot weather, until it shall become so pleasant that we can come here and sit for a proper length of time, in the transaction of the public business. This is not a new idea, sir. Congress has made various attempts similar to what is now proposed.

Many years ago, it was so apparent to gentlemen here, that during the long sessions, in the heat of the year, members of Congress were not able to perform their duty as they wished to do, and that the short session was too short, that an attempt was made to equalize the sessions. In consequence of a difference between the Executive and Congress on that occasion, the bill for that purpose was vetoed; but there was a general and almost universal sentiment that the short session should, in some way, be made longer, and the long session in some way made shorter. This will effect that object. It will bring Congress together at a time of the year when it can act best; and I trust it will meet with general approbation. I am decidedly in favor of it, and hope that it will be adopted.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair will suggest whether it is not necessary, to effect the object, to propose a joint resolution.

Mr. TOOMBS. This is a joint resolution.

Mr. BRODHEAD. If we adjourn on the day indicated by the Senator from California, the first Monday of July, I take it for granted, we shall consider no other than the appropriation bills, and that the homestead bill and the Pacific railroad bill, will, of course, go over. I am willing that they should go over, not only until October, but that they should be postponed indefinitely. I take it for granted, in view of the condition of business in the House of Representatives, that that body will have quite enough to do, and so shall we, to properly consider the several appropriation bills.

If we are to consider, during this session, the Pacific railroad bill, we had better consider it in October, because then we shall have the reports of the different surveying parties fully before us. That might be an additional reason for adjourning to meet again in October. I confess I, for one, would like to avoid, if I could, the necessity of remaining here during the months of July and August; but I am quite convinced that if we consider all the measures indicated by my friend from California we must, of necessity, remain here at any rate until the first of September. For several years past we have not been able to adjourn until August.

Mr. GWIN. I differ entirely from the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania. He is an opponent of these two great measures, and I have no doubt he goes for an adjournment, to put them off. I entertain a different opinion from him. I believe they both can be considered by the time I have indicated. I have no doubt about that, if we fix the day of adjournment. But I am not going to be drawn into an argument. I think we ought to adjourn by that time. The oldest members of this body know the fact, that legislation done in the summer months is of a most imperfect character. I hope the resolution will be adopted.

The PRESIDENT. The resolution, as proposed to be amended, will be read.

It was read, as follows:

Resolved, (the House concurring,) That the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives adjourn their respective Houses on the first Monday in July until the third Monday in October next.

Mr. PETTIT. I am as desirous to terminate this session of Congress as any Senator can be. My action here has shown it. The Senate has never been without a quorum on my account. I have not spent a day absent from here since the session commenced. If it can be shown that the proper and legitimate business of the country can be done by the first Monday of July, I shall be willing to adjourn. But what are the probabilities? You have before you an amount of business twice as large as all that we have accomplished so far. You have before you the veto message of the President of the United States upon the indigent insane bill, which we seem to be very loth to get at. That will necessarily occupy considerable time in its discussion. You have the Pacific railroad bill, which will occupy more time than remains from this until the 3d day of July in its discussion in the two Houses. The Senator from California shakes his head; but when he hears the bill discussed, he will find it so. You have the homestead bill—in my judgment a very important matter—not only to be discussed, but to be disposed of. You have various other bills. It was anticipated at the opening of this session that the whole tariff policy of the country would undergo a revision at this session. It is so expected by some Senators yet. I know not how the committee on that branch of the public service is getting along. I do not pretend to know. I am waiting their action to know their report and recommendation. I understand it is yet to come up to be acted upon. There is an immense amount of legitimate public business, therefore, not to say anything about the private business on your Calendar, and it is every day becoming accumulated and increased.

You propose now in a day or two to adjourn over for the purpose of renovating the Hall, taking up the carpets, and putting down matting; and, to my judgment, there will be no business of any consequence transacted until next Monday week, in the Senate or House. To-day and to-morrow may be dwindled away as though in session, but really little or no business will be done. You will then be advanced into June sometime before you are ready to commence business in earnest again. You will have less than a month to transact all this business in; and what will be the result? We leave the country with business merely blocked out, and not completed; not an expression of their representation in the two Houses upon the various questions of public importance will be had. To my judgment, this question ought to be postponed until we shall have had this renovation done—everybody understands it is to be done—and have come back again a little renovated. I expect to stay here myself. I understand others are going away. Some have already started. We shall then better be able to judge how soon we can get through with the public business. If it can be done in a day, I say again I shall be glad to see it so disposed of; but all experience shows us that it cannot be so done. It may be the convenience of Senators—no less, perhaps, mine than others—to go home, and be in our respective States for a while; but, sir, I am not disposed to quit or abandon a trust confided to me here, however short it may be, or abandon the faithful fulfillment or performance of it during the time that it may last, with the hope, or even with the certainty, that its abandonment here would secure a perpetuity or continuance of that position. I think the public service requires that we should not take this precipitate step now; and I therefore move to postpone the further consideration of the resolution until next Monday week.

Mr. GWIN. I have but a few words to say in reply to the Senator from Indiana. In regard to the dispatch of the public business, it is well known that four years ago, a question similar to one which has been discussed this session in both branches of Congress, was under discussion for months; and it was finally decided about the 9th day of September. It occupied the whole attention of Congress up to that period; and in three weeks following that, we dispatched the public business, adjourned, and went home. Now, we have got through a similar question, which absorbed the whole time of Congress during its discussion, and it has passed at an earlier period than the other was disposed of four years ago; and I propose to give a sufficient time for a discussion of the questions that it is necessary for us to act upon. We know the homestead bill has been discussed here for years past; and it has been finally acted upon by one House. We know that the Pacific railroad bill was last session discussed elaborately in this body, and was very near passing then. These questions are all before us and ready for our action; and if we will apply ourselves to business assiduously, I have not a solitary doubt that we can dispatch every one of those measures in which the country is deeply interested before the day I indicate.

But the Senator seems to have forgotten the fact that, by the proposition of the Senator from Georgia, we shall have a considerable time before the meeting of the next session of Congress to dispatch the business that may go over the 3d of July. And, Mr. President, it is well known that, according to the rules of the two Houses of Congress, what we do not act upon now comes up in order at the next session, as if we had not adjourned at all; so that we have continuously before us from this to the 3d of March, with a short interval of time, to dispatch the public business which is before the two Houses of Congress; and as it is the experience of members of this body, and of the other House, that in the midst of the summer months the discharge of business is very onerous and oppressive, if not dangerous to the health, it seems to me we shall be economizing the public time, and dispatching the public business by coming to a determination at once as to when we shall adjourn. I oppose the motion to postpone; and hope we shall have a vote now.

Mr. PRATT. I do not claim to belong to that senior class of Senators referred to by my friend from Georgia; nor do I claim, therefore, the necessity of an adjournment during the hot weather on my own account; but I differ entirely from my friend from Indiana [Mr. PETTIT] in supposing it would be injurious to determine now, provided we are to determine at all, upon a recess. My experience has been that, when we know we are to adjourn at a particular day, every one will set to work to get passed those measures which, in his judgment, are most important to the country. It is palpable to us all, from our experience hitherto, that we shall get through a greater portion of business by having some day fixed, than we shall if no day is fixed. Witness the short sessions of Congress. It is known to you that then very much fewer days are lost in idle discussion, very much fewer days are lost in the discussion of questions not of great national importance than are lost during the long sessions.

Mr. President, there are many measures of deep interest to be acted upon now. Among them is the homestead bill; and my object in rising is to give notice to the Senate, and that it may go to the country, too, that my honorable friend from Georgia has prepared an amendment to that bill which will probably meet the sanction of the Senate, as I am sure it will meet with the sanction of the country, if any homestead bill is to be passed at all. By his amendment he proposes to give one hundred and sixty acres of the public lands to every free white male citizen of the United States above the age of twenty-one years. That is in lieu of the homestead bill which is now pending. It is one of equality. It is one of justice. It is one to which no man on earth can object on constitutional grounds, because it distributes to the people of the country the lands which belong to them. My principal object in rising was to give that notice to the Senate.

Mr. DAWSON. I beg to say to my friend that I had intended to add the widows. [Laughter.]

Mr. PRATT. I had some objections to widows. [Laughter.] However, I hope the vote will be taken at once on this resolution. Its postponement to Monday week will only result in discussion then on a further postponement, or, if it is the opinion of the Senate that we ought to have a recess, we should decide now when that recess is to take place.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Anxious as I am for an early adjournment, I cannot vote to fix the time at so short a distance off as would render it improbable that we could dispose, not only of the appropriation bills properly, but also of the homestead and the Pacific railroad bills. I think we ought to make our calculations with reference to getting through with those two great measures. The shortest time that will enable us to accomplish these two objects will suit my purpose; but I cannot fix so short a time as the 3d of July.

I will also remark that it has been my purpose, and I will be ready by to-morrow or next day to bring forward a bill to fix the annual meetings of Congress on the first Monday of October, instead of the first Monday of December, as a permanent law of the land, in order to more nearly equalize the length of the two sessions, making the short session five months instead of three months, as it now is, and as a consequence, that will bring the vacation in the heat of summer.

Mr. CLAYTON. Does the Senator recollect that, some years ago, a proposition somewhat similar was brought forward, and that President Jackson vetoed it on the ground which the honorable Senator has stated? I make the suggestion to the Senator, that he may look to the act of that day.

Mr. DOUGLAS. We may omit that question now. I thought, as we were now speaking of a definite adjournment, I would give notice that I intended to bring forward a general law upon that subject. In reference to the present adjournment, I hope that we will either give this resolution the go by for the present, or else fix a time which we will be sure will give us a sufficient opportunity for passing the great measures to which I have alluded.

Mr. TOOMBS. I am much in favor of an early day for our adjournment, and unless we appoint a day certain, we shall make but small progress in the public business during the summer. I do not like the proposition to take a recess until October, and still less the proposition of the Senator from Illinois to lengthen the short session, unless his proposed bill will also limit the long session. The length of our sessions is becoming a great evil to persons in the public service. The doors of Congress are fast becoming like (Virgil, I think, describes) the gates of hell—forever open. If we could fix the duration of both sessions of Congress within reasonable limits, we should have sufficient pleasant weather in which to transact the necessary public business. We do the business of the country, sir, as well during the short session as the long session. From my experience here, I think it is rather better done at the short session. I am satisfied that four months would be sufficient to enable us to do the business at each session, and that would be a great relief to those who have anything to do when they are at home. As to meeting again in October, however, I think that would be too soon. If we take a recess at all, we ought to have some time to attend to our business at home. Coming here again in October, I think, would not suit many of us. I am disposed to fix the earliest day possible for the adjournment, and if I cannot get the first Monday in July, I will take the third Monday in July or the first Monday in August. That would give us ample time; but when we adjourn I want to adjourn to the time fixed by law—the first Monday in December.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I shall favor the motion made by the Senator from California, but I suggest to him that he say the second Monday in July. That will give us a full month for the transaction of business. The criticism made by the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. PETTIT,] I think is correct; with the resolution as it stands, there will be something less than a month left to us. The Senator from California says he is willing to make his resolution read "the third Monday of July." That is ample time for us—there is no question of it—to get through with the whole business. It is ample time for us to consider the homestead bill, for the simple reason that, having passed the House of Representatives, it is now in this body; and in this body we have, and always shall have, more leisure, from the organization of the body, than they have in the House, to consider such a measure. If the House can get through with the appropriation bills, we can get through with the homestead bill also. The appropriation bills will not be here until the last moment; so that we shall have plenty of leisure time between now and the third Monday in July. But for an evidence of our ability to get through with our business, and of a fact which is familiar here without evidence—that is, that when a day is fixed we always work up to that day, and that we have worked up to it successfully heretofore—we have but to refer to the periods of adjournment of preceding Congresses.

In 1838, which was the Twenty-Fifth Congress, they adjourned on the 9th of July. In 1840, which was the Twenty-Sixth Congress, they adjourned on the 21st of July; and all the business was done in those years of the same character which we are required to do this year. We are now without any great absorbing, leading, national question that is to consume much time in debate. In 1842, the Twenty-Seventh Congress, they adjourned on the 31st of August. The cause of that is well known. The bank questions were up then, during Mr. Tyler's Administration; and that was the cause of that extraordinary long session lasting until the 31st of August. The tariff of 1842 was passed, also; and that aided in keeping Congress in session till so late a period. In 1844, the Twenty-Eighth Congress, they adjourned on the 17th of June—absolutely on the 17th of June! We propose now to give the additional time until the third Monday in July, if gentlemen do not prefer a shorter period. In 1846, the Twentieth-Ninth Congress, they adjourned on the 10th of August. In 1848, the Thirtieth Congress, they adjourned on the 14th of August. In 1850, the Thirty-First Congress, which was the compromise Congress, they were kept here until the 30th of September. The cause of that is well known. The compromise question consumed all the time, occupied the minds of all, and kept us here until the 30th of September. The votes upon the compromise were not taken until the month of September. The last Congress, in 1852, sat here until the 31st of August. That was an unusually long time. There was no particular necessity for that extraordinary delay. It arose simply because the time was not fixed at an earlier period. They might just as well have adjourned a month or two months sooner, as to have delayed it to the length of time they did.

Now, if it be a pleasure to stay here through the dog-days, let it be so voted; let us stay. But the proposition made by the Senator from California concedes even to those who desire to stay here to the 31st of August, if necessary, all the time they want. There will be a delay of a very short time because we shall, under that resolution, commence again on the third Monday of October, and run on until the first Monday in December, when the regular session commences. Some may make an objection to one session being thus brought to run into another. The period of the year during which the resolution proposes we shall sit is better for the health of those who are here, as well as for the business of the country, than the months of July and August; and as to one session running into another, it is no objection. That is practically the case now; for there is a joint rule of the two Houses which declares that the business which is not disposed of at the long session, shall stand over to the short session, and take the position on the Calendar of the second session which it had on the first.

I would, sir, support the very shortest time of adjournment that could be given in which we could do the public business, even if we did not take a recess to meet again in October; but I am satisfied to commence again in October, and certainly that with sitting here to the third Monday in July will be ample time to give to the labors of this session. I hope sincerely that the third Monday in July may be adopted as the day of adjournment, as it seems to me to be far the most appropriate.

Mr. BAYARD. There necessarily must always be a diversity of opinion among Senators on the question of adjournment, arising both out of the matter of personal convenience, and from other causes. I presume that the only reason on which we could justify ourselves, and which I think does amply justify us, is, that during the hot months of our climate man is incapacitated for that attention to business which otherwise he could bestow upon it. The languor of the body necessarily produces indisposition to mental as well as physical labor. That being the case, it would seem to me that the rule of adjournment ought to be to adjourn from that period when the intensely hot weather commences until that period when it becomes sufficiently cool and agreeable for the purpose of our duties here without being oppressed by the heat of the weather. I should think we ought to look to that as the rule for a recess, if we are to have one; and to take, say the third Monday in June, by which time your weather here always becomes very warm. By that time you can dispose of those measures, and of those only, that ought to be acted upon immediately, such as the deficiency bill, and measures of that class. We might then adjourn from that time until the last Monday in September, or to the first Monday in October. Your weather then, throughout this climate, is always perfectly consistent with any species of exertion, mental or corporeal; and I think if the ground of the recess is the condition of the weather and climate during the hot months, you can justify the adjournment on no other principle than adjourning over that period during which the climate incapacitates you from mental exertion.

I therefore think, if a recess is to be taken—personally, to me the period would be an inconvenient one; but I endeavor to discard that entirely from my consideration—you should adjourn from the third Monday in June, which is the 19th, to the last Monday in September, or the first Monday in October at the furthest. You then will have ample time to dispose, during the existing session, of all the great measures alluded to as matters requiring the discussion of the Senate. You will not be asked to discuss or dispose of them now, with, perhaps, the exception of the deficiency bill, which certainly ought to be disposed of, and the bill which has been vetoed by the President of the United States, with some other subordinate measures. You have a great many measures of importance; and, I am sorry to say, that the bill which is most important to the people of the country, seems to me to have escaped the attention of Senators altogether in looking at what their duties must be during the present and next session of Congress. I allude to the bill which proposes to reorganize the judicial system of the United States; one which certainly will involve differences of opinion; one which, though it will not give rise to excitement, and may not attract public attention to the extent which some other subjects do, is as vitally important to the people of the country as any or all the measures which so much press upon the attention of the Senate. It will take a long time, probably, in its discussion; but I think I afford ample time, and my object is to afford the recess during that period when the character of the climate incapacitates us from intellectual labor.

I hope, therefore, if the Senate determine to take a recess, it will be on the only ground on which it can be asked for, and that we shall take the earliest day after the hot weather terminates for the recommencement of our labors. The recess should commence earlier than July, for the weather is hot enough before that to justify it. That will give us ample time to dispose of all the measures which must be disposed of at once; and then by commencing again in the latter part of September, or the beginning of October, we shall have two months for the disposition of all the measures upon which we have to act during the present session.

Mr. BROWN. I am particularly opposed to the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. DAWSON,] and chiefly for the reason that it would be to me a matter of very serious personal inconvenience, coming as I do from the extreme South. I do not want to be sent home in July and August. It is much more pleasant to stay here.

Mr. PRATT. Go to the springs. Mr. BROWN. But, then, when shall I go home? You bring me back in October, which is the only safe season for me to go home, and which is the only time when I can stay at home, without personal inconvenience, to transact my private business. You bring me back to Congress at that time, so that I have no chance to go home at all. I am opposed to it on that ground.

Then, sir, I do not see the reason which prompts gentlemen to insist on this sort of adjournment over. To my mind it is very obvious that there are certain questions which ought to be discussed here in the warm months. We had a proposition up some time ago in reference to water-works for this city. I cannot imagine anything more delightful than to talk about water-works in July and August; and I think gentlemen who have been opposing that measure heretofore if they could be got into the discussion of it on one of those hot days, when the thermometer is up to 95°, would receive the proposition much more kindly than they have done before. [Laughter.]

But, sir, I am opposed to the resolution itself. I have no idea that we can transact the public business by the time specified. All the appropriation bills are yet in the House of Representatives. The civil and diplomatic bill, the Army appropriation bill, and the Navy bill, are all yet in the House; not one of them has been sent here. Those bills will this year appropriate doubtless thirty millions of dollars, perhaps a larger sum. Shall we hurry the appropriation of that amount of money through here without any sort of consideration? Is it treating the public Treasury with justice to do so?

I know that during the short sessions you undertake to do little else than simply pass the appropriation bills. Those great measures which are discussed during the long session, such as the Nebraska bill, the Pacific railroad bill, the homestead bill, and other measures of that character, get no sort of consideration during the short session of Congress; and as long as you limit those sessions to three months, they never will get any consideration, because it takes the whole of that time to transact the necessary public business which is indispensable, and cannot by possibility be postponed.

Now, we have all the business of this session on our hands. I know of nothing that has been disposed of finally but the Nebraska bill. If we are to hurry the business over without any consideration, we may adjourn in July. If we are content to postpone those measures which have been partly discussed, and simply take up the appropriation bills and pass them, we can get through in the time proposed. But if we are to discuss the homestead bill, who does not know, that it will take more time, than that mentioned in the resolution, to discuss that single bill in the Senate? If you had the same rules here, as they have in the House of Representatives, if you could apply the previous question, you might cut off debate; but you cannot do it. The discussion of the homestead bill alone in this body, I have said, will occupy more time than is given us by the resolution. I know what will be the consequence of passing the resolution. All these measures will be passed by. Perhaps gentlemen will say it is as well they should be; but I think differently. Therefore I want to have plenty of time for discussion. But I am more particularly opposed to the amendment offered by my friend from Georgia, than I am to the original resolution. I am utterly opposed to an adjournment over to October. If we can get through in July, very well, let us go home and remain there, until the regular time for the meeting of Congress.

Mr. CLAYTON. Generally, sir, when a discussion has arisen on a resolution fixing the day of adjournment, it has lasted for a long period, and consumed a great deal of the valuable time of the Senate. I hope we shall not imitate the example which has heretofore been set us.

Sir, I do not intend to suggest any additional reasons for adopting the resolution of the Senator from California except this: I desire to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that even now, at this stage of the session, we are very frequently left without a quorum. Why is it? It is generally to be attributed to the weather. If we continue during the months of August and September, we shall be found in that situation much more frequently than we have been heretofore.

The mode now proposed is the only way in which you can do anything towards equalizing the sessions of Congress. The effort which was made in 1836 to equalize the sessions I find, on examination, to have been this: A bill passed both Houses of Congress to commence the sessions on the first Monday of November, and extend both sessions until the second Monday in May. The President's veto was founded on the ground rather that it was unconstitutional to fix the term of adjournment in that manner by legislative act. But when that veto came in, then it was competent for Congress to start a plan which I should have preferred rather than to have gone on as before. I refer to the plan suggested by the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. DOUGLAS,] which is to pass a bill directing the sessions of Congress to commence on the first Monday of November or October. I did not think, myself, the veto was sustainable, under the Constitution, at the time. But this difficulty, I remember, was suggested in opposition: that, instead of that equalizing the sessions of Congress, it extended the long session only a month longer; because, if we commenced on the first Monday in November, we should continue in session just as long as if we commenced on the first Monday of December. For that reason, although Congress was almost unanimous in the expression of its wish that the sessions should be equalized, no plan was adopted, and I suppose it would not adopt that plan now for the same reason. The only plan that can be adopted, and incur no constitutional objection, is this, which is nothing more nor less than to have a recess for a limited period. It requires the consent of both Houses, being an adjournment for more than three days; but it is, in its nature, like an adjournment over to Monday, which we frequently have.

There is one consideration which I wish to throw out, while we are about to act upon this question. I am willing to vote for this resolution, and anxious that it should be adopted; but I should like to see, accompanying it, some legislative act, declaring or enacting that there should be no compensation received by members of Congress during the recess. We ought not to receive it; we are not entitled to receive it; but it is something of a question, as you will find on looking into the matter, whether you might not found a claim to compensation, unless you change your law. We cannot do that by way of amendment to this resolution, because it can be done only by regular legislative act repealing a former act, and requiring the assent of the President. This resolution does not require the consent of the President at all. I throw this out for the consideration of gentlemen who take an interest in the matter.

I trust the resolution will be adopted, and that we shall then have the concurrent action of both Houses upon a bill, declaring or enacting that during the recess there shall be no compensation.

Mr. GWIN. I have a word to say in regard to the suggestion of the Senator from Arkansas; and it is this. If we take a recess at all, it is better to do it from the first Monday in July, which will give us a proper time to go home and return. I would adopt the suggestion to say second or third Monday in July, if this were a proposition for final adjournment; but this is merely for a recess. I hope the question will be taken.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. WELLER in the chair.) The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. GWIN. I accept that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Then the question is on the motion of the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. PETTIT,] to postpone the further consideration of the subject until Monday week next.

Mr. GWIN. On that motion I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and taken with the following result:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Douglas, Norris, Pettit, Rusk, Stuart, and Walker—7.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Allen, Atchison, Badger, Brodhead, Brown, Chase, Clay, Clayton, Dawson, Dodge of Wisconsin, Evans, Fessenden, Fish, Fitzpatrick, Foot, Geyer, Gillette, Gwin, Hamlin, Johnson, Jones of Iowa, Jones of Tennessee, Mallory, Mason, Pratt, Sebastian, Seward, Slidell, Sumner, Thompson of Kentucky, Toombs, Toucey, Wade, and Weller—34.

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. BROWN. I now move to strike out the latter clause of the resolution, which provides for a recess until October.

Mr. SEWARD asked for the yeas and nays on this amendment; and they were ordered, and being taken resulted—yeas 19, nays 24; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Brown, Chase, Dodge of Wisconsin, Douglas, Fessenden, Fish, Fitzpatrick, Hamlin, Mallory, Mason, Norris, Rusk, Seward, Shields, Stuart, Sumner, Toombs, and Weller—19.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Atchison, Badger, Bayard, Brodhead, Clay, Clayton, Dawson, Evans, Foot, Geyer, Gillette, Gwin, Johnson, Jones of Iowa, Jones of Tennessee, Pratt, Sebastian, Slidell, Thompson of Kentucky, Toucey, Wade, and Walker—24.

So the amendment was rejected.

The question then recurred on the original resolution as modified, as follows:

Resolved, (The House concurring,) That the President of the Senate, and the Speaker of the House of Representatives, adjourn their respective Houses on the first Monday in July, until the third Monday of October next.

Mr. BAYARD. I move to amend that by striking out the "third Monday of October," and inserting "first Monday of October."

Mr. STUART. If this matter is to be considered and determined to-day, it strikes me that we might as well have some little understanding about it. It seems that the object is to advance the convenience of Senators. I know not how it may be in the south and southwest, but I must say that a more inconvenient adjournment for gentlemen in the northwestern States could not be proposed. The elections in almost all those States take place on the first Tuesday in November. The election of members of the House of Representatives come off on that day; and many of those members, as a matter of course, will be candidates for reelection. Now, to bring those gentlemen back here on the first Monday of October, or at any other time in October, would be one of the most inconvenient things that could be done.

Now, sir, I submit that, as a general proposition, there has been as much injury done in undertaking to fix the time for the final adjournment of a legislative body, before there is a sufficient understanding of the condition of business to satisfy the body that it can be disposed of by the time fixed, as has been done in any other way. It is productive of more hasty and inconsiderate legislation perhaps than any other one thing. I have often heard it remarked that it is necessary to fix a time of adjournment and work up to it. I have found that work to consist in doing certain things very improperly and not doing certain other things at all.

I have thought it necessary to say this much in justification of myself. I shall vote against this proposition. I shall vote against fixing at this time any day for the adjournment of this session of Congress, merely for the reason that at least three fourths of the business which ought to be done by this Congress is untouched.

Mr. SHIELDS. I agree with the honorable Senator from Michigan, that this would be exceedingly inconvenient for us, and I think very disadvantageous to the public business. In reality, we have done very little practical business at this session, and all the great practical measures are yet to be taken up and considered. Take the Pacific railroad bill for instance. Take the homestead bill, a measure very important and interesting to those who are in favor of it, and one which, whether it be passed or rejected, ought to be acted on at this session. Then there is the message of the President, vetoing the bill granting land for the indigent insane. Some of us were very severely censured here because we wanted a little delay in relation to that message. Gentlemen said it was due to the President, due to the subject, and due to the country, that we should take up the message, and proceed to consider it immediately. My excellent and honorable friend from Delaware, [Mr. CLAYTON,] though he did not exactly censure me, took occasion to admonish me that that was the old way of proceeding. Now, how have we been acting in relation to this message? We have been taking it up occasionally, and, as they say in the other end of the Capitol, it has been dilly-dally shilly-shally ever since. My opinion is, that it is wrong now at this stage of the session of Congress to undertake to predetermine at what time it is proper to adjourn; and for this reason, we cannot possibly tell what the necessity or exigency of the public service in that time may be.

Mr. BADGER. This is only to take a recess for a few weeks; that is the whole amount of it.

Mr. SHIELDS. A recess for a few weeks?

Mr. BADGER. During the hot weather.

Mr. SHIELDS. I shall be willing to take a recess, when we get through the larger portion of the necessary business of the session. I have been waiting all this session to have taken up some bills in relation to the Army, which are essentially necessary. I have been also waiting to press forward the homestead bill, but we have been kept back upon that. I think now that a movement of this kind will effectuate nothing but this, that there will be no further business done at this session, and all the bills which I have mentioned, will be passed over until the end of the session, and then carried into the ensuing session.

Mr. RUSK. Mr. President, I should vote against the motion to adjourn on the first Monday in July, if it were a proposition by itself; but I think that would be infinitely better than this resolution as it now stands. In the first place, I regard the passing of the resolution in its present shape, as worse than nothing; for after the facts stated by the honorable Senator from Michigan, it is unreasonable to expect that the House will concur in the resolution to take this recess. I have seen once or twice such recesses on a smaller scale than the one now proposed, and they amounted to nothing, so far as the dispatch of business was concerned; so it will be in this case. When we come here again in October, very little will be done, but a great deal of time will be lost in getting to business.

Now, sir, I apprehend that if the business on our table be looked into, it will be found to be larger than it has been at any previous session of Congress; and this resolution allows but a very short time—until the first Monday in July—to accomplish it. There is, in fact, between this and that day, not more than sufficient time to do justice to the appropriation bills themselves in the two Houses of Congress. One fact is very notorious, that these appropriation bills, so far as we have any experience of them at this session of Congress, are more stoutly resisted than they have ever been before. Why, sir, this is the month of May, and the deficiency bill is not yet passed. A committee of conference is now out upon the subject of that bill. A great many of the appropriations contained in it are palpably necessary to be made, but still the bill is not passed. The whole time allowed, as I have said, is not more than sufficient to consider the appropriation bills.

There are a number of other very important bills. I shall not pretend to enumerate them all, but there are three before us of vast importance. One is the bill for the increase of the Army. Depredations are being committed daily by the Indians on our frontier, and they pass by unheeded. The War Department is called upon for the better defense of the frontier; but it has been unable to afford that defense, in consequence of the few troops at its disposal. Every mail brings me information of depredations committed on my constituents. We have a bill to increase the Army, which has been reported by the honorable Senator from Illinois, which has not yet been discussed, which has not been taken up, but which is very important for the public service.

Mr. CASS. Then there is the judiciary bill.

Mr. RUSK. The bill mentioned by the honorable Senator from Michigan is one of vast importance. Everybody admits that the judiciary system under which we are now laboring is wretchedly defective. It is partial in its operation, and does not answer the purpose intended by the Constitution. There is an important bill before us, which has been reported after great research, on that subject; and it will consume a great deal of time to consider it, as it ought to be considered, with deliberation and calmness. It is very necessary that it should be disposed of.

Then there is the homestead bill. Though I feel somewhat indifferent in regard to that, its friends consider it a matter of very great importance. I am inclined to think that it is. The subject will be before us until we do something; and the sooner we act judiciously and properly in regard to it, the better. In acting upon that bill, we should act with calmness and deliberation; and when we pass a bill upon the subject, it should be of proper character.

Again, here is the Pacific railroad bill, which I regard as a very important national measure. I know very well that it was not intended by the honorable mover of the resolution [Mr. GWIN] that it should operate injuriously upon that measure, or the one which I last mentioned. He is more anxious for one of them, the homestead bill, than I am; and is equally anxious as I am for the Pacific railroad bill. But my deliberate judgment is, that if this resolution be passed, and be agreed to by the House of Representatives, (which I do not apprehend will be the case,) the Pacific railroad bill, the judiciary bill, the homestead bill, and the bill for the increase of the Army, are dead.

Mr. SHIELDS. No doubt of it.

Mr. GWIN. I will not consume the time of the Senate in answering the arguments of the Senator from Texas, [Mr. RUSK], and the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. SHIELDS]. They have already been answered by the previous debate. But, sir, allusion has been made to the amount of business on our table. Allow me to say, that there it will remain until three weeks before the close of the session. I should like to know what we have done within the last three weeks? Nothing at all. There has been no legislation for three weeks past. Here we have had a bill of preeminent importance, so represented by Senators on this floor, to be acted upon at once, as a matter of courtesy to the President, and on account of the importance of the principles involved in it. I refer to the veto message. Now, have you, sir, ever seen as little desire to bring up that question, which was represented to be of such an important nature as to override every other question that we attempted to bring forward? Have you ever seen a question languish as that has in this body?

My experience here is very short indeed, but that experience teaches me that when we mature business in the committee, and bring it before the Senate, the members of those committees can present it in a few days as well as they can in a few weeks. Every measure that will be discussed before this Congress, if we should sit until November, has already been presented; except, perhaps, the river and harbor bill. There is not another question that can come up which has not already been reported upon. Every one of the questions which we are to consider can be discussed and acted upon, except one or two, in the last three weeks of the session, no matter when the end will be, in October, September, August, or July.

Now, Mr. President, so far as this House is concerned, what have we before us? We have no appropriation bills here. We have already passed three or four appropriation bills. The other House, so soon as the present special order is dispensed with—and the moment a day of adjournment is fixed that will be disposed of, for the question has been very much discussed—they will send us the appropriation bills. In the mean time we can act upon the Pacific railroad bill and the homestead bill. We shall have time enough to pass the immediate pressing legislation of the country. Then what can we do here, when we meet in October? We can take up the judiciary bill, and the other bills which have been alluded to, that are not of pressing necessity. I undertake to say, that there is no possibility of passing the bill to which the Senator from Illinois alluded, to increase the Army. It was distinctly understood, when the other bills introduced by that Senator in relation to the Army were passed, that the bill to which he has referred would not be acted upon during the session. The reason was, that there was a greater pressing necessity to have a retired list, and increase of compensation of the Army, than to have the other measure, and that we could not expect the whole of them at once.

Sir, I am as anxious as any person to discharge the business of the country. It is unnecessary for me to talk about my being here all the time. That is pretty generally known. I have not brought forward this resolution, on account of any desire which I have to postpone the public business, but because I want to dispatch it. I feel perfectly confident that before the first Monday of July we can act on every question which we shall act upon at all, if we remain until the last of August, except those measures which can be postponed, and should be postponed until October.

I hope the motion of the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] to strike out the third Monday of October, and insert the first Monday of October, will be voted down. The Senator from Michigan [Mr. STUART] talks about the elections for members of Congress coming off in November. Why, sir, in many of the States the elections take place in October. The elections take place in Ohio and Pennsylvania, and various other States during that month. But it is unnecessary for members to be at home when the elections take place. There is a necessity for being there in advance. I confess, so that they can make their arrangements for the election; but there is no other pressing necessity for their presence. I hope the resolution in its present form will pass.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. President, the resolution as it now stands, does not meet my approbation. I should prefer a resolution simply authorizing the two Houses to be adjourned at a given day, and I would fix that day now. I would fix it for the reasons which, I think, have been so well stated by the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. PRATT]; reasons which conform to my experience here for the last twelve years. When ever you fix a day of adjournment you will work up to that day. Such will be the fact now I have no doubt. But the Senate have refused to modify this resolution, and I shall vote for it in its present form, because I believe both the convenience of the Senate, and the substantial wants of the country will be as well and better provided for, if we adjourn soon, than if we continue an interminable session during the hot season here.

Senators have alluded to various subjects which are of importance to the country. I concede all the importance which they attribute to them; but, without any fixed time for an adjournment, who supposes those bills will receive action, either favorably or unfavorably, by Congress before the first of October? I do not; and I believe they will receive the action of Congress almost as early if we adjourn over to October, as they would if we were to remain here without adjourning. In my judgment, there will be very little difference in the time when you will act upon them. In my opinion, the time fixed in this resolution is amply sufficient to enable us to discuss and act upon all these measures which are of pressing importance. The length of time that will elapse between the time for adjournment as fixed in the resolution, and the time we are to meet again, will be short, and then those measures which remain unacted upon can be taken up and disposed of.

I will, for these reasons, give my vote for the resolution, though I would prefer it simply as a resolution of adjournment.

Mr. ADAMS. I shall vote against the proposed amendment of the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD], for the reason that I am in favor of the earliest adjournment. If the resolution had been voted upon as originally proposed, I should have voted for it. As an individual, I think the country would lose nothing by failing to get, at this or subsequent sessions, the measures which have been alluded to by Senators who have objected to the adjournment. There is one bill, however, which I should like to see acted upon at this session, and if we should be so fortunate as to get it reported back from the Committee on Public Lands, I presume we could pass it any morning. I refer to the graduation bill, which is much more important to the country than the homestead bill.

As to the homestead bill and the Pacific railroad bill, they will do just as well at the next session as at this; and the country will be better off in my opinion, particularly in regard to the homestead bill, if they should never be acted upon. Sir, that bill is the first step towards agrarianism, towards dividing out the property of the rich among the poor; and if it should never be acted upon by this Congress, the country would sustain no loss by it.

But, sir, as the Senate has refused to adjourn over from the time fixed in the resolution until the next regular meeting, I shall vote for the resolution as it now stands. If we are to have a recess of some three months, and three months only, it occurs to me that the better time to take it is during the hot season of the year. That the fall season will be a better time for the performance of labor than the summer, it seems to me none can doubt. I will therefore vote for the resolution.

Mr. BADGER. I wish merely to say that my views upon this resolution and upon the amendment that is pending, will be discovered as soon as the yeas and nays are called. [Laughter.]

The amendment of Mr. BAYARD was rejected.

The question recurred on the resolution as modified.

Mr. SEWARD called for the yeas and nays, which were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 26, nays 17; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Allen, Atchison, Badger, Bayard, Brodhead, Clay, Clayton, Dawson, Evans, Fessenden, Geyer, Gwin, Hamlin, Johnson, Jones of Iowa, Jones of Tennessee, Mallory, Pratt, Sebastian, Slidell, Sumner, Thompson of Kentucky, Toombs, Wade, and Weller—26.

NAYS—Messrs. Brown, Cass, Chase, Douglas, Fitzpatrick, Foot, Gillette, Hunter, Mason, Norris, Pettit, Rusk, Seward, Shields, Stuart, Toucey, and Walker—17.

So the resolution was adopted, as follows:

Resolved, (the House concurring,) That the President of the Senate, and the Speaker of the House of Representatives, adjourn their respective Houses on the first Monday in July, until the third Monday of October next.

Ordered, That the Secretary request the concurrence of the House of Representatives therein.

SCHOOL SECTIONS IN ALABAMA.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President, as we are likely to adjourn very soon, I apprehend that local measures will all be given the go-by at this session, unless we can act upon them very soon. I hope, therefore, the Senate will indulge me in taking up the House bill "to authorize the selection of school districts, in lieu of the sixteenth sections, within the twelve mile square reservation, State of Alabama," which has been reported without amendment from the Committee on Public Lands, and which, I presume, will incur no opposition whatever.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the bill as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CLAY. I will state to the Senate, that this was an Indian reservation, and hence the people within those twelve miles square were excluded from the benefits of that portion of the act, admitting the State of Alabama into the Union, which granted the sixteenth sections to the inhabitants of each township, for the benefit of common schools.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read a third time, and passed.

THE SENATE DEBATES.

Mr. JOHNSON. I wish to give notice that I shall to-morrow call up, and ask the Senate to consider, the motion to reconsider the resolution in regard to the reporting of the debates. It is important to that branch of the service that the matter should be disposed of as quickly as possible, so that the reporter and printer of the debates may know what is to be done, in order that he may provide means to carry out the will of the Senate. I will call up the motion to reconsider to-morrow.

MEETINGS OF CONGRESS.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I desire to give notice that I will to-morrow bring in the bill to which I have referred, to fix the annual meeting of Congress hereafter on the first Monday in October.

WILLIAM BUTLER.

Mr. JONES, of Iowa. I ask leave to withdraw from the table of the Senate the adverse report of the Committee on Pensions in the case of William Butler. He believes he has sufficient testimony to authorize the allowance of the claim at the Pension Bureau, and the Commissioner of Pensions thinks it is probable he has. The object is to refer the matter to the Commissioner of Pensions.

There being no objection, it was so ordered.

INDIGENT INSANE BILL VETO.

On the motion of Mr. WALKER, the Senate resumed the reconsideration of the bill making a grant of land to the several States of the Union for the benefit of indigent insane persons, which had been returned by the President of the United States, with his objections.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, [Mr. WELLER.] The question is, "Shall the bill pass, the President's objections to the contrary notwithstanding?" The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary commenced the call, and Mr. ADAMS answered "nay."

Mr. CASS. I wish to make a short speech before the vote is taken.

Several SENATORS. It is too late, a Senator has voted.

Mr. ADAMS. I withdraw my vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Michigan cannot proceed, except by unanimous consent. The Senator from Mississippi has answered—

Mr. ADAMS. I withdraw my vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the calling of the roll will not be proceeded with, and will be considered as not having been commenced.

Several SENATORS. No objection.

Mr. CASS. I did not know this question would come up to-day. I thought there were other matters to be called up.

Mr. WALKER. The Senate having fixed a day for us to get through business, I mean, whenever I can get an opportunity, to make motions to take up the business which we have talked about.

Mr. CASS. I hope this subject will be postponed. We expect to adjourn over to-morrow. Besides, I understood the honorable Senator from California [Mr. GWIN] had a bill which he wished us to consider to-day or to-morrow. Therefore, I have not come prepared to speak to-day on this question.

Mr. BADGER. Then I move to postpone the further consideration of this subject until to-morrow.

Mr. CASS. The vote cannot be taken to-day. Half a dozen gentlemen wish to speak.

Mr. GWIN. Some one else can go on to-day. Perhaps the Senator from Virginia [Mr. HUNTER] is ready.

Mr. BADGER. Does the Senator from Virginia wish to go on to-day?

Mr. HUNTER. I do not wish to go on now. I have been engaged during the day in the conference on the deficiency bill. But I would go on now rather than have the vote taken immediately.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Michigan is entitled to the floor.

Mr. CASS. I will move an adjournment, if that be the wish of the Senate.

["No!" "No!"]

Mr. HUNTER. I hope the Senate will not adjourn now. We shall be able to receive the report of the committee of conference on the deficiency bill very soon.

Mr. CASS. Then I move to postpone the further consideration of this subject until Monday next.

Mr. HUNTER. I will suggest to the Senator from Michigan, that if he does not care to speak to-morrow I will go on.

Mr. CASS. Very well. Then I move to postpone the further consideration of this bill until to-morrow.

Mr. WALKER. I move to amend the motion by adding, "and that it be the special order for half past twelve o'clock, p. m."

Mr. MALLORY. I gave notice a short time since that one of the members of the Committee on Naval Affairs had some amendments to propose to the bill for the organization of the Navy; and for that reason, I did not call up the bill this morning. I notified the Senate, however, that I should ask the Senate to give me the morning hour to-morrow for the consideration of that bill. I hope, therefore, the Senator from Wisconsin will modify his proposition so as to say one o'clock, instead of half past twelve.

Mr. WALKER. Then I move to amend the motion to postpone the pending bill, by saying that it shall be the special order for to-morrow at one o'clock.

The amendment was adopted; and the motion as amended was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS—THE GENERAL ARM-STRONG CASE.

Mr. SLIDELL. The Senate appear to be embarrassed as to what business to consider. I move that they proceed to the consideration of the bill, for the relief of the claimants of the private armed brig General Armstrong. I think it will not take long.

Mr. JOHNSON. I wish to ask whether one o'clock to-morrow has been assigned for the consideration of the veto message.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Yes, sir.

Mr. JOHNSON. I give notice, that I shall resist, with all the power I can, its being taken up, until we dispose of the business, which belongs emphatically to the Senate, and that is our reporting.

Mr. SUMNER. We can take that up at half past twelve, and the other at one o'clock.

Mr. BADGER. I think it is useless to take up the bill referred to by the honorable Senator from Louisiana at this period of the day. It must lead to a long discussion. It is a contested and complicated case; and surely there can be no idea of disposing of it to-day, when it is now two o'clock.

Mr. SLIDELL. The objection of the honorable Senator from North Carolina would amount to an indefinite postponement of the bill.

Mr. BADGER. Not at all; it can be taken up to-morrow morning.

Mr. SLIDELL. It will be impossible to obtain any one day during the session for the discussion of the bill. I have found, from experience, that it is idle to attempt to do anything on Friday, for there is seldom a quorum of the Senate here on that day. I do not think that the bill involves any very difficult or grave questions; and I believe we can dispose of it to-day; we can commence it at any rate.

Mr. GWIN. I will not object to taking up the bill proposed to be taken up by the Senator from Louisiana, provided I can make an arrangement which I wish to make with that Senator. I expect every moment that we shall receive the report of the committee of conference on the deficiency bill; and if the Senator from Louisiana will agree that this bill shall be laid aside when that report comes in, I shall have no objection to taking it up.

Mr. SLIDELL. I will agree to lay it aside for that purpose.

Mr. TOOMBS. I would suggest that if we are to do anything, we had better go on and do the business of the country. If so, I do not know of any bill which we could better afford to pass over than the one which my friend from Louisiana has moved to take up. It has been before Congress for twenty or twenty-five years. I believe we once referred the case to the French Government for regular arbitration, and they decided against us. I think, therefore, that bill might very well afford to lie over until we do some of the business of the country. I do not think it is exactly in such an attitude as to be pressed on the Senate under existing circumstances.

Mr. SLIDELL. I will say to my friend from Georgia that it is because this claim has remained undisposed of for twenty or twenty-five years, that it should be disposed of now.

Mr. TOOMBS. I did not say it had been undisposed of. I think it has been disposed of very effectually.

Mr. SLIDELL. Without the consent of the claimants, and in fact, against their protestations, this claim was referred to the arbitrament of Louis Napoleon. It presents itself here under very peculiar circumstances—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on taking up the bill.

Mr. SLIDELL. I know that, sir; but I am responding to my friend from Georgia. I understand, however, that the committee of conference are ready to make their report on the deficiency bill, and, considering this question to be now before the Senate for consideration, I will consent to lay it aside temporarily.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana withdraw the motion to take up the bill?

Mr. SLIDELL. I do not; but I am willing to let it lay aside for the present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That motion must be disposed of before the report of the committee can be received.

Mr. SLIDELL. I suppose we can pass over it informally, by unanimous consent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Certainly; if there be no objection, the report of the committee of conference will be received.

DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. HUNTER submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill "to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1854," having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses, as follows:

That the Senate do concur in the amendments of the House to the amendments of the Senate numbered 4, 10, 38, 39, 43, and 46.

That the Senate concur with the amendments of the House, except the first amendment to the 50th amendment of the Senate, with which the House concurs with an amendment, by striking out the word "four" in line eleven, and in lieu thereof inserting "three."

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 11, 12, 14, 20, 25, 26, 40, 42, 48, 52, and 53.

That the House concur in the Senate amendments numbered 36 and 37.

That the House concur in the Senate amendment numbered 24, with the following amendment: Strike out all after the word "for," in the first line, to and including the word "him," in the second line, and insert "deficiencies for the railroad surveys."

That the House concur in the Senate amendment No. 41, with the following amendment: Strike out all after the word "dollars," in line three, and insert, "Provided, That there be allowed to the legal representatives of Robert Greenhow such sum, in addition to that received by him, as, together, will make his salary for the time he was employed as assistant law agent equal to that authorized to be paid to the land commissioners by the act of March 3, 1853, making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1854."

And that the House concur in the amendment of the Senate No. 51, with the following amendment: Strike out all after the word "him," in the fifth line thereof.

R. M. T. HUNTER,

JAMES C. JONES,

WM. M. GWIN,

Managers on the part of the Senate.

JOHN S. PHELPS,

J. LETCHER,

JOS. R. CHANDLER,

Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. HUNTER. I think I can state, in a very few words, what has been the result of the conference. The Senate recede from most of the amendments to which the House disagreed. We recede from the amendment in relation to the water-works, and from the amendment in relation to the custom-houses and marine hospitals. We recede from the amendment in relation to the bridge over the Potomac river. The House recede from their disagreement to the amendment in relation to the Pacific railroad surveys, and agree to that amendment making an appropriation of $40,000 to cover those deficiencies, of which $25,000 are for the Stevens, and $15,000 for the Whipple expedition. The House recede from their disagreement to the amendment in relation to the compensation of Robert Greenhow, with an amendment, which has been read. The House also recede from their disagreement to the amendment in regard to the printing, with an amendment. The committee of conference agree to the first portion of that amendment, requiring the printing of each House to be done by its own printer, but strike out the part in relation to the Executive printing. That, I believe, is about the result of the committee of conference.

Mr. WALKER. I should like to ascertain, if I can, the condition of the amendment in relation to Robert Greenhow.

Mr. HUNTER. I ask the Secretary to read that portion of the report of the committee on conference.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

"That the House concur in Senate's amendment forty-one, with the following amendment: strike out all after the word 'dollars,' in line three, and insert, 'Provided, that there be allowed to the legal representatives of Robert Greenhow, such sum in addition to that received by them, as together will make his salary, for the time he was employed as assistant law agent, equal to that authorized to be paid to the land commissioners, by the act of the 3d of March, 1853, making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1854.'"

Mr. GWIN. That allows the same compensation as the land commissioners, $8,000 a year.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on concurring in the report of the committee of conference.

The report was concurred in.

On motion, the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, May 30, 1854.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. WILLIAM H. MILBURN.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

The SPEAKER appointed the following gentlemen managers on the part of the House, of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes between the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the deficiency bill: Messrs. PHELPS, CHANDLER, and LETCHER.

The SPEAKER stated that the business first in order was the consideration of the resolution reported on Friday from the Committee on Printing relative to the printing of extra copies of the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury, on the condition of the banks of the country.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky. I hope that resolution will be disposed of now.

POST ROADS IN UTAH.

Mr. BERNHISEL, by unanimous consent, offered the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a mail route from Tooele city to Grantsville; from Great Salt Lake City, via Taylorsville, West Jordan, Gardner's Mill, and Bingham's, Canyon, to Cedar Valley; from Great Salt Lake City, via Neff's Mill, Mill Creek, Holladay's Settlement, Little Cottonwood, and Drapersville, to Mountaineersville, in the Territory of Utah, and that said committee report by bill or otherwise.

ROADS AND PUBLIC LANDS IN NEBRASKA.

Mr. HENN, by unanimous consent, and in pursuance of previous notice, introduced the following bills: which were read a first and second time by their respective titles, and referred as indicated below:

A bill for the construction of military roads in the Territory of Nebraska. Referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

A bill to provide for the sale of the public lands in the Territory of Nebraska, and to establish a land office therein. Referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

WEST FELICIANA RAILROAD.

Mr. REESE. I desire to call up the motion to reconsider the vote in regard to the bill for the relief of the West Feliciana railroad and the Georgia Railroad and Banking Companies.

Reference was made of that bill, when it came from the Senate, to the Committee of Claims. A motion was subsequently made to reconsider that vote, and it has never been acted on. I desire the vote to be reconsidered now, that I may have the bill referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The question was taken on the motion to reconsider; and it was agreed to.

REPORT ON BANKS.

And then, on motion by Mr. REESE, the bill was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The SPEAKER. The question is first upon the adoption of the following amendment to the resolution offered by the gentleman from Kentucky,

[Mr. STANTON,] from the Committee on Public Printing:

"Provided, That nothing herein contained shall authorize a charge for a second composition."

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky. I desire to say in reference to the resolution, that this House have published no extra copies of the document in question. It is a very important document, containing information which was gathered at the request of this House by the Secretary of the Treasury in relation to the different banks throughout the Union. A great many of these banks have requested that the information be published, and they desire that they shall each be furnished with a copy. Two hundred and fifty copies, I think, will be a sufficient number to supply the different banks throughout the country.

Mr. LETCHER. I object to the adoption of the resolution. I think the amendment is right if the resolution is to be adopted. The printing of this document is, as I supposed it was, intended for the benefit of the banks throughout the country. This information has been published in the newspapers here, and has been generally disseminated in that way. The banks have had an opportunity to get it in that way; and it seems to me we have done all that is necessary in the case. If this House undertakes to publish information for a privileged class, for banking companies, or any other privileged class, the expenses of the Government will very soon run up to an enormous sum.

Mr. HOUSTON. I would suggest to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. STANTON] that the vote upon the resolution shall be passed over until next week, when members will return to their places, and allow me to move to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. Is it the unanimous consent of the House that the consideration of this resolution lie over? The Chair hears no objection; and it will be so ordered.

Mr. LETCHER. I desire that my motion to lay on the table shall be entered.

Mr. HOUSTON. I move that the rules of the House be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

JOHN W. KELLY.

Mr. ABERCROMBIE. I have been requested by Mr. MAXWELL, who is not now in his seat, to ask that the papers in the case of John W. Kelly be taken from the Speaker's table, for the purpose of reference to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. HOUSTON. If my colleague proposes to refer the bill to a committee, I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks the unanimous consent of the House to take from the table the following bill:

An act for the relief of John W. Kelly.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill having been read the first and second time by its title, was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

PRESERVATION OF LIFE ON THE NEW JERSEY COAST.

Mr. PENNINGTON. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire whether any, and what measures, are necessary for the security and preservation of life and property in cases of wreck or other disaster of vessels on the coast of New Jersey, and report by bill or otherwise.

The question was then taken; and the resolution was adopted.

PRESERVATION OF DIES AND MEDALS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in compliance with a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 19th instant, a communication received by that Department from the Director of the United States Mint, on the subject of the condition of dies or medals struck by the authority of Congress, commemorative of patriotic services, and touching the propriety of establishing in the Mint a medal department, for the purpose of preserving such dies, medals, &c., together with a copy of the proceedings of the Pennsylvania Historical Society, to which the said report refers, and a list of the dies now in the Mint.

The communication and accompanying documents were laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

THE MINISTER AT CONSTANTINOPLE.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Speaker, I wish to obtain the unanimous consent of the House to present a resolution, which I send to the Clerk's desk. It calls for certain correspondence from the State Department.

There being no objection, the resolution was reported, as follows:

Resolved, That the President be requested to communicate to Congress, so far as, in his judgment, it may be compatible with the public interest, copies of the correspondence of our Minister at Constantinople, the Hon. Carroll Spence, and which has been transmitted to the Department of State.

Mr. MAY. I merely want to say a single word in relation to this resolution. I believe, Mr. Speaker, that our Minister to Constantinople has been very unjustly censured as to the speech delivered by him on his presentation to the Grand Turk. I think that when an authentic copy of that speech is seen, it will be found in consonance with the settled principles which govern the policy of the United States in its foreign relations. I desire that justice may be done to Mr. Spence; that an authentic copy of his speech may be seen. And I wish to add, that when the correspondence which he had with the Sublime Porte, touching the expulsion of the Greeks from Constantinople is published, he will be found to merit the approbation of his countrymen. I hope, therefore, the House will adopt the resolution of inquiry.

The question was taken; and the resolution was adopted.

FOREIGN COMMERCIAL REGULATIONS.

Mr. MACDONALD. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of extending the provisions of the act of the 16th August, 1842, requiring foreign regulations of commerce to be laid annually before Congress, and of making a permanent annual appropriation to enable the State Department to comply with said act; said committee to report by bill or otherwise.

There being no objection, the question was put; and the resolution was adopted.

CUSTOMS COMMISSIONS.

Mr. WELLS. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be hereby directed to inquire into the expediency of repealing so much of the fourth section of the act of 3d March, 1831, to regulate the foreign and coasting trade on the northern, northeastern, and northwestern frontiers, and for other purposes, as prohibits the receipt of commissions by officers of the customs on said frontiers upon duties or goods entered at their offices and paid thereat.

Mr. McNAIR. I object to the introduction of that resolution, inasmuch as I believe there is not a quorum at present in the House.

Mr. HOUSTON. For my part, I do not object to the resolution itself, but I think that it is made to take a wrong direction in its being referred to the Committee on Commerce. However, that is not of much consequence.

Mr. McNAIR. The only object I have in objecting to the resolution is to know whether there is a quorum in the House. I withdraw my objection.

The question was then taken; and the resolution was adopted.

Mr. HOUSTON. I now move that the rules of the House be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, for the purpose of resuming the consideration of the Pacific railroad bill.

FEES OF COLLECTORS.

Mr. WELLS asked and obtained unanimous consent, and presented a communication from John White, collector of the port of Milwaukee, Wisconsin, asking for the repeal of the fourth section of the act of the 2d of March, 1831, to regulate the foreign and coasting trade on the northern, northeastern, and northwestern frontiers, and for other purposes, as prohibits the receipt of commissions by officers of the customs on said frontiers upon duties on goods entered at their offices and paid thereat.

The communication was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

[A message was here received from the Senate, by the hands of ASBURY DICKINS, their Secretary, informing the House that the Senate had passed a bill of the House of the following title:

An act making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending 30th June, 1855; with sundry amendments thereto, in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House.]

Mr. HOUSTON. As the Senate have added a very large amount of amendments to that bill, I would like the House to consent that it be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. ORR. I object to it.

Mr. HOUSTON. Then I insist upon my motion to go into committee.

Mr. CARUTHERS. I hope the gentleman from Alabama will not press that motion, as I desire to ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a resolution.

Mr. HOUSTON. I suppose that my friend from South Carolina will object to it, if I do not, and therefore I insist upon my motion.

Mr. ORR. The gentleman from South Carolina will object when it suits his convenience to do so.

The question was then put upon Mr. Houston's motion; and it was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. Bocock in the chair.)

RAILROAD TO THE PACIFIC.

The CHAIRMAN. The subject under consideration before the committee is House bill (No. 295) to provide for the establishment of railroad and telegraphic communication between the Atlantic States and the Pacific ocean, and for other purposes; and upon that question the gentleman from New York [Mr. SMITH] has the floor.

Mr. SMITH, of New York, said that however the bill appeared to the contrary, it was for building a railroad to the Pacific by the Government, providing that the road shall be owned by the Government; and moreover, that the Government shall continue to be the owner of all that part of it which lies within the limits of our national territory. This, in his view, was to be the essential and controlling connection of the Government with this road; and because this was to be its connection, he rose to oppose this bill.

He need not say that he deeply desired to see a railroad to the Pacific; and what American did not desire to see it? Commerce, travel, the love of country, the love of each part for other part, the deep hope in every true American's breast that our country will always be one, that we shall always make up one country; all these, and numberless other considerations, unite in calling up feelings of this sort. We must have and should have this essential connection; this iron band between the East and the West, between the Atlantic and the Pacific. But, much as we have to hope for from this road, much good as would come of it, the evil which would flow from it, were it built by the Government, would largely overbalance all the good. He hesitated not to say we had better not have the road than have it built by the Government.

After explaining his views of civil government, he said its sole and legitimate province was the protection of persons and property. He glanced at and answered the arguments in favor of the bill, and then spoke in opposition to it, saying the building of this road, the repairs, and the use of it by the Government, would cost at least fifty per cent. more than if done by individuals and associations. It was highly probable there will be two or three railroads to the Pacific. In case one shall be owned by the Government, (he did not care whether by the Federal or the State government,) the Government will spare no means to sustain its road against the competition of other roads, and lavish money without stint to this end. And how oppressive and injurious would this be to individual owners of roads! Government should never array itself against any portion of its own subjects in these ways.

He would not undervalue the use of one of those roads in regard to Government protection. He would cheerfully vote that this Government should give five or ten millions of dollars in aid of two or three roads, provided they were built on widely different routes. He did not say he would give five or ten millions of acres, for he was of the opinion that the Government does not own the land. He denied that Government has any more ownership in the public domain than Satan had in the kingdoms of the world with which he sought to bribe our Saviour. The land belongs to the landless.

He mentioned other objections against the bill, one of which was, that it would perpetuate the cruel and oppressive tariff system. Then farewell to all our hopes of honest and frugal government, bearing lightly on the poor.

Mr. PERKINS, of Louisiana, obtained the floor.

Mr. PHELPS. Will the gentleman from Louisiana yield me the floor for a moment?

Mr. PERKINS. As the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. PHELPS] desires to make a personal request of the House, I yield him the floor for that purpose.

Mr. PHELPS. I have obtained the floor for the purpose of submitting a motion that the committee do now rise. The object I have in making it is to enable the committee of conference upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses upon the deficiency bill, to submit their report, that action may be had upon it now. I therefore submit the motion that the committee rise.

The question was then taken upon Mr. PHELPS's motion; and it was decided in the affirmative.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the Chairman of the committee (Mr. Bocock) reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had the state of the Union generally under consideration, and particularly House bill No. 295, being a bill to establish the Pacific railroad, &c., and had come to no resolution thereon.

THE DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. PHELPS. Mr. Speaker, I am instructed by the committee of conference on the part of the House of Representatives to submit a report on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the deficiency bill.

The Clerk read the report, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 271) "to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1854," having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend, and do recommend to their respective Houses, as follows:

That the Senate do concur in the amendments of the House to the amendments of the Senate numbered 4, 10, 38, 39, 43, and 46.

That the Senate concur with the amendments of the House, except the first amendment to the fifteenth amendment of the Senate, with which the House concurs, with an amendment by striking out the word "four," in line eleven, and in lieu thereof inserting "three."

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 11, 12, 14, 20, 25, 26, 40, 42, 48, 52, and 53.

That the House concur in Senate amendments numbered 36 and 37.

That the House concur in Senate amendment numbered 24, with the following amendment: Strike out all after the word "for" in the first line, to and including the word "him," in the second line, and insert "deficiencies for the railroad surveys."

That the House concur in the Senate amendment numbered 41, with the following amendment: Strike out all after the word "dollars," in line three, and insert, "Provided, That there be allowed to the legal representatives of Robert Greenhow such sum, in addition to that received by him, as together will make his salary for the time he was employed as assistant law agent, equal to that authorized to be paid to the land commissioners by the act of 3d March, 1853, making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1854."

And that the House concur in the amendment of the Senate numbered 51, with the following amendment: Strike out all after the word "him," in the eleventh line thereof.

R. M. T. HUNTER,

JAMES JONES,

WILLIAM M. GWIN,

Managers on the part of the Senate.

JOHN S. PHELPS,

J. LETCHER,

JOSEPH R. CHANDLER,

Managers on the part of H. of Reps.

Mr. PHELPS. I desire, Mr. Speaker, briefly to explain to the House the recommendations of the committee of conference. The first amendment of the bill to which there is a disagreeing vote is Senate amendment No. 4, which is as follows:

For payment of the claim of Thomas N. Johnson for his services as marshal at the port of Shanghai, from the 9th of December, 1851, to the 15th of September, 1853, the sum of $1,798 91.

In this case the amendment is a mere verbal one. In the original amendment of the Senate, the name of Mr. Johnson is printed as Thomas M. instead of Thomas N. There is also a trifling reduction in the amount appropriated. In the Senate amendment, the amount was $1,798 91, but in the House this was reduced to $1,781 74. The Senate agrees to accept these amendments of the House.

The next amendment of the Senate on which there was a disagreeing vote was No. 10, which is as follows:

For completing and keeping in order the grounds south of the President's House, $9,770.

The House adopted an amendment to this amendment, making an appropriation of $1,000 for settees for the Capitol and President's grounds. This is concurred in by the Senate.

The next amendment of the Senate to which there was a disagreeing vote was No. 38, as follows:

Page fourteen, after line three hundred and twenty-five, insert as follows:

And the limitations imposed by the provisions contained in the act of 15th May, 1850, entitled "An act to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1850," and the act of 3d March, 1853, entitled "An act making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1854," be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

The House so amended the amendment as to strike it all out, and insert:

And that the period limited for the appointment of commissioner, surveyor, and chief astronomer, by the act of May, 1850, shall be, and the same is hereby, extended to the 30th of June, 1855.

The next amendment on which there was a disagreeing vote is Senate amendment No. 39, as follows:

For engraving maps, views, sections, and natural history, of the survey of the boundary between the United States and Mexico, $10,000; to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior.

The House adopted an amendment to this amendment, providing for the payment of the cost of engraving the plates of the agricultural part of the Patent Office report. The Senate concurs in that amendment.

The next amendment on which there was a disagreeing vote was Senate amendment No. 43, as follows:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to examine the claims presented by certain counties of the late Territory of Iowa, for expenses of the United States district court which were paid by said counties prior to the admission of said Territory into the Union as a State; and if, upon such examination, he is satisfied that, prior to said time, the said counties have paid money which, in accordance with the instructions of the First Comptroller of the Treasury, dated December 19, 1843, should have been paid by the marshal of the United States for said Territory, he is directed to audit and allow the same.

The amendment of the House was in the form of a substitute, as follows:

That the First Comptroller of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to examine the claims presented by certain counties of the late Territory of Iowa, for expenses of the United States district court, which were paid by said counties prior to the admission of said Territory into the Union as a State; and if, upon such examination, he is satisfied that, prior to said time, the said counties have paid money which, in accordance with the instructions of the First Comptroller of the Treasury, dated 19th of December, 1843, as construed in the report of said First Comptroller to the Secretary of the Interior, under date of 13th of October, 1853, in reference to said subject, should have been paid by the marshal of the United States for said Territory, he is directed to audit and settle the same.

The Senate concur in this amendment of the House.

The forty-sixth amendment of the Senate was to add to the end of the bill the following:

And be it further enacted, That all books, papers, documents, and records, in the Department of the Interior, may be copied and certified, under the seal of that Department, (which is hereby recognized as legal,) in the same manner as those in the other Executive Departments may now by law be, and with the same force and effect.

The amendment of the House was to add:

And in all cases where a seal is necessary by law to any commission, process, or other instrument, provided for by the law of Congress, it shall be lawful to affix the proper seal by making an impression therewith directly on the paper to which the seal is necessary; which shall be as valid as if made upon wax or other substance.

In that amendment of the House the committee of conference recommend that the Senate concur.

The fiftieth amendment of the Senate is as follows:

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That from and after the passage of this act, there shall be, in addition to the clerks authorized by the third section of the act of March 3, 1853, entitled "An act making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1854," in the office of the Register of the Treasury, three clerks of class four, to include the clerk now authorized to take charge of the redemption of stocks, and in the office of the Commissioner of Pensions five clerks of class two, and fifteen clerks of class three; and said clerks shall be paid, according to the provisions of said section, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The amendments of the House were to strike out
—to include the clerk now authorized to take charge of the redemption of stocks,
—to insert after the words "Register of the Treasury,"
—"in lieu of the temporary clerks now employed therein,"
—and to insert after the word "section" the words
—"until the 30th of June, 1854."

The committee recommended that the Senate concur in these amendments of the House, with the exception of the first one, and that the word "three" be substituted for the word "four," so that the three clerks in the office of the Register of the Treasury shall belong to class three, with a salary of $1,600 per annum, instead of class four, with a salary of $1,800 per annum.

Mr. HOUSTON. I would ask the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. PHELPS] how many clerks that amendment gives to the Register of the Treasury?

Mr. PHELPS. Only two. The committee also recommend that the Senate recede from its following amendments:

No. 11, which was to insert:

For iron flagging in front of the old portion of the Patent Office Building, and altering windows and private stairway, $5,730.

No. 12, which was to insert:

For altering streets and repaving in front of the east wing of the Patent Office Building, iron railing and flagging, and painting new saloon, $14,250.

No. 14, which was to insert:

For completing the improvement of Pennsylvania avenue from Seventeenth to Twenty-sixth street west, $9,000: Provided, That all appropriations herein made for repairs and improvements of the public buildings or grounds within the District of Columbia, shall be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior.

No. 20, which was to insert:

For the actual and necessary expenses incurred by the provisional government of Oregon, in defending the people of said Territory from the attacks and hostilities of the Cayuse Indians, in the years 1847 and 1848, and for such allowances for the expense of adjusting the claims on that account as the Secretary of the Treasury may deem proper, $75,000. But the said claims and accounts shall be settled and adjusted at such place, and in such manner, as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe; and no claims shall hereafter be allowed on account of this war which are not presented within the next fiscal year.

No. 25, which was to insert:

For continuing the works for bringing water into the city of Washington, $500,000.

No. 26, which was to insert:

For the payment of Richard H. Weightman, for mileage and per diem compensation as an agent claiming to be a Senator elect from New Mexico, $2,464.

No. 40, which was to insert:

For the completion of the bridge across the Potomac river at Little Falls, and painting thereof, agreeably to the plan adopted under the direction of the President of the United States, $75,000.

No. 42, which was to insert:

And the marshals of the northern and southern districts of California shall have the same mileage and compensation for serving processes issuing from said commission as are allowed to the sheriffs for serving similar processes by the higher courts of California; and the same mileage and per diem shall be made to witnesses as are allowed to witnesses by the State of California.

No. 48, which was to add:

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That before any payment shall hereafter be made to any invalid pensioner whose name shall have been upon the pension list two years, he shall produce to the agents for paying pensions, to whom he shall apply for payment, the affidavit of two surgeons or physicians, satisfactory to the Secretary of the Interior, stating, from personal examination, the continuance of disability, describing it, for which the pension was originally granted, and the rate of such disability at the time of making such affidavit, blank forms of which shall be furnished by the Commissioner of Pensions to agents for paying pensions, for the use of pensioners; and if in said affidavit the disability shall be stated at a rate below that for which the pension was originally granted, he shall only be paid at the rate stated in said affidavit. Said affidavit shall be filed by said agents, and carefully preserved, and copies thereof shall be transmitted, with the semi-annual returns of said agents, to the Commissioner of Pensions, who shall file them with the original papers of the pensioner, respectively: Provided, That when the pension shall have been originally granted by a special act of Congress, or for a total disability for the loss of a limb or other cause which cannot be removed, either in whole or in part, the above affidavit shall not be required.

No. 52, which was to add:

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That so much of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1853, and for other purposes," as provides for compensation to the Spanish consul and others for losses occasioned by violence at New Orleans, and at Key West, in the year 1851, shall be so construed as to place Michael Pappenitz, a subject of Austria, on the same footing with the subjects of Spain.

And the fifty-third amendment, which was to add:

Sec. 9. And be it further enacted, That for custom-houses and marine hospitals, and to complete the same, the following sums be, and they are hereby, appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, namely:

For completing the custom house at St. Louis, Missouri, $100,000;

For completing the custom-house at Mobile, Alabama, $65,000;

For completing the custom house at Cincinnati, Ohio, $40,000;

For completing the custom house at Louisville, Kentucky, $40,000;

For completing the custom-house at Bangor, Maine, $20,000;

For completing the custom-house at Bath, Maine, $20,000;

For completing the custom-house at Wilmington, Delaware, $12,000;

For purchasing a site for a custom-house at Providence, Rhode Island, $24,000;

For the purchase of a new site for the custom-house in San Francisco, $250,000; and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized, if, in his judgment, the public interest will thereby be promoted, to apply this appropriation, and as much as may be necessary of former appropriations, for the erection of a custom house on the land reserved for said purpose, to the purchase of a building or buildings for a custom-house and other public offices; and the said Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to take all legal proceedings which may be necessary or advisable to maintain and secure the possession and title of the United States to the lot heretofore selected for the site of a custom-house;

For the erection of a custom house at Portland, Maine, including rooms for the United States court, and for a post office, $200,000;

To complete the marine hospital at Cleveland, Ohio, $25,000;

To complete the marine hospital at St. Louis, Missouri, $10,000;

To complete the marine hospital at Chicago, Illinois, $8,000;

To complete the marine hospital at Louisville, Kentucky, $12,500;

To complete the marine hospital at Paducah, Kentucky, $5,000;

To complete the marine hospital at Evansville, Indiana, $2,000;

To complete the marine hospital at San Francisco, California, $44,000; and to construct a marine hospital at Burlington, Iowa, $15,000.

The committee also recommends that the House concur in Senate amendments Nos. 36 and 37, which are as follows:

For rent of paper wareroom from the 1st of January to the 30th of June, 1854, at $250 per annum, $125.

For cartage of printing paper from wareroom and office of the Superintendent of Public Printing to the printing offices, and labor, from the 1st of January to the 30th of June, 1854, at $550 per annum, $275.

It was stated in debate, when this matter was under consideration by the House, that the Committee on Printing had instructed the Superintendent of the Public Printing to incur this expenditure. It was, however, urged that there was no necessity for incurring this expenditure; that by the contracts made with the persons who were to deliver the paper for the public printing, they were to deliver it at such places in the city of Washington as the Superintendent might direct. It is true there was such a provision in the contracts made with those who supply the paper for the public printing; but as the Senate and House of Representatives have each elected a printer, the course pursued by the former Superintendent of Public Printing could not now be pursued. When there was but one public printer all the paper was deposited in the Union office. General Armstrong, during the last session of Congress, rented a building especially for the purpose of storing the paper belonging to the Government of the United States, and the Superintendent went there and issued such quantities of paper as the public printer from time to time required. But there are now two public printers, and each office is unwilling to store paper for the other. It becomes necessary, therefore, that there shall be some place where the paper can be inspected by the Superintendent, in order that he may ascertain whether it corresponds with the contracts, before issuing it to the different offices.

For these reasons the committee recommend a concurrence in that amendment.

The twenty-fourth amendment is as follows:

For the transportation of Governor Stevens and his party, and for explorations made by him between the Mississippi river and the Pacific ocean, $40,000.

This amendment was adopted by the Senate for the purpose of covering a deficiency in the survey of Governor Stevens, and also to provide for additional surveys of the pass known as Noble's Pass.

At the time that amendment was adopted by the Senate, Lieutenant Whipple had not returned. It has been ascertained that there is a deficiency incurred by him of $15,000, and by Governor Stevens of $25,000. Those officers did not know, at the time they engaged in the surveys, that these deficiencies would occur. When it was ascertained that there was not a sufficient amount of money for the purpose of defraying the expenses, the question to be determined by them was, whether they should abandon the prosecution of those surveys and return to the States, or endeavor to reach the settlements upon the Pacific coast. They determined to go on, and these expenses have been caused by a contingency unforeseen by them. They are, in some instances, individually responsible for those expenses, and the Departments have recommended that provision be made for them.

The committee of conference recommend that the provision be so amended as that it will read:

For deficiencies for railroad surveys between the Mississippi river and the Pacific ocean, $40,000.

Mr. COBB. Does that cover the whole?

Mr. PHELPS. That will cover the deficiency, so far as we are advised.

Mr. COBB. You do not propose to appropriate any more money?

Mr. PHELPS. Not by this bill.

The committee of conference recommend a concurrence in the forty-first amendment, which is as follows:

Page fourteen, line three hundred and twenty-eight, after the word "California," strike out "$37,500," and insert in lieu thereof "$12,000;" and that $5,000 of said sum be paid to Robert Greenhow, assistant law agent to said board, for services performed during the absence of the law agent.

When the commission was established in California for the adjudication of land claims, it was provided that the salaries of the commissioners should be $5,000 per annum, and that the same compensation should be paid to the law agent, and to the associate law agent. At the last session of Congress, however, a provision was made, by which the commissioners were to be paid $8,000 per annum from the time of their employment, and that increase of salary was to apply to those who were then in office as well as to those who might thereafter be appointed. Under that provision of law, those commissioners who have been removed from office, and have ceased to act, have been paid their salaries at the rate of $8,000 per annum.

During the time Robert Greenhow acted as associate law agent, it is stated that the law agent himself was absent from the country a great portion of the time; that at the time Mr. Greenhow reached California, the law agent repaired to San Francisco, which was in the fall of 1852, I think, and thence returned to the United States, having rendered no service whatever; and there was no law agent in California from October, 1852, until Mr. Howard repaired there last June, under the appointment made by the present Administration. The committee of conference adopted the amendment here suggested, that the salary of the associate law agent should be, during the period that the duties of both the law agent and the associate law agent were performed by Mr. Greenhow, at the rate of $8,000 per annum.

Mr. WALSH. What was the salary of the law agent?

Mr. PHELPS. It was $5,000.

Mr. WALSH. What was that of the assistant law agent?

Mr. PHELPS. It was $5,000, the same with that of the law agent.

Mr. HOUSTON. I would like to hear the amendment agreed upon by the committee of conference read:

The amendment was then read, as follows:

Provided, That there be allowed to the legal representatives of Robert Greenhow, such sum, in addition to that received by him, as altogether will make his salary, for the time he was employed as assistant law agent, equal to that authorized to be paid to the land commissioner by the act of the 3d of March, 1853, making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th June, 1854.

Mr. HOUSTON. I understand that amendment to increase the salary of the law agent?

Mr. PHELPS. Only that of the associate law agent.

Mr. HOUSTON. I regard it as a permanent increase of salary.

Mr. PHELPS. It is not a permanent increase of salary at all. It only asks that the amount named shall be paid to the legal representatives of Robert Greenhow, during that period of time when he was employed upon his duties.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I wish to inquire of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. PHELPS] if he can inform the House how long Mr. Greenhow was employed as assistant law agent?

Mr. PHELPS. Mr. Greenhow was engaged there thirteen months and a half in the discharge of his duties. I do not know the time of his death.

Mr. JONES. Is his salary by law $5,000?

Mr. PHELPS. It is.

Mr. JONES. Does this bill propose to make it $8,000?

Mr. PHELPS. It does.

Mr. WALSH. I will ask why the proposition is stated in such a round-about, circuitous, and mysterious manner? Why does not the amendment state the amount without referring us to another office?

Mr. PHELPS. I would prefer, myself, if the language was a little more explicit and definite. But in a committee of conference there must, of necessity, be mutual concessions.

Mr. WALSH. It looks very suspicious now.

Mr. PHELPS. I would have preferred myself that the amount should have been specifically stated. But I have stated to the House what would be the effect under it. I have no disguise about it.

Mr. LETCHER, (to Mr. PHELPS.) What is the question made by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WALSH]?

Mr. PHELPS. He inquires why the amount to be paid to the legal representatives of Mr. Greenhow was not specified in so many dollars, instead of having been provided for in the manner in which it appears here?

Mr. LETCHER. Well, Mr. Speaker, my colleague on that committee [Mr. PHELPS] will recollect that we tried to get the amount clearly specified.

Mr. PHELPS. I have so stated.

The next matter in the report is, "that the House concur in the amendment of the Senate numbered 51, with the following amendment; strike out all after the word 'him,' in the eleventh line thereof."

The amendment will then stand as follows:

SEC. 7. And he it further enacted, That the portion of the seventh section of the act of 30th August, 1852, entitled "An act to provide for executing the public printing and establishing the prices thereof, and for other purposes," which provides "that when any documents shall be ordered to be printed by both Houses of Congress, the entire printing of such documents shall be done by the printer of that House which first ordered the same," is hereby repealed; and when there are different printers for the respective Houses, each shall do the printing which may hereafter be ordered by the House electing him.

This is the amendment providing for the public printing. The Committee of Ways and Means of the House of Representatives recommend that the House should concur in this amendment, with an amendment by striking out all after the word "him," in the eleventh line. I will read that portion of the Senate's amendment which will be struck out if the recommendation of the committee of conference should be adopted:

And so much of the printing for the Executive Departments and bureaus of the Government as is ordered by the said act to be done by the public printer, shall be equally divided between the printers of the two Houses.

This was an amendment which, when the matter was discussed in the Committee of the Whole, the Committee of Ways and Means urged should be adopted. It was adopted in Committee of the Whole; but, at the same time, the committee struck out the entire amendment. The effect of adopting the recommendation of the committee of conference on this point will be this: that each House will control its own public printing as formerly; and, so far as the Executive printing is concerned, which is directed by the law regulating the manner of executing the public printing, and the prices to be paid therefor, it will be done by either of the public printers whom the Executive Departments may select. That portion of the Senate's amendment regulating this, on the principle of equal division, was impracticable, and could not be executed. That regulation could not be executed, because it required the departmental printing to be equally divided between the two public printers, for the purpose of avoiding all difficulty in relation to this matter; and they have already got into difficulty about it. The committee of conference have recommended to the two Houses a concurrence in the fifty-first amendment, amended by striking out that portion of it which I have last read. I understand that this recommendation is also acceptable to those engaged as the public printers.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I must ask for the previous question on the adoption of the report of the committee of conference. I am still ready, however, to give any explanation that may be asked for in connection with it.

Mr. MEACHAM. I want to know whether there can be a division of the vote on this question? There are some of these recommendations of the committee for which I can vote very cheerfully, and for some I cannot vote at all. But if we must take the whole report, and vote for or against the adoption of it, I will vote against it.

The SPEAKER. It must be voted for as a whole.

Mr. MEACHAM. Then I call for the yeas and nays on the acceptance of the report.

Mr. WHEELER. I move that there be a call of the House.

Mr. PHELPS. I have this to say to the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. MEACHAM] and to the House—and for the present I withdraw the call for the previous question. With reference to the report of a committee of conference, probably no member can go on such a committee and expect always to obtain his own wishes, or expect always to obtain that which might be considered as the desire of the House that he represents. The very object of appointing a committee of conference is, that there may be mutual concession between the two bodies disagreeing in their votes. And therefore, in this case, the committee of conference on the part of the House met the committee on the part of the Senate with a desire to carry out, not their own views, but the views which were indicated in the House of Representatives which they represented on that occasion.

But they could not obtain all they desired, and they therefore have recommended to the House certain concessions; and on the other side they have recommended that certain concessions be made by the Senate.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I wish to ask the gentleman from Missouri one question. I understand from the report, that in reference to most of the disputed amendments the Senate has given way, and that the House has accomplished nearly everything it desired, except some small matters.

Mr. PHELPS. That is so.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Then I think we had better accept the report.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky. I wish simply to inquire of the gentleman from Missouri if he did not labor under a misapprehension in specifying that the amendment in reference to the public printing left it discretionary with the different Departments of Government to send their printing to whichever one of the printers the Departments might choose?

Mr. PHELPS. As I understand the construction of that law, and as I understand its practical operation, all the departmental printing is printed by such public printer as the Executive Departments see fit to give it to.

Mr. STANTON. I desire to say in reply to that, that the gentleman labors under a misapprehension. The law itself requires that all the Executive printing shall be sent to the Superintendent of Public Printing, and he distributes it as he thinks proper.

Mr. PHELPS. How does he distribute it?

Mr. STANTON. He gives it all to one printer.

Mr. PHELPS. It amounts to the same thing, only I avoided using circumlocution to express the fact.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I wish to say a word, to see whether I understand this report correctly. If we concur in this report of the committee, as I understand it, the appropriation to pay for surveying the two routes to California by Stevens and Whipple will be passed; the provision increasing the compensation of Greenhow will be passed; the provision for three clerks to the Register of the Treasury will be passed; and the provision with regard to printing will be passed, so far as relates to the printing of the two Houses; and that the Senate recede from their other amendments.

Mr. PHELPS. Not all of them. The House concurs in the Senate amendment in reference to the paper warehouse, the cartage, &c.

Before the gentleman from Missouri yields the floor, I desire to ask him a question. There is one part of this report in reference to which I wish to understand the facts. The provision to which I refer is this:

—"forty-two thousand dollars; and that $5,000 of said sum be paid to Robert Greenhow, assistant law agent to said board, for services performed during the absence of the law agent."

This, as I understand it, makes his salary $8,000 per annum.

Mr. PHELPS. I would remark to the gentleman that this language is precisely the same as that employed in the act of 1853.

Mr. HOUSTON. I am not commenting upon the language. I wish to ask the gentleman how long Greenhow acted as law agent?

Mr. PHELPS. A little upwards of a year.

Mr. HOUSTON. How long did he discharge double duties?

Mr. LETCHER. During nearly the entire period. The law agent left soon after his arrival in California.

Mr. PHELPS. I have the impression that he served as law agent twelve months, and that, during all that time, he discharged double duties. But I cannot tell exactly.

Mr. HOUSTON. This amendment does not confine the increase of salary to the time during which he discharged double duties. It gives him an increased salary for the whole time that he was law agent. Am I right in that construction?

Mr. PHELPS. Certainly, you are right.

Mr. HOUSTON. Then it occurs to me that it is an increase of salary, and even goes beyond the principle that the House overturned.

Mr. PHELPS. Well, I demand the previous question.

Mr. WHEELER. I move that there be a call of the House; and on that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The question was then taken on Mr. WHEELER's motion; and, on a division, there were eighteen in the affirmative.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Count the other side. I want to know if there is a quorum here.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will ascertain if there is a quorum present.

The Speaker then proceeded to count the House, when it appeared that there were only one hundred and five members present, being less than a quorum.

Mr. JONES. I move that the House do now adjourn; and on that motion I ask for the yeas and nays. I make the motion for the purpose of ascertaining if there is a quorum here. I shall vote against it myself, and hope it will be voted down.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was then taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 18, nays 93.

So the House refused to adjourn.

The SPEAKER. There is no quorum voting.

Mr. GREENWOOD. I move that there be a call of the House.

A MEMBER. How many do there lack of a quorum?

The SPEAKER. Six or seven.

Mr. GREENWOOD. I know where they are to be found if we have a call of the House.

The SPEAKER. The motion for a call is in order.

Mr. PHELPS. I ask that the vote may be taken by tellers upon this question. We shall then perhaps be able to ascertain if there is a quorum here.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. VAIL and GREENWOOD were appointed.

The question was then taken; and the tellers reported—ayes 60, noes not counted.

So a call of the House was ordered. The roll was then called, and one hundred and eighteen members answered to their names.

The following are the names of the absentees:

Messrs. James C. Allen, Appleton, Thomas H. Bayly, Ball, Barksdale, Belcher, Bennett, Benson, Benton, Bissell, Bliss, Breckinridge, Bugg, Carpenter, Chamberlain, Chase, Chrisman, Churchwell, Cook, Oraig, Crocker, Cullom, Cumming, John G. Davis, Thomas Davis, De Witt, Dickinson, Dowdell, Drum, Eastman, Edgerton, Thomas D. Elliot, English, Everhart, Ewing, Farley, Fenton, Franklin, Gamble, Giddings, Goode, Grey, Grow, Hamilton, Andrew J. Harlan, Sampson W. Harris, Harrison, Hastings, Haven, Hibbard, Hiester, Howe, Hughes, Ingersoll, Daniel T. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Keitt, Kirtledge, Knox, Kurtz, Lamb, Lane, Lilly, Lindsley, Lyon, McCulloch, McNair, McQueen, Mace, Macy, Matteson, Meacham, John G. Miller, Smith Miller, Morgan, Murray, Noble, Oids, Packer, Powell, Pratt, Preston, Puryear, Richardson, Riddle, Thomas Ritchey, Robbins, Rogers, Rowe, Sabin, Sage, Seward, Simmons, Skelton, Samuel A. Smith, William Smith, William E. Smith, Snodgrass, Sollers, Alexander H. Stephens, Straub, David Stuart, John L. Taylor, Tracy, Tweed, Wade, Walbridge, Walker, Walley, Warren, Ellihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, John Wentworth, Tappan Wentworth, Witte, Hendrick B. Wright, and Zollcoffer—113.

Mr. GREENWOOD. I move that all further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

The question was then taken; and the motion was agreed to.

So all further proceedings under the call were dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on seconding the demand for the previous question upon agreeing to the report of the committee of conference.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

The question now being upon agreeing to the report of the committee of conference,

Mr. CAMPBELL demanded the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. WHEELER demanded tellers upon the yeas and nays; which were ordered; and Messrs. EDMUNDSON and COX were appointed.

The House was then divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 36, noes not counted.

So the yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. ASHE. Mr. Speaker, will it be in order to have the report of the committee of conference read now?

The SPEAKER. The report has been already read. If there be no objection, it will be again read.

Mr. PECK. I object.

The question was then taken; and decided in the affirmative—yeas 77, nays 41; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abercrombie, Aiken, Willis Allen, Ashe, Banks, Bell, Bocock, Bridges, Brooks, Caruthers, Caskie, Chandler, Chastain, Clark, Clingman, Colquitt, Corwin, Cox, Curtis, Cutting, Dawson, Dean, Dick, Dunbar, Eddy, Edmunds, Edmundson, John M. Elliott, Farley, Faulkner, Florence, Fuller, Goodrich, Green, Greenwood, Wiley P. Harris, Hendricks, Henn, Houston, Hunt, Johnson, Roland Jones, Kerr, Kidwell, Latham, Leicher, Macdonald, McDougall, Maxwell, May, Mayall, Mordecai Oliver, Orr, Peckham, Pennington, Bishop Perkins, John Perkins, Phelps, Phillips, Ready, Reese, David Ritchie, Seymour, Shannon, Shower, Singleton, Gerrit Smith, George W. Smyth, Frederick P. Stanton, Richard H. Stanton, Stratton, John J. Taylor, Upham, Vail, Wells, Westbrook, and Daniel B. Wright—77.

NAYS—Messrs. David J. Bailey, Barry, Benton, Boyce, Campbell, Cobb, Dent, Dunham, Ellison, Etheridge, Flagler, Aaron Harlan, Hill, Hillyer, George W. Jones, Knox, McMullin, Maurice, Meacham, Middleswarth, Millson, Morrison, Nichols, Norton, Andrew Oliver, Parker, Peck, Pringle, Ruffin, Russell, Sapp, Hestor L. Stevens, Nathaniel G. Taylor, Thurston, Tracy, Trout, Vansant, Walsh, Wheeler, Yates, and Zollcoffer—41.

So the report of the committee of conference was adopted.

Pending the announcement of the result of the vote,

Mr. RICHARDSON asked to be allowed to vote.

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman from Illinois within the bar when his name was called?

Mr. RICHARDSON. No, sir; I was not within the bar, but I desire to vote on the question.

The SPEAKER. It can only be by unanimous consent.

Mr. PECK. I object.

Also, pending the announcement of the vote,

Mr. BENTON. Mr. Speaker, how many votes are necessary to make up a quorum?

The SPEAKER. There is but one vote more required to constitute a quorum.

Mr. BENTON. Well, Mr. Speaker, I was within the bar, and desire to vote. I find that one vote is worth a great deal more than I ever expected it was worth. I therefore vote no.

The SPEAKER. That makes a quorum.

Mr. PHELPS moved to reconsider the vote just taken by which the report was adopted, and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table; which latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken; and the motion was agreed to.

The House thereupon, at half past two o'clock, p. m., adjourned till to-morrow at twelve o'clock, m.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, May 31, 1854.

Prayer by Rev. WILLIAM H. MILBURN.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Mr. BADGER. Mr. President, I have received, through the Governor of North Carolina, a report and resolutions adopted at a very large and respectable convention held in the town of Wilmington, in that State, respecting the condition of the navigation of the Cape Fear river, and particularly the bar at its mouth. I am requested by one of the resolutions to present them to the Senate. I do so in accordance with that request; and, considering the high position of the gentleman who presided over the meeting, (the Governor of the State,) and the importance and interest attached to that subject with them, I ask that, without reading, the papers may be printed, and laid on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SEWARD presented the petition of Cynthia M. Clarke, praying indemnity for losses sustained by her father, Ethan Stillman, in the execution of his contract for supplying muskets for the United States, in consequence of the embargo laws and the war of 1812; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. DODGE, of Wisconsin, presented a petition of citizens of Racine, Wisconsin, praying a reduction of the present rates of ocean postage; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. BENJAMIN presented a memorial of Joseph Grafton and others, settlers on the Bastrop grant, praying such relief for them as was granted to claimants under the Maison Rouge grant by the act of January, 1851; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion by Mr. RUSK, it was Ordered, That the petition of Betsy W. Eve be withdrawn from the files of the Senate, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

On motion by Mr. HAMLIN, it was Ordered, That the memorial of William W. Cox be withdrawn from the files of the Senate, and referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

REPORT FROM A STANDING COMMITTEE.

Mr. CLAY, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the memorial of Frances Smith, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill granting an increase of pension to Mrs. Frances Smith, of South Carolina; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

The report was ordered to be printed.

EUROPEAN PENAL CODES.

Mr. JOHNSON. On the 29th instant the usual number of copies—which is one thousand four hundred—of a message of the President of the United States, communicating, in compliance with the resolution of the Senate, a letter from H. S. Sanford, late chargé d'affaires of the United States at Paris, on the different systems of penal codes in Europe, and also a report on the administrative changes in France since the revolution in 1848, was ordered to be printed for the use of the Senate. A motion was then made to print one thousand additional copies of the document, which was referred to the Committee on Printing. That committee have instructed me to report against the printing of any additional copies. The honorable Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. JONES,] I understand, wishes to say something upon the subject.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I regret very much the decision to which the majority of the committee have arrived. I, of course, have not had an opportunity of examining the report carefully; because it has never been before us. But, from my knowledge of the gentleman who prepared it, his long residence abroad, his integrity, his intimate acquaintance with the subject, and his qualifications in every respect, I think it as important to the Senate and our Legislative Assemblies as anything that has ever come before the Senate since I have entered it; and I think, therefore, that the extra number should be printed. I am very solicitous that they should be printed. I ask but for a thousand copies, and I understand that the printing of one thousand additional copies of that part which relates to the penal codes will not increase the expenditure more than about $100. As for the other part, I do not think it necessary; but I feel a just concern about the part relating to the penal codes, because I look upon it as being of great interest and utility to the whole country; and I do hope the majority, who are liberal, generous men, will see the propriety of printing one thousand copies in addition to the usual number, which will not cost more than $100.

I am assured, though I cannot speak from my personal knowledge, as I have not had an opportunity to examine it, but from my knowledge of the man and the subject in dispute, that the report is worth publishing. You will remember that the late President of the United States, in his message, called attention to the importance of revising the judicial code of the United States, and it was in view of that suggestion that Mr. Sanford felt he was rendering a service to the country, by sending the Government an analytical sketch of the penal codes of Europe, which came within his personal knowledge, after a residence abroad of eight or ten years in the service of the country. He has no pecuniary interest in the matter; but if it is worth anything, as I am sure, from my knowledge of the man, it is, when we consider the importance of the subject, $100 is a very small amount to be expended.

Mr. JOHNSON. This document may be divided into two parts. One part of it relates to the Government of France. It is very well described in the resolution referred to the committee, as relating to the administrative changes in France. It is a history of the complicated machinery of that Government. The committee were unanimously of the opinion that much of the communication was but of little value, and certainly not of sufficient value to authorize the publication of an additional number of copies. There is a great deal of minutiae in it relating to the various departments of France, and to the various departments of the Government of France, and to the revolutions which have taken place there, legislative as well as political, since 1848, which are of no particular use to us. The committee, as I have said, were unanimous in rejecting the proposition to print all that portion of the report which was received from the Department of State.

The remainder, of which the Senator from Tennessee speaks, is a compilation taken from the penal codes of the different States of continental Europe, or, at least, very many of those States, including Germany, Austria, Prussia, France, Spain, and perhaps some other smaller States. The facts embraced in that portion of the report might be of interest to our State Legislatures, and might contain suggestions which would enable them to improve the penal codes of the different States. The experience derived from that portion of the document might be valuable in that respect, in order to enable them to shape and guide their action in reference to their own penal codes. The committee stood two to one, however, against printing any additional number. For my own part, I thought it would be as well to print one thousand extra copies of this portion of the report, that Senators might distribute them to members of their State Legislatures, for their information, as useful suggestions might be derived therefrom, for the improvement of our State legislation upon penal codes. The majority of the committee, however, considering the dissimilarity between those countries and our own, and the long experience we have already had on this matter, did not think that the benefit to be derived from the publication of an additional number would be worth the cost, and, therefore, they rejected the proposition.

The cost of printing the entire document as now ordered, that is, fourteen hundred copies for the use of the Senate, will be about $550. The cost of printing the one thousand additional copies of the whole report, including both branches, would be about $200. The cost of printing that branch of it relating to penal codes, would be about $100 for one thousand extra copies. These are the facts in regard to the matter. I am not certain myself that the majority of the committee were not correct in rejecting the whole proposition, though my impression at the time was, that it would be prudent and wise, on the part of the Senate, to print one thousand extra copies of that portion of the report which the Senator from Tennessee particularly wishes to have printed.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. My colleague on the committee, the Senator from Arkansas, has given a very correct statement of the conclusions to which the committee arrived when they examined the work this morning. Like the Senator from Tennessee, I have had time only to make a very superficial examination of the work, but I am inclined to think that if the Senate had been apprised of its entire contents when they were giving the vote for printing it, it would never have been referred to the committee.

If I understand the matter, the state of the case is this: Our chargé at Paris, looking to the message of the President of the United States, found that he recommended a revision of the penal statutes of this country; and then voluntarily took upon himself to collect the penal code of France, and of many of the surrounding countries. He not only did that, but he set out—if I could glean anything from the index, and we had but a short time to scrutinize the work this morning—to give what purports to be the history of the complex government of France under the various revolutions that have taken place in that country within the last ten or fifteen years.

Now, sir, there is a question lying behind the expense. The simple pittance to which my colleague on the committee has alluded had very little influence with me, because, if I thought the work was valuable, and one which should go to the country under the sanction of the Senate, I would not have hesitated a moment in concurring in the resolution referred to us, and I would have been willing to gratify my friend from Tennessee by awarding the number of copies desired. But, I take the position that it is a dangerous precedent for this body to establish, to publish every work that any agent abroad may be disposed to transmit to the Departments. I hold that the Senate, as a body of American statesmen, ought to scrutinize every work before they give it the high sanction of the vote of this body. I will not undertake to say that this work does not do credit to the author; but I do undertake to say, that before it is sent to the world under the sanction of this body, it should undergo the rigid scrutiny of the Senate.

When we publish a book it is not like sending the work of an individual to the world. What right have we to take up a history compiled by any foreign agent, and publish it by our authority, and yield to it our sanction, for the purpose of giving it importance in the eyes of the community?

Why, sir, it is an invitation to every foreign agent who is possessed of rare faculties and of ability sufficient to compile a work of this character to do so, and to submit it to the President of the United States, or to any Department of the Government, and have it sent throughout the country, indorsed by this body. I repeat, that I believe, if this work were now before the Senate, and were to undergo the rigid scrutiny of the body, it is very questionable whether it would order its publication at all. The amount of money involved did not operate on my mind at all; and I will do my honorable colleague on the committee, the Senator from Maine, [Mr. Fessenden,] the justice to say that I think it had as little influence with him. The proposition to print extra copies of the first branch of the work, which gives a description of the Government of France, under the exciting scenes incident to that country in its numerous revolutions, did not meet with any countenance at all at the hands of the committee. There was a greater inclination to examine, with an anxious desire to recommend, if they could, the proposition to print an increased number of the penal codes submitted to us.

But, sir, where is the necessity of publishing a work of that kind? I believe there is but a solitary State in this Union where the civil code prevails, and that is the State of Louisiana. What sort of benefit can accrue to this country, or what sort of light can be shed on the country, by the publication by the Senate, of this report on penal codes? The work may or may not be creditable to the author. If it be creditable to him, if it be one in which he takes a pride, and which he thinks would give him fame, let him publish it at his own expense, and by his own authority; but let him not ask us to send it to the world as indorsed by the Senate of the United States.

For these reasons I am opposed not only to the publication of the first branch of the work, but also decidedly opposed to increasing the number of the second branch. I entertain the views which I have stated honestly, and with proper respect to the distinguished gentleman who has compiled the work; but, at the same time, my object is to guard the Senate from the indorsement of a work about which they know nothing, and about which the committee themselves at this time can know but little. I trust the Senate will concur in the report.

Mr. SEWARD. What is the amount of the appropriation?

Mr. FITZPATRICK. The regular printing which has been ordered of this report will cost about $550.

Mr. FESSENDEN. As a member of the Committee on Printing, it is proper that I should say a word. The simple fact is, the diplomatic agent of the Government in France undertook to send to the Department of State a work compiled by him in relation to the different changes which have taken place in the Government of France since 1848. This was done on his own mere motion, without the instructions of anybody, or without a recommendation from any quarter calling for its preparation. He has also sent a sort of analytical digest, or résumé of the different penal codes of the several Governments of Europe, and that he predicated on a recommendation made, I think, by President Fillmore, that our penal code in the United States should be examined and revised. That was also of his own motion, grounded on the hint in the President's message.

If the Senate had understood originally what it was when it was communicated to the Senate, and when the motion was made to print the usual number of copies, I think the question of the propriety of printing it at all, might well have been considered. I doubt very much the propriety of a diplomatic agent abroad undertaking, on his own motion, to compile a work of this sort, to send to the country the products of his own labor, and then to have it sent to this body, and ordered to be printed at the expense of the Government, when it contains no information of any particular and immediate value to the country. And, sir, if I had been in the Senate when the report was presented and laid upon the table, and I had understood it, I should certainly have questioned decidedly the propriety of printing it at all.

The work consists of two parts. As to the first part, which is more curious than valuable, if I was for publishing the information that the report contains, I should prefer to publish that, because we cannot so well get at it. But every Senator will see that it is not our business to collect information of this description from our diplomatic agents, and print it for the benefit of the country. With regard to the other part, if a commission should be raised to reform our penal code, they would derive very little information from a work of such a character as it is; they would go to the original codes to understand the subject, and could make but very little use of such an analytical index as this. With regard to both of them, my opinion was, and is, that the mistake was originally, and would be originally always, in reference to papers of this description, coming thus uncalled for, from any of our diplomatic agents in the printing of them at all for circulation.

In addition to that, I will refer merely to the little amount of money that is involved—$100 for the additional copies, and $550 for the original printing. That would be of no particular consequence in the matter, but the precedent is something. If we make ourselves merely a sort of committee here for the printing of the results of the labors of gentlemen abroad, in the diplomatic service of the country, upon matters which are not of public advantage, and contain information that can be had by anybody seeking for it from other sources, we shall have enough on our hands to do; and in this case we shall be setting a bad example that may work very injuriously.

This cannot be placed on the same ground as that on which commercial information is gathered, the results of which undoubtedly may be very beneficial to the country, and for that reason their publication by us may be justified. But information of this kind, which is merely professional and legal, could and would be studied and hunted out by political and legal gentlemen. The printing of this document, I think, would be adopting a course of procedure in reference to these things which we should not adopt. It has been said that it will cost only $100; but the amount of cost is of no sort of consequence. The committee did not look at the expense. They looked merely at the thing itself; and we did not think we should be doing justice to ourselves or to the country, whose money we have charge of to a certain extent, by ordering the printing of an additional number of copies of a work, from which I can perceive very little advantage to be derived.

Mr. SEWARD. In regard to the setting of this precedent, I differ entirely from the honorable Senator from Maine. It is, of course, a precedent; but a precedent which will be of very little service. But what is precedent? The precedent is, that we print, at the expense of the Government, information deemed to be valuable, acquired by our Ministers residing in foreign countries. That is the extent of the precedent. Now, although we have a great many Ministers in various countries, all over the world, I think that the number of those who give their attention to such labors as those under consideration is very small. Mr. Sanford has devoted his attention to an important subject, and has attained an extraordinary mass of information, which, it was thought, would be useful in some of the Departments of our Government, and so has sent this report; and the question now is, shall we print it?

My mind goes back to the case when Mr. Jefferson sent home a great deal of valuable agricultural and political information, which he compiled when in France. It was published, though not by Congress, at that time. I am sure that the propriety of publishing at that day what Mr. Jefferson thus sent home has been admitted, because Congress has since ordered it to be published.

I recollect a second case, that of Chancellor Livingston, who sent home information of vast value, and which gave a new impulse to the true policy and interests of agriculture in this country. I am sure that all will now agree that it would have been better to have published that information at the time it was received.

Then I remember that the Hon. Mr. Wheaton, now deceased, has given us a history of the law of nations. No money could ever have been expended in the United States more profitably than would have been expended if that history had been published. I am sure, then, the publication of the information now in question will do no harm, while it may do some good; and I think, probably, much good, inasmuch as the attention of Congress has already been directed to the subjects which are understood to be embraced in the report. Moreover, there is no probability that too many of our foreign representatives will devote themselves to labors of this kind.

Mr. BADGER. I hope the Senate will order the printing of one thousand additional copies of this report. It will be an increased expenditure of $100. Now, I do not agree with my friend from Maine, [Mr. Fessenden,] that the consideration of the expense is not a material item in the inquiry. A work of this kind may have a certain value attached to it which will make it very proper to expend $100 in the printing of it, but which certainly would not justify the expenditure of $10,000. I think, therefore, the expenditure is a material item to be taken into consideration, in agreeing or disagreeing to the proposition to print.

The Senator from Maine says that this work, when published, will not answer the purpose for which it was suggested, in furnishing the aid necessary to assist in the compilation of our own laws, or the revising of our own system, because those persons who may be employed in the work, if they possess the requisite qualifications, will go to the original sources of knowledge. That they will go there may be true, but the inference which is drawn from that fact, that this work will be of no service, I think is a mistake. In every investigation of that kind, no matter what may be the qualifications of the men who are engaged in its prosecution, the possession of a full analytical digest, and specific reference to the different heads of subjects which they may desire to consult, may be of use.

At all events, this is but an expenditure of $100 for the purpose of printing one thousand copies of this book, which may be of service, which may be of general interest to the country, which may accomplish good, and which, as I think the Senator from New York has justly said, can do no harm by setting a bad precedent. I hope, therefore, the Senate will agree to its printing. At all events, I would say that I think we had better dispose of the matter in some way or other, or we will spend more money in the value of the time which we consume debating it than it would take to do the printing.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. It is not the amount that I am contending for. But I simply wish to say, that the publication of the works of the distinguished gentleman who have been alluded to, made a great impression not only upon Congress, but upon the country; and the rare endowments of those gentlemen showed the propriety of perpetuating and handing them down to posterity. Now, I will ask the gentlemen who have discussed this question, if there is a solitary man in the Senate who understands what he is voting for when he votes to increase the number published? The honorable Senator from Tennessee says he has never read the work; nor have I. You have, however, the unanimous report of the committee against its printing; and I again ask the Senate, if there is a Senator upon this floor who understands what is contained in that work? The committee were at one time inclined to wait for the publication of the work, and examine it, before acting upon the proposition to print an extra number; and if we thought it creditable to the gentleman, and useful to the country, to agree to that proposition; but on further examination, the committee determined unanimously, although with some hesitation, not to recommend an increased number. That is the point. If gentlemen vote for the printing of the work now, they will be voting for that which they do not understand, and which the committee did not understand, except what they obtained from a glance at its index. The Senate has no information as to its real merits.

Mr. STUART. If there is no other way of getting rid of the subject, I move that it lie on the table.

Mr. WELLER. Let us have a vote.

Mr. STUART. If there is a disposition to vote, I withdraw my motion.

The question was taken, and the report of the committee was agreed to.

RENOVATION OF THE HALL.

Mr. STUART. I beg leave to submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That when the Senate adjourns to-morrow, it shall be until Monday next.

Mr. DAWSON. We had better not consider that resolution at present. If the House concur in the resolution which we passed yesterday, there will be no necessity for passing this.

The PRESIDENT. If there be objection, it cannot be considered at this time.

Mr. STUART. I hope the Senator will not object to its consideration.

Mr. DAWSON. My reason for it is this: If the House agree to the resolution which we passed yesterday, there will be no necessity for taking up these carpets.

Mr. GWIN. I hope the Senator from Georgia will not object to the resolution. There is no prospect of the House acting to-day on the one which we passed yesterday. They are in Committee of the Whole; and it will not be acted upon to-day. I hope, therefore, he will withdraw his objection. I desire to make a suggestion to the Senator from Michigan, that we shall adopt the same rule which was adopted in the House, that these heavy chairs be taken out, and that we have lighter and more convenient ones placed here for the summer.

Mr. DAWSON. I should have no objection to the resolution, unless the House should not concur in the resolution which we passed yesterday. If they do not concur, it would be proper for us to adopt such a motion as this.

The PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, the resolution will be considered. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. STUART. I desire simply to make a suggestion in connection with the resolution, if there be no objection. It is not expected that there will be a session to-morrow, but that the officers will meet here and adjourn without any regular session. I submit also, to the Senator from California, that if he wishes his proposition adopted, he had better submit it separately.

Mr. GWIN. I hope that both will be considered together.

The PRESIDENT. That will be the effect of the resolution.

Mr. GWIN. Will the object which I desire be attained without making the proposition specially?

The PRESIDENT. It will.

The resolution was agreed to.

Subsequently, in the middle of the speech of Mr. For,

Mr. BADGER said: Mr. President, an order was made this morning that the Senate would adjourn over from to-morrow to Monday. Several gentlemen are going away—the Senator from Michigan among others—and I think we ought to have some understanding as to whether we are to meet on Monday for the purpose of doing business, or to adjourn over to the succeeding Thursday.

Mr. STUART. To adjourn over.

Mr. GWIN. I hope it will be understood that we meet on Monday to do business. The Secretary says he can have the Hall in perfect order at that time. He can have the carpets taken up and the Chamber prepared for us; and I hope it is not the intention of any Senator to be here, and not commence business on Monday.

Mr. BADGER. Is it understood that we shall meet to do business?

Several Senators. Yes! Yes!

Mr. BADGER. Suppose we should not have a quorum.

Mr. GWIN. Let us try that.

Mr. STUART. There is no prospect of having a quorum. Gentlemen may come here disposed to do business, and I will come here too. I will come with the expectation that we shall be obliged to adjourn without a quorum.

Mr. JOHNSON. Not only will there be no quorum, but those who are taking this little recess now—which is but a short one—will not anticipate being back, I am certain from what I have heard—and I have heard a number talk about it—until to-morrow week; and as the House has not acted on the resolution which we passed yesterday, it is not probable that this will make much difference in our proceeding with business.

Mr. BADGER. By way of ascertaining what is the sense of the Senate, I move that when the Senate adjourns on Monday next, it be to meet on Thursday next thereafter.

Mr. GWIN. I ask for the yeas and nays on the motion.

Mr. DAWSON. I will make one suggestion which it is proper should go out to the country. This body is at least six weeks in advance of the House of Representatives.

Mr. GWIN. We have the two great questions of the age to discuss.

Mr. DAWSON. And if we were to act on all the business before us it would still lie in a pile in the other House. If we take a little recess now for convenience and for comfort, in order to better dispatch the public business when we return, where is the impropriety? Why come here and do nothing; sit for an hour or two and then adjourn upon the ground that the other branch of Congress is behind us? Why not let us take a little recess at once to reinvigorate ourselves, and come back better prepared for business?

Mr. FITZPATRICK. It is with great difficulty we have kept a quorum for the last three weeks, or a month. I came here shyly after the commencement of the session, and since I came, I have been here at all times. I agree with the Senator from Georgia. I am satisfied from what has occurred between other Senators and myself, that it is out of the question to expect a quorum here on Monday.

Mr. STUART. There is no prospect of it.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. I am compelled to leave here for the north, and I cannot promise to be back before the close of the week. To those of us who have been here in season and out of season, and are literally fatigued and worn out, it is as little as ought to be extended to us, to give us permission to be absent for that short time. I have conversed with several Senators, and my decided opinion is, that we need not hope to have a quorum here on Monday. There are many important questions before the Senate. I have conversed with my honorable friend from California in regard to them. I am anxious to vote on every one of them; but, situated as I am, I am compelled to be absent, and I trust the understanding will be that we are not to expect a quorum on Monday.

Mr. GWIN. This is an extraordinary comment on what we heard yesterday from the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. STUART,] and the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. PETTIT,] that our tables were loaded down with business, that we were overwhelmed with business now ready for action.

Mr. PETTIT. So we are.

Mr. GWIN. I know there is business enough for us to commence on Monday morning at eleven o'clock, and work every day to the hour that a majority of this body has fixed upon for a recess. And I hope that in good faith, having indicated the day on which we shall take a recess, we shall act upon it. If I thought we were going to lose all the week—

Mr. STUART. I beg my friend to let me interrupt him. We had better either vote on this proposition or let the Senator from Vermont go on with his speech.

Mr. GWIN. If he will give way I will move to go into Executive session.

Mr. STUART. Let us have a vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. WELLER in the chair.) The question is on the motion, that when the Senate adjourns on Monday next, it be to meet on the Thursday next thereafter.

Mr. GWIN. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken—resulted yeas 20, nays 16; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Atchison, Badger, Bell, Cass, Clay, Clayton, Dawson, Evans, Fish, Fitzpatrick, Fox, Johnson, Jones of Tennessee, Norris, Pratt, Rusk, Seward, Shidell, Stuart, and Sumner—20.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Brodhead, Brown, Dodge of Wisconsin, Douglas, Fessenden, Gillette, Gwin, Hamlin, Hunter, Mallory, Pettit, Sebastian, Toombs, Walker, and Weller—16.

So the motion was agreed to.

PENSION FOR SERVICES IN EXECUTING THE FUGITIVE SLAVE LAW.

The following resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. ADAMS, was considered and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Pensions be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law a suitable pension for the support of the widow and children, if any, of the late James Bacheelder, of Massachusetts, who was killed while assisting the marshal of the United States, for that State, in executing an act of Congress.

PATENT OFFICE REPORT.

Mr. BADGER. It will be recollected that we passed a resolution on the 29th instant for ordering the additional copies of the agricultural portion of the Patent Office report for the use of the Senate, to be printed by the printer of the Senate. Since that time, the two Houses have agreed to a provision in the deficiency bill which relieves the subject of our printing from the complication which has heretofore been attached to it. In order to avoid, if necessary, any conflict, I think it better, perhaps, that the Senate should rescind the resolution adopted on the 29th, and by a new resolution order the printing of the additional copies, the consequence of which will be that they will be printed, of course, as directed by the amendment to the law contained in the deficiency bill. When the President has signed the deficiency bill, they will be printed, of course, by the printer of this body, without giving the special direction. I therefore lay these resolutions on the table, but do not ask for their consideration now, because they would be liable to the same objection, if adopted to-day, as if adopted on the 29th. I will call them up as soon as we shall receive notice from the President that he has signed the deficiency bill.

The resolutions are as follows:

Resolved, That the resolution for printing certain additional copies of the agricultural portion of the Patent Office report, agreed to by the Senate on the 29th instant be, and it is hereby, rescinded.

Ordered, That there be printed for the use of the Senate forty thousand additional copies of the same, with the plates accompanying it, of which five thousand copies shall be for the use of the Patent Office.

DEFICIENCY BILL.

A message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McKEAN, Chief Clerk, announcing that they had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, on the bill to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1854.

Also, that the Speaker of the House had signed the bill; which was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

STEAMER EL PARAGUAY.

Mr. HAMLIN. The Committee on Commerce have directed me to report back the bill from the House, to authorize a register to be issued to the steamer El Paraguay by a new name, without amendment, and to recommend its passage. I ask for its consideration at this time.

The bill was accordingly considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to issue a register to the American-built steamer El Paraguay, by the name of V. H. Joy, she having been condemned as unseaworthy, and sold in a Brazilian port, but is now lying at the port of New Orleans, and owned by an American citizen.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read a third time, and passed.

NOTARIES PUBLIC.

On motion by Mr. CHASE, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill supplementary to an act entitled "An act to authorize notaries public to take and certify oaths, affirmations, and acknowledgments in certain cases."

The object of the bill is to confer on notaries public in the District of Columbia, the same powers as are conferred on notaries public in the States and Territories by the act mentioned.

Mr. CHASE. I offer the following amendment:

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That notaries public be, and they are hereby, authorized to take depositions, and do other acts in relation to evidence to be used in the courts of the United States, in the same manner and with the same effect as commissioners to take acknowledgments of bail and affidavits may now lawfully take or do.

The amendment was agreed to, the bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in. The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read a third time, and passed.

CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

Mr. BENJAMIN, during the pendency of the bill last mentioned, said: I moved the other day a reconsideration of the vote of the Senate, adopting the resolution to subscribe for five thousand and twenty-two additional copies of the Congressional Globe and Appendix. It has been suggested to me by some gentlemen, that the reconsideration of that vote would probably be attended with the same result as before. Therefore, in order not to consume the valuable time of the Senate to no purpose, I have consented to withdraw the motion to reconsider, if the Senate will give me unanimous consent to do so.

Mr. CHASE. I hope that proposition will lie over for the present.

When the bill was disposed of, Mr. CHASE withdrew his objection; and Mr. BENJAMIN, by unanimous consent, withdrew his motion to reconsider; so that the resolution stands finally passed, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he is hereby, directed to contract with the proprietor of the Globe for five thousand and twenty-two additional copies of the Congressional Globe and Appendix for the present Congress.

INDIGENT INSANE VETO.

On motion by Mr. GWIN, the Senate resumed the reconsideration of the bill entitled "An act making a grant of public lands to the several States of the Union for the benefit of indigent insane persons;" which had been returned by the President of the United States, with his objections.

Mr. HUNTER. I propose to say something on this bill. I can go on now if no other Senator wishes to proceed. If any other gentleman desires to speak, I will give way.

Mr. CASS. I design to say something on the bill. If the Senate are determined to vote at this time, I will say it now; but if not, I would rather not speak at present. I am entirely ready to proceed, and will do so now if the Senate wish to take the vote to-day. There are other gentlemen also, I believe, who intend to give their views on the subject.

Mr. GWIN. I wish to make this suggestion: That on Tuesday next, before we adjourn, we take the vote on this question. It has been before the Senate for weeks, and should be disposed of.

Mr. HUNTER. If the Senate will allow me two minutes to get some papers, I will go on to-day.

Mr. STUART. If the Senator from Virginia will yield me the floor, I will move to postpone the further consideration of this subject until to-morrow or Monday. It is not justice to the Senator, nor to the Senate, nor to the country, to go into the discussion of this question at the present time. There can be no particular haste about it. It is known to everybody that this bill cannot be passed by a two third vote. Whatever importance there is attaching to the discussion, therefore, is simply that which attaches to the importance a member may feel to deliver his own views on the question. At what time this shall be done, whether this week or next week, cannot be of much importance. After the temporary adjournment which we are about to have, the Senate will be full, and then we can go on with the discussion. There are several Senators who desire to express their views on this subject, and certainly it is desirable to have a full Senate to vote on it. I hope, therefore, the Senate will postpone its consideration until to-morrow or Monday. A day or two cannot be of much importance.

Mr. GWIN. The Senator from Michigan has given the strongest argument that could possibly be used why the Senator from Virginia should go on to-day. If this question is to be further discussed, why not discuss it now, when nothing else is pressing on us? I hope we shall have a speech to-day, and on Monday, or Tuesday at furthest, proceed to vote. The Senator from Virginia is ready to proceed, and in a few moments will be able to make his speech. He wants to put his views before the country, and he ought to have an opportunity of doing it now.

Mr. HUNTER. I have certainly no wish to speak to-day; but I do not wish to delay action on this bill. I have something to say; I can go on to-day or at any time.

Several SENATORS. Now! Now!

Mr. HUNTER. This bill has been so often delayed because gentlemen were not ready to proceed with its consideration that I feel bound, as I was one of those who urged originally that it should have precedence over all other business, to go on to-day though under some disadvantageous circumstances. He then proceeded to deliver his views at large in opposition to the bill, and in favor of the doctrines of the President's veto message.

[The speech will be found in the Appendix.]

Mr. FOOT followed in support of the bill, and in opposition to the veto.

[The speech will be found in the Appendix.]

Mr. GWIN. I hope this subject will be passed over until to-morrow. I want to have an Executive session. I therefore move to postpone its further consideration until to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

REORGANIZATION OF THE NAVY.

Mr. MALLORY. I desire informally to submit several amendments to the bill for the reorganization of the Navy, which I reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs some days since. These amendments are offered at the instance of the committee. I offer them now for the purpose of having them printed.

They were ordered to be printed.

MARINE HOSPITAL AND MINT.

Mr. SLIDELL submitted the following resolutions; which were considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be requested to communicate to the Senate what is the present condition of the building of the marine hospital, near New Orleans, and what sum will be necessary to put it into a perfect state of repair, and whether there be in his opinion such an inconvenience attending the present location of said marine hospital as to require the erection of a building for that purpose at some other point.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be requested to communicate to the Senate what is the present condition of the building of the United States branch Mint at New Orleans; what sum will be necessary to put the same in a proper state of repair; and whether there be any such damage in the original structure as would, in his opinion, consistent with wise economy, render it expedient to erect a new building on the present site of said branch Mint.

RAMSAY INVESTIGATION.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. I move to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted in reference to publishing certain papers connected with the Ramsay investigation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion will be entered on the Journal.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On motion by Mr. GWIN, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of Executive business; and, after some time spent therein, the doors were reopened,

And the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, May 31, 1854.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. WILLIAM H. MILBURN.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by the hands of ASBURY DICKINS, their Secretary, informing the House that the Senate had agreed to the report of the conferees on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill to supply the deficiencies for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1854.

Also, that the Senate had passed an act (H. R. No. 318) entitled "An act to authorize the selection of school districts, in lieu of the sixteenth sections, within the twelve miles square reservation, State of Alabama."

Also, that the Senate had passed an act (S. 372) entitled "An act in favor of Charles D. Arfwedson."

Also, that the Senate had adopted a joint resolution that the two Houses shall adjourn from the first Monday in July to the third Monday in October.

THE DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. GREEN, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported as correctly enrolled the following bill; which thereupon received the signature of the Speaker: House bill No. 271, being "An act to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1854."

THE INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the Indian appropriation bill, with the Senate amendments thereto, be taken up, and committed to the Committee of Ways and Means. The gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. ORR,] who objected to that disposition of the bill, is willing, I understand, to withdraw his objection.

Mr. ORR. I am desirous, Mr. Speaker, to withdraw my objection to that disposition of the Indian appropriation bill. I examined yesterday the precedents, and find that for fifteen years past it has been the practice to commit the Indian appropriation bill to the Committee of Ways and Means. Previous to that time, it was the custom to have it committed to the Committee of the Whole House; but I think it may be properly referred to the Committee of Ways and Means. I therefore withdraw my objection to that disposition being made of it.

The bill was therefore committed to the Committee of Ways and Means.

PAY OF POSTMASTERS.

Mr. OLDS. I desire to report back from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads a bill which passed this House almost unanimously. It has been returned from the Senate, with amendments; and I propose that the amendments be concurred in, as the committee recommends such concurrence. I suppose that the bill can be disposed of in a few minutes, as there will be no opposition to it.

Mr. LETCHER. Read the title of the bill, so as to let us know what the purport of it is.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to inquire, with reference to the Indian appropriation bill, which was before the House a moment ago, whether an order has been made as to the printing of the amendments adopted by the Senate?

Mr. HOUSTON. No order has been made on the subject. I ask for none. It is not usual in committing a bill to a standing committee that it should be printed. These amendments are very long, and it would be expensive to have them printed; but if the House desire that they should be printed, I shall have no objection.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Then I hope that the amendments will be ordered to be printed, so that the House may be able to act understandingly on them.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I hope not. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. CLINGMAN] will see, that if the amendments are printed now, it will be necessary to reprint them when the Committee of Ways and Means shall report them back with recommendations. And the proper time to have them printed is when they shall be reported back.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I withdraw my objection.

Mr. OLDS. The bill which I desire to have disposed of now, is an act regulating the pay of deputy postmasters. The Senate have returned this bill with an amendment; and the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads have instructed me to report an amendment to the Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER. If it be the pleasure of the House, the Senate amendment will be read for information.

The Senate amendment was then read, as follows:

Strike out all after the word "Provided," to the end of the bill, and insert in lieu thereof as follows:

That to any postmaster of a distributing office, at which the commissions, allowances, and emoluments, since the 31st day of March, 1853, have been insufficient to defray actual and necessary expenses, and afford the postmaster the annual compensation derived from commissions at the office before said 30th of March, the Postmaster General may, in his discretion, allow quarterly, from the date aforesaid, out of the postages collected at any such office, an amount sufficient to supply such deficiency: Provided further, That to any postmaster of a separating office, whose commissions, allowances, and emoluments may be found insufficient to provide the extra labor necessary to a prompt and efficient performance of the duties of separating and dispatching the mails passing through his office, the Postmaster General may make such quarterly allowance out of the postages collected at such office as he may deem sufficient to compensate such extra labor. This act shall take effect, and be in force, from and after the commencement of the next fiscal quarter after its passage.

Mr. OLDS. The Clerk will now read the amendment recommended by the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

The amendment was read, as follows:

After the word "labor," in the Senate amendment, insert:

Provided further, That the commissions and allowances authorized by this act shall be subject to the provisions of the forty-first section of the act entitled "An act to reduce into one the several acts establishing and regulating the Post Office Department:" And provided further, That the Postmaster General may, in his discretion, dispose of any quarterly returns of mails sent or received, which were made up previous to the first day of July, 1850, preserving the accounts current, and all vouchers accompanying such accounts, and use such portion of the proceeds thereof as may be necessary to defray the cost of separating and disposing of the same.

Mr. LETCHER. I hope the bill will be printed, so that we may have an opportunity to see what it is, and to compare it with the original bill. I have no idea of giving any such discretion as that mentioned in the amendments to any officer.

Mr. OLDS. If the House will allow me, I will explain the difference between the amendment of the Senate and the amendment proposed by the House Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. HOUSTON. There is not a sufficient number of members here to pass the bill now.

Mr. OLDS. As there may be some doubt of there being a quorum present, I will withdraw the bill for the present.

Mr. HOUSTON. Now, I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. OLIVER, of Missouri. Will the gentleman withdraw that motion for a moment, to allow me to introduce a bill?

Mr. HOUSTON. I will, if he simply desires to introduce and refer it.

SURVEY OF PUBLIC LANDS IN KANSAS.

Mr. OLIVER then, by unanimous consent, introduced the following bill; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands:

A bill to provide for the survey and sale of the public lands in the Territory of Kansas, and to establish a land office therein.

IMPROVEMENT OF CAPE FEAR RIVER.

Mr. FULLER. If the gentleman from Alabama will allow me, I wish to make an adverse report from the Committee on Commerce, and to move that it be referred to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. COBB. If the gentleman proposes to make a report, and to refer it to the Committee of the Whole, I think it would be proper that the committees should be called, and allow them an opportunity to report.

Mr. FULLER. I have half a dozen bills which I would like to report.

Mr. COBB. Then insist upon having a morning hour, and you can do it.

Mr. ASHE. I hope the gentleman [Mr. COBB] will withdraw his objection.

Mr. COBB. Oh, I will withdraw it.

The bill was then read by its title, as follows:

An act making further appropriation for the improvement of Cape Fear river, in North Carolina.

Mr. FULLER. The committee report adversely upon that bill, and I move that it be referred to the Committee of the Whole.

No objection being made, it was so referred.

ADJOURNMENT OF CONGRESS.

Mr. CUTTING. Before the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOUSTON] urges his motion, I should like to make a suggestion. It is this: I consider it of the highest importance, in reference to the public business, that we should now, if possible, fix upon some day for an adjournment. As respects myself it is somewhat a matter of indifference what day may be fixed upon. But until we do name the day, I am satisfied that there will be little, if any, business transacted. The moment that a day is fixed, there will be a great urgency in reference to the business before the House, and we shall always, probably, have a majority, and a very large number of members present. I think we can then dispose of all the business before the House which requires action within a reasonable time.

Mr. HENN. I object to any debate, unless all sides can be heard.

Mr. CUTTING. Agreed. Let us take the question up now.

Mr. HENN. I object to taking it up.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Alabama withdraw his motion?

Mr. HOUSTON. I do not. I should prefer that there should be a better attendance of members when the question is taken on the adjournment than there is at present. Besides that, the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. PERKINS] yielded the floor yesterday that the deficiency bill might be taken up, and it is due to him that he should have an opportunity of speaking to-day. I therefore insist on my motion.

Mr. CUTTING. I hope it will be voted down.

Mr. BOCOCK. I ask for tellers on the motion of the gentleman from Alabama.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. ASHE and OLDS were appointed.

The question was then taken; and the tellers reported—ayes 96, noes 39.

So the motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. BOCOCK in the chair.)

PACIFIC RAILROAD.

The CHAIRMAN. When the committee last rose, they had under consideration House bill No. 295, being a bill to provide for the construction of the Pacific railroad, upon which the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. PERKINS] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. PERKINS, of Louisiana said: I rise, Mr. Chairman, suffering from much physical debility, to discharge what I consider to be a duty. A few months since, at the request of Speaker BOND, I introduced an amendment originally moved by himself, to the land bill of the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNETT] then pending before this House. When I offered it, it did not occur to me that it imposed upon me the responsibility of its discussion. I must say, however, that after an examination of its principles and the guards thrown around their application, I feel myself under obligation to the honorable Speaker for having directed my attention to the bill. There is a great deal in it that commands my respect, and nothing to which I can object. It is my purpose to-day to discuss this bill. I would have spoken on it last week had not its consideration been postponed.

The introduction of the subject of which it treats by gentlemen who have spoken in connection with the Pacific railroad, and the fact that the public lands are under discussion at this time in the other branch of Congress, and are, from peculiar circumstances, attracting attention throughout the country, must be my apology for speaking on the subject to-day.

There is imposed upon me, however, a higher duty which I must first discharge. I observed in the Intelligencer of this morning, an address, signed by some five gentlemen, members of this body, Representatives from the State of New York, with only one of whom I have any personal acquaintance, and only two of whom are known to me by sight. An address from a member of Congress to his constituents is ordinarily a document somewhat sacred in its character. The relation existing justifies a freedom in the treating of public measures that, under other circumstances, might provoke criticism. With the immunity of gentlemen in this respect I have no disposition to interfere. There are sentiments and statements, however, in this address which, coming from Washington, and published by request in a paper of so extended an influence as the Intelligencer, the national organ of a great party in the country, makes it necessary for me, a Representative from Louisiana, and having the floor on the morning of its issue, to say something. I will read that portion of the address upon which I intend to remark:

"Events daily transpiring constrain us to believe that the annulment of the Missouri compromise act of 1820 is the first of a series of measures, long premeditated and deliberately pursued, having for their object the formation of a great sectional or southern party, of which the present Executive designs to become the leader."

It proceeds:

"In order to win the South and propitiate the favor of her citizens, in addition to the repeal of the prohibition of slavery north of latitude 36° 30', it is designed to obtain, regardless of expense to the National Treasury, additional territory from Mexico. The Gadsden treaty, recommended by the President to the Senate for confirmation, stipulated to pay Santa Anna the extravagant sum of $20,000,000 for a mere fragment of territory, to supply additional resources to the slave States. This treaty, modified in many essential particulars, has been returned to Mexico, and is now in progress of negotiation."

If the address had stopped here, although regretting such a charge from such a source, I should not have noticed it. It continues:

"In pursuance of the same political scheme, it was determined, at an early day, to acquire Cuba, utterly reckless of consequences. To that end a gentleman was selected to represent this country at the Court of Madrid, whose appointment occasioned alarm in the minds of those who were acquainted with his disposition, manners, and political sentiments. Whether he attempted to open negotiations for the peaceable acquisition of Cuba, is not known, but it is certain that no success attended his efforts, if any were made. The seizure of the steamer Black Warrior by the authorities at Havana, afforded Mr. Soule, as we are credibly informed, the opportunity to address a communication to the Spanish Government so insolent in its tone, so peremptory in manner, and couched in language of a character so insulting, as to render compliance with his demands in the highest degree improbable."

Sir, this statement having appeared, and finding it before me on my desk, I could not, to-day, address the House on another subject without first alluding to it.

A MEMBER. Who are the persons signing it? Mr. PERKINS. Gentlemen will find the names of the persons signing it appended to it, in the National Intelligencer.

Sir, I know nothing of these measures, or of these efforts gentlemen speak of in connection with the formation of a great sectional party. Coming, as I do, from the extreme South, I have listened with deep attention to everything that has been said affecting southern institutions; and so far as my constitutional convictions would allow me, I have united in the efforts to secure, not a sectional advantage, but the enunciation of a great constitutional right. If that, sir, is one of the measures alluded to by gentlemen as designed to create a great sectional party, I must differ with them in opinion.

With reference to the additional territories to be acquired from Mexico "regardless of expense," I have nothing further to say than to point to the fact that instead of the sum of $20,000,000 demanded by the Mexican Government having been agreed to, the amount has been reduced during negotiations by the President and his advisers from $20,000,000 to $10,000,000. This indicates some attention, at least, to expense.

But, Mr. Chairman, I proceed. The address says, that "in pursuance of the same political scheme, it was determined at an early day to acquire Cuba, regardless of consequences." What political scheme? A scheme to propitiate the South by the passage of the Nebraska bill; the purchase of Mexican territory, regardless of expense, and the acquisition of Cuba, regardless of consequences, in order to build up a great sectional party, of which President Pierce might be the head? Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not stand here as the special friend of this Administration, to laud General Pierce or any other man; but there is manifestly a very wide difference between these gentlemen and myself in our estimate of both General Pierce and his Administration. When the President acts in accordance with principles which I believe to be just and national, I give him my support. When he utters a sentiment which is noble and patriotic, I adopt it; and if it falls within my line of argument to do so, I repeat it, giving him credit for having uttered it. With the political opinions, however, of these gentlemen, or with their disposition towards the President, I have no concern.

But the address proceeds; and, speaking of a distinguished gentleman from my own State, engaged abroad in the service of his country, and necessarily precluded from making any defense for himself, arraigns before the country his disposition and his manners, as well as his political opinions.

Now, Mr. Chairman, of this I have something to say, and it is this: that I regard such an attack as neither manly, chivalric, nor in accordance with that courtesy towards persons in Mr. Soule's position, which I am led to believe has been the characteristic of gentlemen occupying prominent positions upon this floor.

Sir, I am not the particular friend of Mr. Soule. I am not in correspondence with him. I knew him at the New Orleans bar, as a younger member of the bar would know a man much older; distinguished by his talent, by his history, and in the estimation of my State; and if remarkable for anything, by the admission of all for his amiable and courteous deportment towards all persons. As to his manners, I most certainly, sir, never heard them before made the subject of criticism. That gentlemen may differ with him upon political questions is natural, and such difference is altogether a proper subject of remark; but to go beyond this, in his absence, and under the peculiar circumstances in which he has been placed, I do not think in any degree just; nor do I believe it will be justified by the reflection of the gentlemen themselves.

But, sir, this address does not stop with this. After declaring Mr. Soule to be entirely unsuited for the position which he holds—a position in which they must excuse me for saying I think he has sustained himself in a manner calculated to reflect great credit upon his country—they declare they do not know that he has ever made an effort to acquire Cuba by legitimate and peaceful means, but they do know that he has made no advances toward success! Now, Mr. Chairman, I certainly, with as deep an interest in this subject as either of these gentlemen, and as a member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs likely to learn something of our diplomatic negotiations, know nothing that will at all justify me in asserting what these gentlemen have undertaken to assert. Sir, I deeply regret these allegations. An importance will be attached to them abroad that they do not deserve, and that it was never intended they should have. They, by implication, not only say that our Minister at Madrid was unfitted, by his known opinions, for the position he occupies, but that he has been, since his appointment to Madrid, personally inefficient and indisposed to negotiate for the interest of the country.

The address proceeds: "The seizure of the Black Warrior by the authorities at Havana afforded Mr. Soule, as we are credibly informed, an opportunity to address a communication to the Spanish Government, so insulting in tone, so peremptory in manner, and couched in language of a character so insulting, as to render compliance with his demand in the highest degree improbable." "We are credibly informed?" Now, how credibly informed? Can any of these gentlemen, if they are present, rise here and let us have the advantage of this credible authority. Who is he? It comes not from the Committee on Foreign Affairs. It comes not from the Secretary of State. Where does it come from? "We are credibly informed" of what? That our Minister has bid defiance to the common rules of good breeding? that he has disgraced himself, and inferentially, and as a natural consequence, reflected disgrace upon the country? "Credibly informed!" And all this, sir, is to go forth to the country with the weight and character which attaches to those gentlemen as members of this House. I say nothing in reference to their standing or their estimation. I have every respect for them as members of this House. I know nothing further of them. I deal with them only as I read their expressions in this address, and as I would deal with similar expressions, if uttered by any other members. They say that our Minister has been "insolent!"—a term which carries with it a mental idea. "Peremptory in manner!" "Couched in language so insulting as to render a compliance improbable!" Why, sir, to a reflecting mind, this sentence has within itself its own refutation. Castilian pride is a problem. It was only a few years since the representative of Great Britain left Madrid at two hours notice, under compulsion, and at night, after penning a letter which, by indirection, reflected upon the Spanish Government. And yet, sir, Mr. Soule, notwithstanding his "insolent" and "insulting" letter, I am assured still remains there. Perhaps gentlemen are "credibly informed" that he has received his passports!

But, sir, there is one other thing in this address to which I must allude. I will not read it to the House. It is extended through some twenty lines, and states that the Black Warrior difficulty gave occasion for this action of Mr. Soule, and that there is an intention, in order to add slave territory to the Union, to force the Government into a war with Spain, and that this purpose is so selfish, so entirely for southern aggrandizement, and to make capital for political traders, that they cannot unite in any such scheme; but that, under other circumstances, they would unite in acquiring Cuba.

Now, this is a very remarkable statement, in every aspect in which it can be viewed. That the Black Warrior difficulty gave occasion for this! Why, sir, what had the South to do with the Black Warrior difficulty? It was northern property that was seized. They were northern men who protested. I have in my possession letters from constituents of these gentlemen, copies of those they sent to Mr. Soule, urging him to immediate action, and to the most peremptory tone. And yet, sir, for doing what they asked him to do; for doing what his position required he should do, without a hearing, without waiting for information from the Government, without asking for it, without knowing but what it was ready to be given to them, they brand our Minister as inefficient and unqualified for his position.

Sir, I have nothing more to say upon this subject. If Mr. Soule had been my personal enemy, I would have felt bound to say what I have said; and yet, after what I have said, I feel very unfitted to discuss the question which I intended to discuss.

Mr. Chairman, I cannot conceal from myself that one of the measures referred to in this address, as intended for southern aggrandizement, is the Nebraska bill. Sir, I voted for that bill. I regretted that it consumed so much time. I am glad that it has passed, and that we have now an opportunity of directing our attention to matters of pressing practical importance. I say I voted for it; I gave for it a silent vote. But, as a matter of grace from the North to the South, I would have refused it as the measure of southern rights; I would have protested against it; but, as the interpretation of what was intended by the legislation of 1850, I was willing that it should be entered upon the records of the country. I could not and cannot, however, share in any elation at its passage. On the contrary, I left this House on the night of our final vote upon it with feelings of deep uncontrollable sadness; sadness, not such as sprang from a contrast of the fleeting nature of man, with the record of a great eternal principle about which chafe for the moment his fiercest passions and then subside; but sadness in the conviction that the South was indeed doomed if a measure intended as an interpretation of a great constitutional right, applicable to the North as well as to the South, and designed to restore equality between the States, was for that reason to be regarded as a southern triumph. Let me be not misunderstood. I appreciate the stern and manly sense of justice which prompted many men of the North to vote for that bill. I recognize in their conduct a disposition to do justice to the South. But, sir, as a southern man—as one born under southern institutions, and whose feelings and interests naturally first centre there, could I be insensible to the fact of our diminished influence in the legislation of the country, when we were expected to exult even at the disposition to do us tardy justice. There was a time, Mr. Chairman, when the Constitution of the land was our security and our justice, and Congress did not hesitate to grant protection to southern as well as to northern property.

Can Congress do so now? We are referred to the courts. How long think you this refuge will remain to us? Sir, I drop the subject. I am sick of this constant effort to place the South in a false position. Gentlemen have nothing to fear from southern aggrandizement.

I am glad the gentleman from California [Mr. McDougall] has brought before us the subject of the Pacific railroad, and has advocated it upon principles at once broad and statesman-like. I congratulate the country, too, that the reply made yesterday in opposition to it coming from the quarter it did, [GERRIT SMITH,] was accompanied, with no expression of sectional jealousy such as I regret to find characterising the address upon which I have commented. The Pacific railroad, as urged by the gentleman from California, is a great national measure, and I desire to have the General Government, aid in its construction. I think there are modes in which this aid can be constitutionally given, and I trust its construction will not be associated in any way with party or sectional feeling. The remark of the gentleman from New York [GERRIT SMITH,] that he would vote to purchase Mexican territory if necessary for its construction, even for the benefit of the South, was patriotic and statesman-like. I wish all our legislation could be done in this spirit.

Mr PECKHAM. I desire to say only a word in connection with the remarks made by the gentleman from Louisiana, [Mr. PERKINS.] I am one of the signers of this address; and so far as regards the remarks that have been made concerning Mr. Soule, it was not my intention, or that of any one of the gentlemen who have signed the address, to reflect, in any degree, upon his personal character and standing. And perhaps the word "manners" here, as introduced in the sentence speaking of "the disposition, manners, and sentiments" of Mr. Soule, might as well have been omitted. His manners are the manners of a gentleman, certainly. But, speaking of his political sentiments on that subject, proof might be adduced to support the allegation, if it were deemed at all important or necessary.

So far as regards his action at the Court of Spain, I do not mean to say anything further as yet, except to refer to that which is known to probably every gentleman in this House. Every gentleman in the House is aware of his action as published in the newspapers. There is no allegation here that this is personally known to us as a matter of fact. The statement is made from what we deem to be credible authority—from the information that has been derived on the subject from all the public papers, and which we have never seen contradicted. In regard to all these matters I shall hereafter, if I deem it proper, take occasion probably to present such facts as shall illustrate the true position of things.

So far as regards the efforts as to Cuba, it is not proper for me to take up the time of gentlemen now. What I know on that point I am very willing to state here, and to explain at length when an occasion may call for it; but this I must defer to another occasion.

Mr. PERKINS. I should like, Mr. Chairman, to hear the explanations of the gentleman from New York [Mr. PECKHAM] on this subject. I regret that I cannot give him more time, but he will have an opportunity when I am through with my remarks. His retraction of any intention to personally reflect upon our Minister at Madrid, is what I was led to expect from my slight acquaintance with the gentleman.

Mr. Chairman, I regret that the subject of Cuba, the acquisition of territory from Mexico, and the Nebraska question, should be coupled together in the minds of gentlemen as sectional measures. In the acquisition of Cuba, in the construction of a Pacific railroad, and in the opening of commercial relations with the South American States, I recognize three of the most practically important, and most national measures that can at this time engage the attention of American statesmen. I wish public attention throughout the whole country could be directed to them. If the entire South should unite in advocating any one of these measures, this circumstance should not awaken a sectional jealousy. I wish, indeed, it were possible to have the South so united, and that it could be made to feel that its influence in the Union, always greater from the philosophy of its politics than from numbers, requires now to be sustained by the development of her material resources. I would not have her abate any of her reverence for the Constitution; her security, as that of every minority, depends upon a rigid observance of its provisions. But there are energies in a people far beyond the influence of constitutional opinions, that should be made to tell upon the future. And is the South to be branded as selfish and sectional in her views, if she advocate for once a great practical measure? Sir, she will occupy a most peculiar position, if she does not support the Pacific railroad. Living under a Constitution designed to establish justice and promote the general welfare, we witness, every day, efforts on this floor, to use the whole power and moral force of the Government for the destruction of southern property. Asserting that taxation shall be uniform and equal, the South is, by indirection, paying much the largest portion of the income of the Government. Contending for an interpretation of the Constitution, which forbids the General Government becoming a mere moneyed machine, and applying the public funds for sectional objects, her interpretation is strictly applied only to herself, and practically disregarded towards all other portions of the Union. Under such circumstances, there is a necessity for the South to have united action not only out of this Hall but in it. But such united action does not necessarily imply sectionalism. It may be required to prevent it.

Recollecting, Mr. Chairman, the influence of the South in the formation of this Federal Government, the guarantees of right which were intended to be secured her by the Constitution, and the gradual growth of a false public sentiment at the North, operating through that instrument each year with additional force to weaken these guarantees, and listening, at the same time, to the contrasts between the North and the South so frequently drawn of late by northern men in debate on this floor, and sent out from here by speech or address, as in the one from which I have just read extracts—sometimes terming the South aggressive, and sometimes condemning her political opinions as abstractions, and sometimes her social institutions as criminal—I could not but recall the remarks of an eloquent Frenchman, at a recent date, in defense of the humiliated spirit of France against the material development of England. But slightly paraphrased, the South may use them in no unkind spirit towards the North. "Are we not," said he, "the sons of those who, by the effort of a heroic nationality," did the world's work in establishing for every nation the gospel of equality in the Declaration of Independence?"

Did our fathers mean, by the fraternity expressed in that instrument, that vague, undefined sympathy which welcomes and loves everything; which mingles, bastardizes, confounds. Would it not be a marvel to see the people who but lately reared the beacon light of the future, to which the eyes of the world are turned, walking submissively, and without a murmur, under a sacrifice of right?

Well may northern gentlemen ask, with a smile, what are the results of southern activity, southern commotion, and southern political struggles? Behold the South, if you please, as you have described her, seated on the ground, like Job, and your northern States coming, one by one, to question, to comfort, or it may be, to taunt her. "Where are your ships and your machinery?" asks one. "Where your enterprises of industry?" asks another. "Where your literature and art?" asks another. "Kind sisters," says the French writer, "who come thus to question and comfort" the South, permit me to answer you. She is ill, you see, and there she sits with drooping head, unwilling to speak. Did you pile up all the blood—the gold—the efforts of every kind, disinterestedly expended by each for the advancement of the whole, the pyramid reared out of her would reach the skies; whilst all of sacrifice that could be piled up out of you would reach no higher than a child's knee.

Say not, then, how pale the South is. She has shed her blood for you. Say not how poor she is. For you she has given without counting; and having nothing more to give, she has given her soul, the latent heat of the Constitution; and it is on that you live. All that is now left her is what she has given to others.

Are you surprised that she reverences the Constitution, and that, trusting in it as her best security for the present, and her surest guarantee in the future, she is ready to protest against its slightest violation? It is in this spirit, and not in that of either a selfish fear or a narrow, calculating sectionalism, that the South has, with such a united front, aided the North to put down the dark spirit that, rising up in their midst, engendered by a gloomy fanaticism, has sought recklessly to strike at institutions in whose existence are involved the happiness and prosperity, not of one section, but that of the whole Union.

But I will leave this subject, hoping that the gentleman who has sought the floor will take an early opportunity to give that explanation which he has said will be given.

Mr. PECK. Will the gentleman give way for a moment?

Mr. PERKINS. I will with pleasure, for a moment.

Mr. PECK. I simply desire to say, that I refer the gentleman and the House for the political sentiments of Mr. Soule, to his speech in the Senate on Cuba.

Mr. MAURICE. Will the gentleman from Louisiana yield me the floor for one single observation?

Mr. PERKINS. I have prepared a speech, filled with statistics, on the subject of the public lands, and I came to the House this morning, intending to speak on that subject, but as the gentlemen from New York appear desirous of replying to what I have said, I will, with the permission of the House, deliver at another time, or publish, as I may prefer, the remarks I intended to make. I now yield the floor with pleasure to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. MAURICE. Mr. Chairman, the remarks made by the gentleman from Louisiana, on an address purporting on its face, to be directed exclusively to our constituents, come, it seems to me, with a bad grace from a volunteer defender of an act which he says himself, he regarded with feelings of sadness when he left this Hall after its passage.

Mr. PERKINS. The gentleman will allow me to correct him. I did not regard the passage of that act with anything but satisfaction, or vote for it with feelings of sadness. What I regarded with sadness was the idea that we of the South should be expected to exult at it as a southern triumph. I did not desire that it should hereafter be considered as indicating the extent of southern rights, nor referred to, as the Missouri compromise has been referred to in recent debate, as a southern measure.

Mr. MAURICE. The gentleman is welcome to the effect of his explanation. It does not, it seems to me, present the matter in any very different light.

I did not come here to-day, sir, either prepared or intending to say one single syllable in defense of an act which our duty to our constituents imposed upon us as an act of necessity. If I had had an opportunity, during the progress of the debate, of expressing my sentiments in relation to the Nebraska and Kansas bill, I would, perhaps, never have troubled my constituents or the gentleman from Louisiana with any remarks in relation to that bill, in the form of an address.

The gentleman, after commenting in terms which I hope are satisfactory to him on one portion of the address, proceeded to say that if we had stopped there, although he could not subscribe to the sentiments expressed, he would not have felt it incumbent upon him to have drawn the attention of the House to the subject; but that as a Representative of the State of Louisiana—and permit me to say here, that I regard the members from the State of Louisiana, and particularly one gentleman representing that State, with higher feelings of regard and esteem than any other gentleman upon this floor, save those who come from my own State—as a Louisianian he felt it incumbent upon him to defend the present Minister to Spain from what he supposed to be uncalled for assaults upon that gentleman, and he even went so far as to say that they were neither "manly" nor "chivalric."

Now, I put it to the gentleman, whether there is one single word in all that we have said in relation to the Minister to Spain, that is not fully warranted by the truth? Did not his appointment as Minister to Spain awaken alarm and apprehension? Did not the known opinions and political sentiments of that gentleman induce a feeling of dread and apprehension that was not confined to the North? Did it not extend over the whole country? and has it not been fully justified by the results? The conduct of that gentleman since he has been at Madrid, has brought anything but honor upon the American name. I ask the gentleman from Louisiana, if it is not so? I should be glad to hear the gentleman in reply.

Mr. PERKINS. The gentleman from New York has asked me a question, and desires an answer. I will give him one, but I should prefer doing so after the gentleman has concluded his remarks.

Mr. MAURICE. I will proceed then. The next passage in the address, to which the gentleman from Louisiana chooses to take exception, is that portion wherein we allude to the fact, not as a matter coming within our personal knowledge, but of which we had credible information, that the Black Warrior at Havana afforded to Mr. Soule the opportunity of addressing a communication to the Spanish Court "so insolent in tone, so peremptory in manner, and couched in language of a character so insulting, as to render compliance with his demands in the highest degree improbable." The gentleman from Louisiana takes a great deal of credit upon himself for being a member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs. Is he ignorant of the fact that such a communication was sent?

Mr. PERKINS. I did not hear the remark of the gentleman.

Mr. MAURICE. The gentleman stated that, being on the Committee on Foreign Affairs, he was entirely ignorant that such a communication was ever sent.

Mr. PERKINS. What communication?

Mr. MAURICE. The communication in relation to the Black Warrior, addressed by Mr. Soulé to the Spanish Government.

Mr. PERKINS. I never intended to say any such thing. I spoke of an insolent communication.

Mr. MAURICE. The great objection the gentleman from Louisiana takes to our address is, that we state that a communication, insolent in tone and insulting in manner, was addressed to the Spanish Government. I ask the gentleman whether it has not been published in all the newspapers from the London Times even down to the Washington Union? [Laughter.] Whether, in fact, the correspondent of the London Times did not publish a letter in which he describes almost every one of the demands, and gives us the language in which they are couched; and whether the gentleman from Louisiana, in his capacity as a member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, could not go to the Secretary of State and receive information confirmatory of these facts? We do not state them as matters within our knowledge, but as matters of which we had credible information; and I believe as religiously as I believe any fact, that the gentleman has only to proceed from his seat in this Hall to the Department of State to derive the most convincing evidence of the truth of our assertions.

I did not propose when I rose to say anything more than simply to make a single remark, because I have made arrangements to go home this afternoon. When I return, at the meeting of Congress after the recess, I will take occasion, if it shall become necessary, to vindicate every sentiment and every word contained in the address.

Mr. PERKINS. As the gentleman from New York [Mr. MAURICE] seems to expect a reply, I will make one, although I do not conceive that one is required, for he has so modified what were positive, or what appeared to be positive, assertions into mere matters of opinion, that I am disposed to leave his remarks as the best explanation of the address.

Mr. MAURICE, (interrupting.) They are expressly stated in the address as on information.

Mr. PERKINS. Yes, "on credible information." When members of Congress, however, Mr. Chairman, issue from Washington an address to their constituents, stating as facts matters of which they "are credibly informed," something more is generally understood than mere newspaper reports. I certainly attached more importance to the statements of the address than I could possibly have done to any mere newspaper article; and I have no doubt that gentlemen will find that their dignity and character as representatives of New York will give to what they have asserted on "credible information" an importance throughout the country altogether beyond what it will have, when known to be only the repetition of something that the London Times has said.

One other word, Mr. Chairman. I wish the gentleman from New York [Mr. MAURICE] to know, that whether he designs it or not by his question, he will get no reply from me as a member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs which, by inference or in any way, will give information on the subject of this debate. If he addresses himself to the chairman of that committee, and he (the chairman) thinks it desirable or necessary that any statement should be made, he will, no doubt, make it. The gentleman refers me to the Secretary of State, if I desire to be thoroughly informed, on such and such a point, in regard to the course pursued by our Minister at Madrid. Sir, I do not wish to be obliged to go beyond the gentleman's own statement. I am not here as the special guardian of the character of our Minister at Madrid. I do not deal with men but with principles, nor do I discuss mere opinions; but I will say to the gentleman from New York, lest his pointed expression should have more weight than ought to be attached to it, that passing by the Secretary of State's office this morning, on my way to the House, and just after having read his address, I inquired, in the proper quarter, if our Minister at Madrid had conducted himself in a manner to merit such language as has been applied to him; and the reply I received was, that information of no such conduct had been received at the State Department, nor had there been any thing stated by the State Department from which such conduct might be inferred. After this, sir, it may be supposed I was surprised to learn that the "credible information," spoken of in this address, was nothing more than newspaper report. An imagination has crossed my mind. The gentleman may consider my statement of it unkind, but it is not meant as unkindness, nor will I, by mentioning it, attribute the wrong involved in it to him or to either of the gentlemen who signed the address; but, Mr. Chairman, it must be known to this House and to the country that there prevails a very general impression throughout the country that England and France sometimes assume to represent the interests of Spain; and that information with reference to Cuba and with reference to our Minister at Madrid, is frequently disseminated through these sources, and by some unreflecting persons esteemed credible. It is clear that some such inference, as to the credible authority, might have been drawn from the representation of the gentleman who defends the address here to-day, had he not distinctly stated that his information was drawn from the London Times and other papers.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, the reference made in this debate to the paper which has, for the first time, appeared this morning in the columns of the National Intelligencer, over the signatures of certain members from New York, certainly strips this question, altogether, of the local character which one of these gentlemen attempted to give it. It has been represented to this committee, by one of the gentlemen who have spoken in reference to it, that this address was designed for the constituents of the signers; and yet we see it paraded in one of the leading papers of this city, for the general reading of the whole country, and for the purpose of producing a general effect. Well, sir, I take this occasion to remark that I hope the gentleman will not any more attempt to intimate, either by direction or indirection, that in preparing this address they were merely actuated by the desire to reconcile themselves with their constituents. I hope that gentlemen will always act on the square, and come up manfully to the question, and not affect, for an instant, to desire to be thought that in their action they were desirous to limit its effect to their own constituents, and not to carry out a general object.

I say, sir, that this address was intended to have its effect upon public sentiment. I say it was designed to do injury, deep and vital, to the Democratic party. I wish it distinctly understood, and I wish the country to understand it, that the gentlemen who subscribed this paper can no longer hold themselves as a part and parcel of the Democratic party. [Laughter.]

Mr. PECKHAM. Oh, don't! don't! [Renewed laughter.]

Mr. SMITH. Gentlemen may laugh, but, as a distinguished gentleman once said, there are many sorts of laughter; and, my life upon it, if there is proper intelligence and patriotism among their constituents, theirs will be that kind of laughter which was happily denominated by a celebrated gentleman now no more, as the sardonicus risus.

I wish I had time to read to the committee the extraordinary statements of this paper. It is an open, direct, and most characteristic attack upon the Democratic party, as I contend, and upon the Administration as its chief. And not satisfied with that, it undertakes to rake up all the tattle and scandal of the country—all the Abolition tattle and scandal of the country—for the purpose of getting up a prejudice against the Democratic party, and against the friends of the Nebraska bill. But that is not all. It has assailed a distinguished representative of our country at a foreign Court—the Court of Spain. And here, in the face of the world, they say they justify themselves in so doing upon credible evidence. Now, sir, when a gentleman, upon the responsibility of his name, in dealing with his constituents, says he does a thing upon credible evidence, he is bound, as a man, as a gentleman, and as a citizen, to be prepared to show that evidence, and to make it good. The only evidence upon this subject which they have, is that which has been stated here by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. PECK] and what is it? It is the sentiments which Mr. Soulé uttered in a speech which he delivered when he was a member of the Senate, and before his appointment as a representative abroad. That, then, is the evidence they have upon which to found these charges. That is the evidence, says one, while another speaks of evidence collected from the newspapers of the country. Upon this unsubstantial evidence—this evidence, as baseless as the fabric of a vision, gentlemen, gravely dealing with their constituents, with whom they ought to deal with candor, have relied to pamper the appetite and the unenlightened prejudice of those they represent.

We had it rumored, Mr. Chairman, rumored, I say—and those gentlemen, I suppose, will recognize the validity of that kind of testimony, of course—we had it rumored through this city that there was to be a great gathering of the political elements of this House opposed to the Nebraska bill; and it was rumored that the northern Whigs were inducing certain gentlemen, the "Softs," as they may be called, of the Democratic party—and I do not refer to the New York "Softs" by their late party designation, but to the term as properly descriptive of weak and feeble members of the Democratic faith—we had it rumored, I say, in the streets of this city, that there was to be a great gathering of all the elements of opposition, and that as many Democrats were to be drawn into the scheme as practicable, for the purpose of getting up a grand manifesto, a grand appeal to the country, thereby to crush all those who dared to assist in the passage of the Nebraska bill. Well, we heard a great deal about it and there was some impression made, but it had died away, as I supposed, when lo and behold! this address appeared this morning. Motes parturitur, nascitur ridiculus mus! It has all ended in the production of this address. Sir, these gentlemen have referred to mere newspaper rumors as testimony, and I will answer for it, although I do not pretend to speak by any sort of authority, that when the real facts come to be known, the opinion which they express in regard to the conduct of our representative at Madrid will be found to be utterly unfounded and unwarranted.

I must be permitted, sir, to express my deep regret that these gentlemen, in communicating with their constituents, should have thought proper to refer to such feeble and insufficient testimony as that upon which they rely. They could have had no purpose to enlighten their constituents by that address. Composed as it is of the most extraordinary statements and allegations, and of the most extraordinary array of testimony, I say that they could have had no purpose—none under the sun—to enlighten their constituents or to give them a true or proper conception of their relations to the South. The purpose is to excite their prejudices. The purpose is to do injury to the Democratic party. The purpose is to pull down the Administration, without which, of course, no successful Democratic policy could be carried out. That is the aim, and by the road which they are now traveling, they will be found, in a very brief space of time, in hearty fellowship with the various isms, and parties that are arrayed against the Democratic party.

Mr. MAURICE, (interrupting.) And with Mr. Cushing.

Mr. SMITH. I dare say you would be very happy to have him with you.

Sir, I will say that gentlemen who make war upon the Administration, and act with the Abolitionists, are bound to be of the opposition. I do not mean to use the term "Abolitionists" as a reproach with respect to some of them. There is one gentleman on this floor whom I respect with all my heart. He is a beautiful illustration of an erroneous sentiment. [Laughter.] He holds extreme opinions, but he never forgets that his position demands that here, and I presume everywhere, he should express his opinions in the language of a gentleman. I am most happy to take that gentleman ever and everywhere by the hand, because I am comforted by the beautiful sentiment of Mr. Jefferson, that "error ceases to be dangerous when reason is left free to combat it." I will say, in reference to that gentleman, that it is really a comfort and a delight to me to talk of him, and to him, and in any and every circle. I should be glad to take him to the South, and to see him mix among us. I should be willing to hear him discourse eloquently and powerfully, as he can do, upon the subject of slavery, even in that region. I would promise him not only safety and protection, but respect, kindness, and hospitality. I say these gentlemen are really seeking to affiliate with the Whigs, Free-Soilers, and Abolitionists. When they act with the opposition, of course they must be of the opposition. Those who are not with us are against us. Every day and every year shows this to be true. In 1832 and 1833 we had a striking illustration of this fact. Many of my dearest friends, under the excitement of that time, broke off from Andrew Jackson, and, by familiarity with their new associations, soon became Whigs. This fact is still further illustrated, when we refer to the excitement attendant upon the removal of the deposits. One of Virginia's most brilliant sons, one of those who was looked up to for the succession, left the Democratic party, professedly on account of his dissatisfaction with the removal of the deposits, and he soon found himself in the ranks of the opposition. These gentlemen, five hopeful, promising representatives of the people—I speak it in no disparagement to them—have thought it proper to come out in a brief address to their constituents, in which they have given their former friends some hard blows, but under which we will be able to stand up, live, and conquer. They are going the way of all such flesh, and I commend them to the choice they have made. I have thought it proper to make these few remarks, and shall not touch at all the main subject under consideration before the committee, which, I believe, is the Pacific railroad bill.

Mr. MAURICE. I desire simply to express to the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. SMITH,] and the committee, my acknowledgments for the very favorable notice he has given our address. The gentleman has given to it an importance and consequence beyond anything we could have hoped for. The address, permit me to say to gentlemen of the committee, will now be placed upon the desks of members, and I hope, after this very happy introduction of its merits by the gentleman from Virginia, that it will be perused by them with profit and advantage. [Laughter.]

Mr. SMITH. Gentlemen of the committee, I will only say, that most assuredly I would not have given any notice to the address, had it not been introduced here, and had it not been intended to operate beyond the mere constituencies of its signers and subscribers. But, inasmuch as there are those in the country who sympathize with these gentlemen, I have given their address the sort of notice I have, in order that the well meaning and true hearted, even of their own constituencies, may understand what these gentlemen are seeking to effect, and how eagerly they are desiring to mislead the public mind, under the garb and profession of Democracy.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. I move that the committee rise.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. As it is not the wish of any gentleman to speak, I move that the bill be reported to the House.

Mr. LETCHER. With a recommendation that it be rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee is aware that the bill must be read through before it can be reported.

Mr. COBB. I want to offer an amendment to the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee, on the right of the Chair, [Mr. STANTON,] has made a motion which overrules that of his colleague, [Mr. JONES.] He has moved that the committee do now rise. That question will be put to the committee.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will it be in order to move to strike out the enacting clause?

The CHAIRMAN. That would be tantamount to the motion that the committee report back the bill with a recommendation that it do not pass.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Oh, that is the way of doing the thing now. [Laughter.]

The question being on the motion that the committee do now rise, it was put; and fifty-six voted in the affirmative.

Mr. FLORENCE. I call for tellers. Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. STUART, of Michigan, and VAIL, were appointed.

The question was taken; and the tellers reported—ayes fifty-seven, noes not counted.

So the motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker pro tempore (Mr. JONES, of Tennessee) having resumed the chair, the Chairman of the committee reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the Union generally, and especially House bill No. 295, being "A bill to authorize the construction of the Pacific railroad," and had come to no resolution thereon.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

[A message was received from the President, by the hands of SIDNEY WEBSTER, his Private Secretary, informing the House that he had, on Tuesday, the 30th instant, approved and signed an act to organize the Territories of Nebraska and Kansas.]

Mr. LETCHER. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. COBB. Oh, no; let us go to the business on the Speaker's table.

Mr. CUMMING. I ask for the yeas and nays on the motion to adjourn.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Several MEMBERS. Tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. McDUGALL, and TAYLOR, of Tennessee, were appointed.

The question was then taken; and the tellers reported—ayes 55, noes 20.

So the motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly, at thirty-five minutes past one o'clock, adjourned until to-morrow at eight o'clock, a. m.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, June 1, 1854.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

On motion by Mr. STUART,

The Senate adjourned.

Pursuant to a resolution passed yesterday, the Senate will not meet again until Monday.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

• THURSDAY, June 1, 1854.

The House met, pursuant to adjournment, at eight o'clock, a. m.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

IMPROVEMENT OF CAPE FEAR RIVER.

Mr. ASHE. I move to reconsider the vote by which Senate bill, (No. 202,) entitled "An act making further appropriations for the improvement of Cape Fear river, North Carolina," was yesterday referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The motion will be entered.

Then, on motion by Mr. ASHE, at five minutes past eight o'clock, the House adjourned, pursuant to a previous order, until Monday next.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, June 5, 1854.

The Journal of Thursday was read and approved.

On the motion of Mr. STUART, the Senate adjourned.

The Senate, in accordance with a resolution passed on Wednesday last, stands adjourned until Thursday next.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, June 5, 1854.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. WILLIAM H. MILBURN.

The Journal of Thursday was read and approved.

The SPEAKER presented to the House a communication from the Treasury Department, transmitting therewith copies of such accounts as have been rendered by persons charged or intrusted with the disbursement or application of moneys, goods, or effects, for the benefit of the Indians, from the 1st July, 1852, to the 30th June, 1853, inclusive—together with a statement containing a list of the names of all persons to whom goods, moneys, or effects have been delivered within the same time—specifying the amounts and objects for which they were intended, the amounts accounted for, and the balances (under each specific head) still remaining in their hands: prepared in obedience to an act of Congress of the 30th of June, 1834, entitled "An act to provide for the organization of the Department of Indian Affairs."

On motion by Mr. HOUSTON, the communication and accompanying papers were referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

RESOLUTION TO ADJOURN SINE DIE.

The SPEAKER. The business first in order is the motion submitted by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WALBRIDGE,] on Monday last, to suspend the rules, for the purpose of introducing the following resolution:

Resolved, (the Senate concurring) That the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives adjourn their respective Houses sine die on Monday, the 31st day of July next.

Mr. HOUSTON. As the gentleman from New York, who introduced the resolution, is not present, I suppose it will be proper, with the consent of the House, to allow the motion to pass over informally for the present, and proceed to the consideration of other business.

Mr. EWING. I desire to inquire whether, if the motion be passed over now, it will ever be reached again?

The SPEAKER. If the motion be passed over informally, by unanimous consent, it will come up first in order on Monday next.

Mr. EWING. Well, sir, I think we might as well act upon it now as at any other time. I object to its being passed over, and ask for a vote upon it.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Upon the motion to suspend the rules I demand a division of the House. I want to know whether a quorum of members are present.

ADJOURNMENT UNTIL THURSDAY.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. Is it in order to move that when the House adjourns, it adjourn to meet on Thursday next?

The SPEAKER. That motion would be in order.

Mr. STANTON. I submit the motion. Mr. CLINGMAN. I demand a division of the House. I think we have idled away time enough, and I do not wish the motion to pass unless there is a quorum here to pass it.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message was here received from the President of the United States, by SIDNEY WEBSTER, his Private Secretary, informing the House that he did, on the 31st day of May last, approve and sign the bill of the House, No. 271, entitled "An act to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1854, and for other purposes."

Mr. STANTON. As a division has been demanded upon my motion to adjourn over, I will withdraw it.

The SPEAKER. The question then recurs upon the motion to suspend the rules made on Monday last by the gentleman from New York.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. If the House will allow that motion to pass over informally, I will move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. Making speeches is the only business we shall be able to do to-day.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I move that the House do now adjourn. If we cannot do one species of business without a quorum, I do not think we can another.

Mr. ELLISON. I demand the yeas and nays upon the motion to adjourn.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was then taken; and decided in the negative—yeas 4, nays 88.

So the House refused to adjourn, no quorum having voted.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move that there be a call of the House.

The question was put; and the motion agreed to—ayes 45, noes 28.

Mr. GREEN. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. ELLISON. Upon that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered, only five members having voted therefor.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I demand tellers upon the motion.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. VAIL and BOGOCCK were appointed.

The question was taken, and decided in the negative; the tellers having reported—ayes 36, noes 62.

So the House refused to adjourn.

The Clerk then called the roll, and one hundred and six members answered to their names.

The SPEAKER. There is no quorum present. The officers of the House will close the doors.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Without a quorum no business can be transacted, and I now move that all further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken; and the motion was agreed to.

Thereupon, the House (at a quarter to one o'clock, p. m.) adjourned until to-morrow at twelve, m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, June 6, 1854.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. WILLIAM H. MILBURN.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

LIGHT-HOUSE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. AIKEN. I have been instructed by the Committee on Commerce to ask leave to report a bill making appropriations for light-houses, light-boats, buoys, &c., and providing for the erection and establishment of the same, and for other purposes; that it be ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the report will be received and the bill will be ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered, the bill having been read a first and second time by its title.

Mr. HOUSTON. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

[Cries of "No!"]

Mr. OLDS. You may as well do it; there is no quorum present.

Mr. CAMPBELL called for a division.

The House was accordingly divided, and the Speaker reported only forty gentlemen rising in the affirmative, (not a sufficient number.)

So the motion was not agreed to.

The SPEAKER. It is quite apparent that there is not a quorum in the Hall.

CALLING COMMITTEES FOR REPORTS.

Mr. HOUSTON. There are a great many committees in the House who have reports ready to be made. I propose, then, that we proceed to receive to-day the reports which committees have ready and desire to present. There can be no objection, I think, to our receiving and referring them, and so letting them go upon the Calendar. We can occupy the day in transacting the business whether there be a quorum present or not. It is not contended that for this a quorum is necessary.

Mr. OLDS. I think the plan proposed by the gentleman from Alabama is a good one, and should be acted on.

Several MEMBERS. Yes; let us do that.

The SPEAKER. Then, by the unanimous consent of the House, the Chair will proceed to call committees for reports, with the understanding that all reports made shall be referred without debate.

Mr. OLDS, (interrupting.) And with the further understanding that when we recommence the calling of committees for reports, we do so where we will have left off to-day.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would imagine so.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. And also with the understanding that none of such reports so received be reconsidered and referred back to the committees reporting them, but be acted upon as may be directed by the House.

VOTING IN THE CITY OF WASHINGTON.

Mr. LETCHER. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to allow me to offer the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The resolution was reported, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee for the District of Columbia be instructed to inquire into the expediency of so amending the charter of the city of Washington as to abolish the system of voting by ballot, and substitute the mode of viva voce voting therefor.

Mr. RITCHIE, of Pennsylvania. I object.

The resolution was, therefore, not received.

Mr. COBB. I feel a deep interest in the proposal made by my colleague [Mr. HOUSTON] to receive the reports of committees. But I wish to understand distinctly before I give my assent to that proposition, whether or not, if we proceed to call committees for reports, we will hereafter, when we resume that business, commence where we will have left off to-day?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not informed as to the purpose of the motion made by the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. HOUSTON.] That gentleman will please to answer the interrogatory of his colleague.

Mr. HOUSTON. The purpose which I had in view in making that motion was simply this: There are, as I have stated, a great many reports ready to be made by committees, to which there cannot possibly be any objection. I desire that such reports be received by the House to-day, and referred either to the Committee of the Whole House, or to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. My purpose is, that the Chair should now proceed and call the committees for such reports. When we have got through them all, as we easily can to-day, why, then the committees will be just in the same order for future calls as they now are. That is my understanding of the proposition that I have submitted.

Mr. COBB. I am bound, from a sense of duty to myself and to my constituents, to object to that proposition.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. COBB] having objected to the proposition of his colleague, [Mr. HOUSTON], the Chair will now state the business first in order.

Mr. KNOX. I rise to a privileged question. Is it in order to move that there be a call of the House?

The SPEAKER. It is in order.

Mr. KNOX. Then I make that motion.

Mr. COBB. There is a general expression of a wish that I should withdraw my objection to the proposition of the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. HOUSTON.] In accordance with that wish, I withdraw my objection.

The SPEAKER. There is a motion pending that there be a call of the House.

Mr. COBB. To that I have no objection.

The question was then taken on the motion of Mr. KNOX; and it was decided in the negative.

So a call of the House was refused.

Mr. HOUSTON. As my colleague [Mr. COBB] has withdrawn his objection to my proposition, I propose again to appeal to the House to allow reports to be made from the several committees, and have the bills reported, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, or to a Committee of the Whole House.

Mr. HUNT. As you will not allow a call of the House, I object.

Mr. HULLYER. The Speaker having announced that there is no quorum present, I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. HAMILTON. Upon that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was then put; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 13, nays 81.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. HOUSTON. I move there be a call of the House.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I ask for the yeas and nays upon that motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was then put; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 62, nays 41.

So a call of the House was ordered.

Mr. HUNT. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Let us have the yeas and nays upon that motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HUNT. I withdraw the motion to adjourn.

The roll of the House was then called, and one hundred and eleven members answered to their names. The following is a list of the absentees:

Messrs. Abercrombie, Appleton, Thomas H. Bayly, Ball, Banks, Barksdale, Belcher, Bell, Bennett, Benson, Bissell, Bliss, Carpenter, Caskie, Chamberlain, Chase, Chastain, Churchwell, Craige, Cumming, Thomas Davis, Dean, De Witt, Dick, Dickinson, Drum, Dunham, Eastman, Eddy, Edgerton, Thomas D. Eliot, John M. Elliott, English, Etheridge, Everhart, Ewing, Farley, Fenton, Flagler, Florence, Franklin, Green, Grey, Grow, Andrew J. Harlan, Sampson W. Harris, Harrison, Hastings, Hibbard, Heister, Howe, Hughes, Ingersoll, Daniel T. Jones, Roland Jones, Keitt, Kerr, Kittredge, Kurtz, Lamb, Lane, Lilly, Lindsley, Lyon, McCulloch, McDougall, McNair, McQueen, Macy, Mattheson, Maurice, May, Middleswarth, John G. Miller, Morgan, Murray, Noble, Orr, Pecker, Peck, Peckham, Pennington, Phillips, Pratt, Preston, Puryear, Ready, Reese, Richardson, Robbins, Rogers, Rowe, Rubin, Sage, Seymour, Shower, Singleton, Skelton, William Smith, Snodgrass, Solters, Alexander H. Stephens, Straub, David Stuart, John J. Taylor, John L. Taylor, Tracy, Tweed, Upham, Wade, Walbridge, Walker, Walley, Walsh, Ellihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, Wells, John Wentworth, Wheeler, Witte, Yates, and Zollicoffer.

Mr. MEACHAM. I move that all further proceedings in the call be dispensed with.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Oh, no. Let us go on with it.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I call for the yeas and nays upon the motion.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. Is it in order to move that the House do now adjourn?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. DAVIS. Then I make that motion.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I demand the yeas and nays upon that motion.

Upon a division of the House, the Chair announced that there was not a sufficient number to order the yeas and nays.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I ask for a count of the negative.

The SPEAKER. Upon a call of the House just now, only one hundred and eleven members answered to their names, and one fifth of that number has not demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. But some of the members may have gone outside of the bar.

The SPEAKER. Tellers could have been had, if called for, but they were not called for. The Chair decides that the yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I call for tellers now. I think it is usual to count the other side.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks if the House desires to have the yeas and nays they should have the opportunity of ordering them, and he will, therefore, entertain the call for tellers.

Tellers upon the yeas and nays were not ordered, only seventeen having voted therefor.

So the yeas and nays were not ordered.

The question was put upon the motion; and it was decided in the affirmative—ayes 51, noes 37.

And, thereupon, (at five minutes before one o'clock,) the House adjourned until to-morrow at twelve o'clock, m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, June 7, 1854.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. WILLIAM H. MILBURN.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

Mr. BRIDGES. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to report a bill from the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office, for the purpose of having it referred to the Committee of the Whole.

The bill was read for information by its title, as follows:

A bill for the benefit of Francis Petit Smith.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I understand that is a bill for the renewal of a patent. I object.

Mr. HENN. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce the following resolution of inquiry:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, be requested to inquire into the expediency of establishing the following post roads:

From Centerville, Iowa, by the way of Corydon on the State road, South Independence, and the county seats of Ringgold and Taylor counties, to Clarinda, in Page county. From Council Bluffs, Iowa, in Winter Quarters, to Fort Calhoun, in Nebraska Territory.

From Magnolia, Iowa, to Fort Calhoun, Nebraska Territory.

From Nebraska City, Nebraska Territory, via Bellevue, to Omaha City, and Winter Quarters, to Fort Calhoun, in said Territory.

There being no objection, the resolution was considered, and agreed to.

On motion by Mr. HAMILTON, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers of S. A. Kittlewell, civil engineer on Boundary Commission, be withdrawn from the files of the House, for the purpose of reference to one of the Departments.

Mr. HOUSTON. I ask the unanimous consent of the House for leave to introduce the following resolution:

Resolved, That from and after Saturday next, and until otherwise ordered, the daily hour of meeting of this House shall be eleven o'clock, a. m.

Mr. KNOX objecting, the resolution was not received.

Mr. EDMANDS. I ask the unanimous consent of the House for leave to submit several reports which I have here from the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. In my judgment the best course for us to pursue is to call for reports from all the committees in their regular order.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I understand that the gentleman proposes to report back several matters that they may be referred to other committees.

Mr. JONES. I object, and call for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The business first in order is the consideration of a resolution reported from the Committee on Printing.

On motion by Mr. McDOUGALL, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers of J. Rutherford Worcester be withdrawn from the files of the House, for the purpose of introduction to the Senate.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill, of which previous notice had been given; which was read a first and second time by its title, as follows, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands:

A bill granting the unsold public land in the Vincennes land district, in the State of Indiana, to aid in the construction of a railroad from Vincennes to Crawfordsville, and from Vincennes to Indianapolis, in said State.

Mr. DICK. I ask the unanimous consent of the House for leave to introduce the following resolution:

Resolved, That in view of the great commercial and national interests in the navigation of our northern lakes, the Committee on Naval Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a navy-yard, depot, and dry-dock, at some suitable point on said lakes, and report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. LETCHER objecting, the resolution was not received.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The question was taken; and the motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. Bockock in the chair.)

The CHAIRMAN. The question before the committee for consideration is House bill No. 295, for the construction of a Pacific railroad. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. STANTON] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. STANTON. I will set an example to the committee. Desiring to see our business progress, I shall say nothing, except that I shall vote for the bill.

Mr. COBB. If nobody wishes to speak to the bill, I have an amendment which I will offer.

Mr. BRIDGES. I would say, Mr. Chairman, that I have prepared some remarks on the Pacific railroad bill, which, with the permission of the committee, that no time may be consumed in their delivery, I shall print as a portion of our proceedings. I am opposed to the measure on constitutional principles.

[This speech will be found in the Appendix.]

Mr. HENRICKS said he did not rise to advocate the passage of the Pacific railroad bill, but to speak with regard to the public lands. He would, however, remark, that as he now understood the subject, he could not give to the measure his support. He was anxious that such a bill should be framed as would enable him to give to it his sanction. The bill assumes that Congress ought not to establish this route, but that it should be selected by the Executive Department. Until it shall be shown that the central route (concerning the section of country which he, in part, represents) is not the right one, he would not support the bill which excludes it.

With regard to giving lands, on easy terms, to settlers, and distributing them among the States, he was for the former proposition, and, as a consequence, against the latter. These two measures are incompatible, and cannot stand together.

He avowed his opposition to the bill granting lands for the benefit of the indigent insane, and to the bill introduced by Mr. BENNETT, proposing to distribute lands among the several States for internal improvement and educational purposes. The duty and power of Congress, he contended, do not extend to those subjects. Although he did not concur in all the views of the President in his recent veto message, he indorsed the veto. It would give the Administration a high position in the country.

[This speech will be found in the Appendix.]

Mr. DISNEY said that it was his purpose to avail himself of the present occasion to finish the speech commenced by him some three or four weeks ago, which he was prevented from concluding by the expiration of his hour.

He then resumed his argument against the land bill heretofore reported by Mr. BENNETT, from the Committee on Public Lands, and proceeded to show that, in all the donations made by the Government, the Government had not, in a single instance, omitted to make each grant inure directly and immediately to its own pecuniary advantage, and not to the benefit of the respective States.

He also argued that never, in the history of the Government, nor in the history of private ownership, was there so rigid an economy practised as had been pursued by the General Government in relation to its domain. Its course had ever been rigorous, exacting, and oppressive.

He also argued to show that of all the absurd ideas which had ever entered into the minds of men, the idea that the new States had been favored by grants of the public lands was preëminently and par excellence, the most absurd.

He then commented on the minority report on the bill which he was opposing, and declared that it did not contain a single truth.

[See Appendix for the speech.]

Mr. CHANDLER obtained the floor.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania allow me to make a personal explanation?

Mr. CHANDLER. I yield to the gentleman for that purpose.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I wish simply to correct an error into which the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HENDRICKS] has fallen this morning, in regard to the character of the bill reported from the select committee. It was assumed by that gentleman that the Executive Departments of the Government would locate the line of road provided for by the bill. The gentleman misread the bill. It provides that the companies who undertake the work—whoever supplies the capital necessary to construct the road—shall have the location of its line.

I wish to make another remark here in behalf of the committee. Since this bill was reported to the House, the committee have agreed to change the limitation of the northern line in the South so as to accommodate, not merely the extreme northern route, but any one of the lines that may be found to be practicable between the Mississippi and the Pacific. I make this statement so that the bill may not be misunderstood, nor the action of the committee in regard to it.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania allow me a moment?

Mr. CHANDLER. Certainly.

Mr. HENDRICKS. In my remarks this morning, I did not undertake to read the bill. I undertook merely to give its general effect. The bill, as reported by the committee, authorizes the Secretary of War to contract for the construction of two lines of railroads. But it provides that the Secretary of War shall not accept of any contract for the construction of a road over the southern route, north of 37° north latitude, and provides that the eastern terminus of the northern route shall be in the Territory of Minnesota. So that, under the provisions of this bill, the Secretary could not contract for the construction of any route terminating at St. Louis. I did not understand or misrepresent the effect of the bill. I am glad to hear the gentleman say that this objection to his bill, which I suggested, will be removed by the action of his committee. That will remove one very important objection which I have to the bill.

Mr. CHANDLER said he felt a deep interest in the Pacific railroad bill. Representing a commercial community, he naturally desired to extend commerce; but he believed this was not the time to discuss the subject. He hoped the measure was not dead, even if allowed to sleep.

He rose to discuss another matter, namely, the bill now pending relating to the proposed change in carrying letters and other mailable matter requiring pre-payment, and increasing the price of a single letter from three to five cents. He then opposed the bill at length, answering arguments which had been advanced in its favor.

Mr. PERKINS, of New York, did not doubt the constitutionality of the Government to grant sections of land for the purpose of building railroads, especially for one so national in its object as that which was to connect the great valley of the Mississippi with the Pacific ocean.

We already had, from the shores of the Atlantic to the Mississippi, every convenience for travel and transportation which the inventions of the age had supplied; and he understood that there was now in progress, and authorized by law, a railroad from St. Louis to the junction of the Kansas river with the Missouri river, which was likely to be completed in the course of two or three years. This was the position of the country. But the question was, whether this was a proper bill? Like his colleague, [Mr. SMITH,] he affirmed that this was to be a Government road, and nothing else, in substance. This he proceeded to prove, and on this ground he opposed the bill.

[The above speeches will be found in the Appendix.]

PERSONAL EXPLANATION—MR. GIDDINGS.

Mr. GIDDINGS. The committee may recollect, that on the 27th April the member from Virginia, over the way, [Mr. SMITH,] took occasion to assail the memory of a distinguished statesman, once a member of this body, Hon. John Quincy Adams. In the same speech he also took occasion to make an assault upon myself.

To these attacks I responded the next morning, by way of personal explanation, to which he replied. In his replication he made no attempt to prove the charges he had advanced on the previous day, but had recourse to so many other and new assertions, that I think justice to that member, as well as to myself and friends with whom I long served in this body, demands at my hands an exposure of his second effort to misrepresent matters of history. I am told that this is unnecessary, that the public will have the facts before them, and will look upon all attempts to misrepresent public men with the proper degree of reprobation.

But the member to whom I refer holds a seat in this Hall; and what he says will be regarded as coming from one acting in a high and honorable station; and if his statements go out to the country uncontradicted, many people will take them as true. Again I may say that his second attack will necessarily call out some historic facts not yet published, but which the present occasion appears to afford a suitable opportunity to make known.

In his speech on the 27th April, the member said:

“Did they not all know that a distinguished man, John Quincy Adams, had stepped down from the ‘Chief Magistracy and asserted this question, saying that sooner than stop agitation he would see five millions of southern hearths drenched in blood?’”

Conscious that Mr. Adams, on no occasion, spoke of agitation in connection with bloodshed, and feeling, as all who were acquainted with him must feel, that such a declaration was opposed to all his habits of thought, his course of reasoning, his language and mode of expression, I characterized the assertion as an “unmitigated misrepresentation.”

In reply, the member read from an address of Mr. Adams, delivered at Pittsburg many years since, the following paragraph:

"That slavery will be abolished in this country, and throughout the world, I firmly believe. Whether it will be done peaceably or by blood, God only knows; but that it will be accomplished, I have not a doubt; and by whatever means, I say let it come; yes, by whatever means, let it come."

Not a word is said in this extract about "agitation," or about "stopping agitation," nor of "five millions of southern hearths," nor of having them "drenched in blood." Not a sentence; not an expression; not a thought which the member asserted had been expressed by Mr. Adams, is proven by the quotation. But the member appeared to read this extract with a tone and emphasis which seemed to assert, that although Mr. Adams had not uttered a word or thought which had been attributed to him, yet he had said something else; and he proceeded to read from a speech delivered in this Hall some years since by Mr. Dillett, of Alabama, extracts which showed that that gentleman, being a slaveholder, was dissatisfied with the ideas which Mr. Adams had actually advanced. Now, sir, the member having, in this way, admitted his original assertion to have been unfounded I shall say no more on that point.

The member appeared to think I ought to have left the vindication of Mr. Adams to some gentleman from Massachusetts. Feeling the injustice of his attack upon one with whom I had long served in this body, and perhaps, I may say, whose friendship and confidence I had enjoyed, I thought it not my duty only, but the duty of every member who had served with Mr. Adams, to repel that assault upon his memory. Nor do I discover it to be very material to that member from what quarter the exposure of his misrepresentation comes. Truth will do him no injustice; and, in my opinion, it were more manly in him frankly to acknowledge its force than to complain of him who utters it.

In relation to his attacks on myself, it may be proper that I should refer to their origin. I understand the member to be a slave-breeder in Virginia, where he rears men and women for the market, and must, of course, feel a lively interest in the coast-wise slave trade. In 1841, the slave ship Creole cleared from Richmond, bound to New Orleans with a full cargo of fathers, mothers, children, husbands, and wives, for the barracoons of that city. While at sea, beyond the jurisdiction of Virginia laws, the people rose upon the slave dealers, asserted their right to freedom, took possession of the ship, after slaying one of the supercargoes, and landed at Nassau, where, of course, they found protection under British law.

Our Executive, sympathizing with the slave dealers, sent instructions to our Minister at London, directing him on behalf of the slave merchants to demand compensation for their loss of human flesh; and members of the Senate threatened war in case such indemnity were refused.

Against these attempts to involve the people of the free States in a war to support the slave trade my judgment and conscience revolted. I therefore prepared resolutions denying the constitutional power of this Government to involve them in such a disgraceful traffic. I presented them to this body for consideration, for which a resolution of censure was passed against me, and I was driven from my seat here. My constituents sent me back, instructed to maintain the position I had assumed. The member from Virginia voted for my censure, and probably felt the reproof of the people. He was then silent; but now, after twelve years have passed away, he attempts to misrepresent the history of those transactions in which we were both so deeply interested.

The member asserted that I introduced into Congress "resolutions declaring it lawful for negroes to slay the wives and children of their masters." In answer to this charge, I caused the resolutions which I introduced to be read at the Clerk's table. They contained not one thought, nor sentence, nor intimation, nor allusion which he had charged.* Nor did the member, in his reply, pretend to argue that they contained a word or thought which he had attributed to them. On that point he remained mute. Indeed, he seemed to admit its fabrication. I read his own words on this point:

"Well, Mr. Chairman, the member from Ohio has read the resolutions for which the House condemned him. I shall not pause to comment upon them."

The member might well say he would not pause to comment on the resolutions. He appeared to think and feel himself convicted of gross misrepresentation on that point. He therefore let that pass without attempting to justify his charge in any degree. He then sought to cover his retreat by other misrepresentations and other fabrications so flagrant that I deem it my duty to place on the record of our debates a more full expose than I could do by way of personal explanation.

The member then quotes Mr. Everett's words, not to prove the truth of his own attack, but to show that Mr. Everett was dissatisfied with me for introducing the resolutions. Those who will look back to that period (1842) will find that northern men were then very sensitive on the subject of slavery. They looked upon it as a very delicate matter, the discussion of which would endanger the Union. Hence the gag-rules of that day. I cast no imputation upon the statesmen of that period; but all are conscious that men at that time generally thought that slavery must not be discussed, nor referred to, except on very extraordinary occasions, and then with great respect, lest a dissolution of the Union should follow. And any man who will consult the record, will find no intimation from Mr. Everett that my resolutions were not just and proper of themselves. Indeed, when introduced, he declared them to be "important, and therefore moved to lay them on the table for consideration." Failing in this, he moved a call of the House. That being voted down, and supposing the vote about to be taken before he had an opportunity to examine the resolutions, and feeling the vexation of his position, he asked to be excused from voting again, saying the resolutions were important, that he had no time to examine them, and on that account wished to be excused from voting. He then added the language quoted, saying he "abhorred the fire-brand course of the gentleman from Ohio." It was said under an excitement of the moment, and had reference to my course in bringing the subject before the body, and not to the doctrine of the resolutions, as represented by the member from Virginia; and this any man must see who consults the record. I desire to do justice to Mr. Everett. He was at that time an old member. I served with him long after the occurrence, and while, like all other statesmen, he was responsible for his sayings and actions, it is my duty to protect his memory from misrepresentation. For the hasty expression quoted he made every atonement in his power. Against the vote of censure he interposed his voice and influence. There stands the record of the aforesaid power was delegated to the Federal Government, but was reserved by, and still pertains to, each of the several States.

"Resolved, That by the eighth section of the first article of the Constitution, each of the several States surrendered to the Federal Government all jurisdiction over the subjects of commerce and navigation upon the high seas.

"Resolved, That slavery being an abridgement of the natural rights of man, can exist only by force of positive municipal law, and is necessarily confined to the jurisdiction of the power creating it.

"Resolved, That when a ship belonging to the citizens of any State of this Union leaves the waters and territory of such State, and enters upon the high seas, the persons on board cease to be subject to the slave laws of such State, and therefore are governed in their relations to each other, by, and are amenable to, the laws of the United States.

"Resolved, That when the brig Creole, on her late passage to New Orleans, left the territorial jurisdiction of Virginia, the slave laws of that State ceased to have jurisdiction over the persons on board said brig, and they became amenable only to the laws of the United States.

"Resolved, That the persons on board said ship, in resuming their natural rights of personal liberty, violated no law of the United States, incurred no legal penalty, and are justly liable to no punishment.

"Resolved, That all attempts to reenslave said persons are unauthorized by the Constitution, or the laws of the United States, and are incompatible with our national honor.

"Resolved, That all attempts to exert our national influence in favor of the coast-wise slave trade, or to place this nation in the attitude of maintaining a commerce in human beings, are subversive of the rights and injurious to the feelings and interests of the free States, are unauthorized by the Constitution, and prejudicial to our national character."

his vote, in the most emphatic condemnation of the resolution of censure, and of those who voted for it. The next morning, with great solemnity, he offered a resolution, as follows:

"Resolved, That five thousand copies of so much of the Journal of yesterday as relates to the action of this House in relation to the Hon. Joshua R. Giddings, be printed for the use of the members."

"Mr. CAMPBELL, of South Carolina, desired to be informed whether the motion of the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. EVERETT] included the remarks made by that gentleman in relation to the course of the gentleman from Ohio?"

"Mr. EVERETT. I shall by and by ask the indulgence of the House to say a few words on that question."

The vote was then taken on Mr. Everett's motion to print extra copies of the Journal to be sent forth to the people, the name of the member from Virginia being recorded in the negative. He appeared unwilling to send forth such official report, though he now appears ready to give his misrepresentation of it. After that vote was taken,

"Mr. EVERETT rose, and said he desired to throw himself upon the indulgence of the House to say a word in reply to the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. CAMPBELL,] in relation to a remark he had made on a former day."

"Mr. HOPKINS objected; other members objected amidst cries of 'We have all personal explanations to make.'"

These facts are copied from the record of our proceedings. That shows that Mr. Everett regarded my resolutions as important, wanted time to examine them, moved that "they lie on the table," and then that there be a call of the House; that he voted against the resolutions of censure, and moved the printing of extra copies to be sent out to the people, and made efforts to explain the remark quoted by the member from Virginia, but was not permitted to do so. He is now dead, and the effort of the member from Virginia to press that isolated and hasty remark into his service, in order to make a second assault on me, is but another evidence of the desperation to which he was driven by the exposure of his original fabrication. Although I then felt and now feel that Mr. Everett did me injustice in the remark quoted, I know that he felt he had done himself a far greater wrong. I know his feelings and character, and will not silently permit the member from Virginia, nor any other man, to place his action in a false light.

But the member had recourse to the views of Mr. Botts, who, though a slaveholder, is a gentleman capable, when he takes time to reflect, of appreciating the views and sentiments of other members. He, however, is living, and able to explain his own actions and protect his own reputation. It is true, however, that he drafted the resolutions of censure, and no doubt entertained the views expressed in them. For it is a fact known to all who then mingled in the debates of this body, that the right of discussing the constitutionality of slavery, where it existed under the exclusive jurisdiction of the Federal Government, was not only denied by slaveholders, but by this House. We then transacted all our business under gag-rules, which were voted for and sustained by many northern members, as well as those from the South. Why, sir, as I said on a former occasion, the vote of censure was not passed on me because my resolutions contained any erroneous principle, or any doctrine that was not true; but I was censured for daring to utter truth in this Hall. That was the gist, the gravamen of my offense; an act which the member from Virginia still appears to regard as offensive and unconstitutional. And this feeling, indulged by Mr. Botts, is now cited by the member from Virginia—for what purpose? Certainly he could not suppose the resolutions or opinions of Mr. Botts in any manner proved or tended to prove the truth of his assertion; nor could he suppose any member would understand Mr. Botts's views as in any manner sustaining his declaration, that my resolutions "declared it lawful for negroes to slay women and children." No, sir, I suppose he intended this reference to Mr. Everett and Mr. Botts to cover his retreat from the gross misrepresentation he had uttered; but he shall not escape in that manner. I proceed to the next point.

The member, in his speech referred to, speaking of myself and my return to this Hall, used the following language: "At any rate, the gentleman did not get the resolution [of censure] repealed. He came back here, and had the grace actually to ask Congress to repeal its resolution." With astonishment at the utterance of such an audacious fabrication, I inquired from my seat in a distinct voice,

* The following are the resolutions referred to:

"Resolved, That prior to the adoption of our Federal Constitution, each of the several States composing this Union, exercised full and exclusive jurisdiction over the subject of slavery within its own territory, and possessed full power to continue or abolish it at pleasure.

"Resolved, That by adopting the Constitution, no part of

"Does the gentleman intend to make such an assertion as that on this floor?" to which he refused to listen, but added, "and, instead of getting the resolution repealed, the proposition was received with a loud laugh, and that was thought to be the last of it." Intending to put him on his guard, I from my seat distinctly announced that "I had offered no such resolution." To this he coolly responded, "No, the gentleman from Ohio did not make the proposition, but one of his colleagues did, I presume with his consent."

In answer to this aggregation of untruths, I could only say that "no such transaction ever occurred; no such facts ever existed; that neither myself nor any colleague ever presented any proposition of the kind; that no such thought ever entered my mind, or flitted across my imagination." To this strongest denial of his assertion I could possibly make I added the most direct and unqualified charge of wilful and corrupt misrepresentation upon the member which I could utter under parliamentary law. And, in order to do him justice, I will read such parts of his reply as have reference to this point. He used the following language:

"Well, sir, I said this member from Ohio offered a resolution to rescind the former vote of censure. Now, Mr. Chairman, I am one of those who never disregard or refuse to recognize the act of an agent. I am one of those who regard what is done by my agent as having been done by myself; and if it were necessary I could give you law and Latin to show that it is an established legal principle. I am not here to draw nice distinctions. I do not split hairs; not I. But the member from Ohio says he did not offer this resolution. Well, sir, he did not, but his colleague did."

The member was standing with the Congressional Globe open before him, and spoke as though he had the record of such a resolution. Well, knowing that no such resolution, that no such record existed, that this new fiction was an audacious attempt to deceive the House, to wade through his difficulty by new and unblushing fabrications, I spoke from my seat, and the following colloquy took place between us:

"Mr. GIDDINGS. Will the gentleman read the resolution?"

"Mr. SMITH. You may read it if you wish."

"Mr. GIDDINGS. Either read it or back out."

"Mr. SMITH. I have the resolution before me, and I will not back out."

"Mr. GIDDINGS. There is no such resolution."

"Mr. SMITH. No, sir; there is no such resolution in express terms, but it was designed indirectly to accomplish the purpose I have stated; for, if received by the House, that would revoke the censure, and that will explain what follows hereafter."

"Mr. GIDDINGS. Read it."

"Mr. SMITH. I will not read it."

Every member must have been struck with the audacity which could prompt a man to stand thus in the presence of this body, and assert that he had such a resolution before him, when he had nothing of the kind. Nothing holding any relation to such resolution. When driven to the wall he was constrained to resort to other and further fabrications, saying, "I have refused to read the resolution because the whole debate to which it gave rise, would have to be read in order to make it intelligible. I have the resolution before me, and the whole proceeding in connection with it." Now, sir, will it be believed that any man has found his way to this Hall, who could stand here and utter such audacious untruths in the face of this body? Yet when told that he had no such resolution, that he could not read it, that it never existed, he coolly admitted his own turpitude by passing on to other remarks. All present must have been conscious that he was guilty of these consecutive fictions. His manner, his tone, his countenance, bore testimony to the deep depravity of his intentions. He went on to say, "I recollect when he [Mr. Goode] got up and offered the resolutions, there was one general laugh throughout the House." I need not say to those who were then present, that Mr. Goode presented no such resolution; that the member from Virginia could, therefore, recollect no such transaction; that there was no laugh throughout the Hall at his presenting such resolution. All who witnessed the appearance, tone, manner, and countenance of the member must have been convinced that he had no such resolution, nor record; therefore he could neither read nor exhibit it.

A meeting of the people was held in the county where I reside, at which strong resolutions were adopted in reference to the censure passed upon myself in this body. The proceedings of that meeting were forwarded to Hon. Patrick G.

Goode, a member from Ohio, who, in accordance with the practice then and now followed, filed them as petitions with the Clerk. I need not say that proceedings of primary meetings were then treated as they now are, like petitions. The filing of these proceedings with the Clerk was done quietly, without any motion, and without notice by any other member. The next morning Mr. Botts, thinking the resolutions too strong in language, moved to amend the Journal; not, as the member from Virginia states, to strike out any portion of those proceedings. The motion prevailed by a vote of 88 to 75. Now, the whole relation which the member professed to give in regard to Mr. Goode's presenting a resolution to repeal the censure passed on me, the laugh which he says ensued, the motion to strike out a part of the proceedings, has no allusion to any real transaction. Nothing of that character ever took place.

But it is possible that I do not regard the statements of the member with proper charity; for he appears to have had no very clear perception of his own statements or turpitude. He says such was the loathsome, vile, miserable, contemptible character of the proceedings, that the House struck out the objectionable paragraph. He had previously made no reference to any proceedings whatever, except to those of this House; and I presume he did not intend to stigmatize those as loathsome, vile, and contemptible. He could hardly have termed the imaginary resolution of Mr. Goode, which, he says, was to repeal the resolution of censure proceedings. If, therefore, he had any real proceedings in his mind, they must have been those of the meeting to which I have referred, and which this House refused to place on the Journal, but which are recorded in the Congressional Globe of that day. Now, sir, after the lapse of twelve years, I will call attention to those resolutions of the people, of a constituency who sent me to represent them. And I submit to the judgment of the nation whether that people did not exhibit more knowledge of the principles on which our Government was founded a better appreciation of the duties of Congress, than did the ninety-eight members of this House who refused to listen to their views.

The following are the resolutions:

"Resolved, That our fathers, at the expense of much blood and treasure, established a representative form of government, in which the voice of the people was recognized as the controlling power."

"2. That the right of representation having been purchased by the best blood of our ancestors, can only be surrendered by the best blood of their offspring."

"3. That to the maintenance of our Government in its representative form we solemnly pledge our lives, our fortunes and our honor."

"4. That every attempt to abridge the right of the people to be heard through their representatives in our Halls of legislation is anti-republican incompatible with our institutions, subversive of American liberty, and revolutionary in its tendency."

"5. That the vote of censure passed upon the Hon. JOSUAH R. GIDDINGS on the 22d March, 1842, was a flagrant violation of our rights, and the rights of our State, subversive of the most important feature of our Government, and should be regarded as the commencement of an important revolution."

"6. That while those concerned in the slave trade upon the high seas, demand of the Federal Government protection for that traffic, the subject is a legitimate matter of discussion both in Congress and among the people."

"7. That we call upon the friends of representative government in this and in other States of this Union to express their views upon the late high-handed measure by which the rights of the people of this district have been grossly violated."

"8. That in a particular manner we call upon the people of the Richmond district, Virginia, to say whether they desire to deny to us the right of expressing through our Representative our views as to our obligations to maintain the slave trade, while they demand of us through the Federal Government to support such commerce, even at the expense of war."

"9. That the real issue before the people is, shall they be allowed to express their views upon questions of national policy, including those of peace and war?"

"10. That as brethren of the same republican family, we call upon those who voted to censure our Representative to declare whether they wish to maintain the slave trade upon the high seas with our wealth and our lives; and at the same time, to deny to us the expression of sentiments through our Representatives."

"11. That the question now proposed to the people of the nation, is one which should be considered paramount to all party considerations, involving the most vital principles of our Government, and demanding the united support of all patriots in support of the people's rights."

The tone and feeling, the doctrine, of these resolutions appear to be appropriate to the present time. I refer to them with pride. They express the views which that people entertained twelve years since, and to which they still adhere. Sir, had the other portions of the free States then spoken as my constituents spoke, we should not have now seen the Missouri compromise repealed.

The member from Virginia must have referred to these resolutions, if he referred to anything, when he declared the proceedings loathsome, vile, miserable, contemptible. He was one who had attempted to control my action. He was one whose action was denounced by the people. I will not place his action in contrast with the tone and doctrine of the resolutions just read. I should be guilty of injustice to the men who composed that meeting were I to do that. But I do not hesitate to contrast their sound constitutional and statesmanlike views with those expressed by this body. Sir, the country has, with almost unanimous voice, approved the doctrines of that people, and condemned those of this body. The history of this transaction will long stand as one of the proudest monuments of popular intelligence, of popular independence, that has ever found a place in the history of this or of any other government. The member from Virginia has said that that people were worthy of me. Sir, the proudest epitaph I desire to be recorded upon my tomb will be that I was worthy of the people whom I represented.

But I do not blame the member from Virginia for refusing to read these resolutions. His error consisted in referring to them, in representing them as asking Congress to repeal its vote of censure. Sir, they ask nothing of Congress. Their language is that of dignified rebuke. They spoke as becomes a people when they address their servants. My constituents supplicate no earthly power. It was their independent intelligence which then thrilled the nation, and caused the members who censured their Representative to recede from their positions. It was this record which the member held before him when the colloquy took place between us, in which I said "Read it, or back out;" to which he replied, "I have the resolution before me." In saying this, the member could not have acted ignorantly. He must have been conscious at the time that he was uttering a deliberate misrepresentation. It is my duty to expose these fabrications. He has boasted that he was once Governor of the old Commonwealth of Virginia; he professes to be a leader of the slaveholding party in this House; he tells us of his devotion to the Democratic party and to slavery, as though they were identical; and it becomes my duty to hold up the mirror to him, that he may contemplate the light in which he stands, and that the country may know the claims which he possesses to public confidence.

I must pass over many points of trifling importance, in order to notice a few of the most prominent untruths put forth by the member. Tacitly admitting the falsehood of his original assertion, and of his various fictions, brought forth to cover a dishonorable retreat from disgraceful positions, he proceeded to assail me on another point. I give his words:

"But such was the howling storm of indignation in this entire Hall, such was the deep abhorrence of the vile and atrocious conduct of that member, that he, in view of that storm, and shrinking from it, asked if he had the power to withdraw his resolutions."

If the record of that event does not show that I met the "howling storm" to which he refers without shrinking, I must submit to the imputation. My mind dwelt, at the time, on the Constitution of our country; upon my rights; upon the rights of the people. I was not, indeed, conscious of the "howling storm" to which he refers. I had not dreamed that any one saw cause to shrink or tremble on the occasion alluded to. I have no ambition, however, to vindicate my reputation for courage. The bull-dog or wild boar possess as much of that as the member from Virginia; yet, sir, even at that point the member shall not escape from an exposure of his misrepresentation. I would give him to understand that mendacity, when exhibited even upon matters unimportant, cannot escape notice, if put forth by way of assault upon a fellow-member.

By referring to the history of our legislation in 1842, it will be seen that we were then acting under gag-rules, as already stated. That no member was permitted to assert his views as to the relation which the people of the free States held to the institution of slavery. I was perfectly aware of the irritation which would be called forth by the presentation of my resolutions. They set at defiance the gag-rules, and all efforts to suppress the freedom of debate. They hurled defiance at the tyranny which then ruled this body, and repudiated all Executive dictation. I was anxious, however, to secure the support of as many members in favor of my positions as I could. I desired to lay them before the House for deliberate consideration, intending to call them up for action after they had been examined by the members. I therefore stated my object when I rose to present them. In proof of this fact, I quote from the Congressional Globe, of the 21st March, 1842:

"Mr. GIDDINGS said he had a series of resolutions upon a subject which had excited some interest in the other end of the Capitol, and in the nation. He desired to lay them before the country, and would call them up for action at the next opportunity."

But a political opponent, acting with the member from Virginia, moved the previous question on their adoption. This was what I desired to avoid. I was perfectly aware that, under the irritation of the moment—such as that exhibited by Mr. Everett, and others—gentlemen would commit themselves against doctrines which they would afterwards, in their reflecting moments, acknowledge to be correct. Mr. Everett, as already shown, deprecated hasty action. Others desired me to withdraw them, in order that they might receive a more deliberate consideration. Mr. Fillmore, late President of the United States, inquired publicly of the Chair whether it would not be in order for him to ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GIDDINGS] to withdraw the resolutions? Mr. Fillmore was a political friend; so was Mr. Everett, and so were others who desired me to withdraw the resolutions, not on account of the "howling indignation" of the member from Virginia, or those who acted with him, but from a desire to consider the subject deliberately before voting upon it. I then distinctly inquired of the Chair, myself, if I had the right to withdraw them; he replied that I had. I quote from the Globe:

"Mr. GIDDINGS said that when he had risen to offer his resolutions he had distinctly stated that they were important, and that he merely laid them before the House."

"[Cries of 'Not in order! Sit down!']"

"The SPEAKER. The gentleman will either withdraw his resolutions or not."

"Mr. GIDDINGS. I was merely stating why I was about to—"

"The SPEAKER. It is not in order; the gentleman will either withdraw them or not."

"Mr. GIDDINGS withdrew his resolutions."

Now, sir, with this record before the country, the member from Virginia attempts to represent me as frightened into a withdrawal of the resolutions. Sir, I repeat what I said the other day, that none but paltrons suspect the firmness of those around them. Why, sir, suppose I had been the veriest coward living, does that prove the truth of his mendacious attack? Or does it change the doctrine, the constitutional views expressed in my resolutions? However great a coward I may be, it has been my desire that he should have no just cause of complaint against me on that account.

It is true that the member did offer me the personal insult which he states. In going out of the Hall, after taking leave of some personal friends, I passed the seat of Hon. Henry A. Wise, at that time a Representative from Virginia. The member now making this attack was engaged in conversation with Mr. Wise, with whom I exchanged those friendly expressions common among gentlemen. The member, as he intimated in his remarks, looked me in the face, and appeared to be interested in what was passing between Mr. Wise and myself. I had then very little acquaintance with him, and knew not but he had been bred among gentlemen, and instructed in the ordinary civilities of life. To have passed him rudely, without notice, would not only have been just cause of offense to him, but Mr. Wise, his colleague, and apparent friend, would also have had cause to complain. I therefore extended my hand to take my leave of him in the ordinary manner. He refused my hand, and returned my politeness by that coarse insult; and now he boasts of his vulgarity in refusing to respond to my courtesy. I have no regrets at having treated him decently. I do not think the man lives to whom I would offer an insult. It is related of a veteran officer of an hundred battles, that when an epauleted upstart, on a sudden offense, spat in his face, he coolly wiped it off, saying, "If I could wipe the stain of your blood from my soul as easily as I can this spittle from my face, your life should atone for the insult." I would ever follow that example rather than administer a just chastisement upon one whose mind has never been trained to observe the moral duties of life. Indeed, I entertained no unkind feelings for the member. My emotions were those of pity for that education which could lead him to boast of an act of boorish malignity, for which I think any man bred in decent society would have sought to apologize on the first occasion.

The member, in his first attack, stated that I was reelected after my resignation by only a majority of two thousand votes, &c., and when I told him my majority was more than three thousand five hundred, he then said that was merely the plurality by which I was elected; that there were two candidates opposed to me. In this statement there is not one word of truth. There was but one opposing candidate. This fabrication is of no other importance, however, than to show his propensity to state matters which never existed. The member also attempts to alter the record by saying that my colleague [Mr. Goode] prevented me from attempting, while on trial, "to defend myself, although the opportunity was again and again tendered me." So far from being true, this statement is entirely contradicted by the record. Mr. Botts, of Virginia, originally introduced the resolution of censure, but being declared out of order, he handed it to Mr. WELLER, of my State. I quote from the Congressional Globe:

"Mr. WELLER rose in his place and offered the resolution of Mr. Botts."

"And the resolution having been read,

"Mr. WELLER moved the previous question."

And, after some inquiries of the Speaker, &c.,

"Mr. WELLER said he had moved the previous question when he offered the resolution."

"The SPEAKER said he was aware that the previous question was moved on the resolution, but to entertain it would certainly cut off the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GIDDINGS] from speaking in his own defense."

The next morning Mr. WELLER made a short speech, at the close of which he said he would withdraw the demand for the previous question provided I would then go on with my defense, and with the understanding, also, that when I was through the vote should be taken. I now resume the account given in the Globe:

"[Cries of 'No understandings, we will have no understandings.']"

"The SPEAKER. The gentleman will either withdraw the demand or not."

"Mr. WELLER not withdrawing unconditionally the demand for the previous question,

"Mr. GIDDINGS rose and addressed the Chair."

"The SPEAKER said the gentleman was not in order, the House having reversed the decision of the Chair, and decided that the rules in relation to the previous question should be rigidly enforced."

And the demand for the previous question was taken, and decided in the affirmative.

I quote the record to show that the member who moved the resolution of censure demanded the previous question at the moment the resolution was read; that he refused to withdraw it when informed that it would cut me off from my defense. The member who did this, soon after wrote a letter, which was published in my district, with the evident purpose to defeat my reelection. In that letter he substantially asserts that I had the privilege of defending myself. This letter, written for electioneering purposes, has recently reappeared in the Executive organ of this city. The author is now a Senator in the other end of the Capitol, and is supposed to have furnished the letter in question to aid his friend, the member who now attempts to falsify the history of our past action. Sir, I repeat what I have already said, there stands the record. It was made up twelve years since, and no Senator or member of this body has power to alter it. No subterfuge, no evasion, no false representation, can modify or change it. Under the previous question my lips were sealed; the vote was taken, and the resolution of censure adopted.

There were propositions to suspend the rules in order to hear my defense; propositions to have me heard by unanimous consent; but not one of those motions was adopted by the House, nor was the question even propounded to the House on one of them. Yet these propositions of individual members have been seized upon, and represented to be offers tendered by the House to hear me; and when the Senator to whom I have referred, or the member who assails me, are driven to desperation on this point, they seek to cover up their misrepresentations by referring to these propositions of individuals, who spoke for themselves alone; but it is my intention not to leave them even that subterfuge through which to make a dishonorable retreat. Just as the vote was about to be taken on the resolution of censure—I quote from the Globe:

"Mr. CAMPBELL, of South Carolina, said he would move, by general consent, that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GIDDINGS] be heard in his defense."

"Mr. BARNARD. I object."

"The SPEAKER. The motion cannot be entertained."

"Mr. PENDLETON asked to be excused from voting, and after assigning his reasons, he withdrew his motion."

"Mr. GIDDINGS then rose, and said: I stand before the House in a peculiar situation."

"MARK A. COOPER objected to Mr. GIDDINGS proceeding."

I felt no disposition to be trifled with; and I added a caption to what I had written and intended saying, and sent it to the reporter, who inserted it in his journal of the proceedings, from which I now read:

"TO THE REPORTER OF THE INTELLIGENCER.—When I rose so often during the confusion of the proceedings of the House this day, and was so often called to order, the last time by Mark A. Cooper, of Georgia, I had written out and desired to have stated to the House what follows:

"Mr. Speaker, I stand before the House in a peculiar situation. It is proposed to pass a vote of censure upon me, substantially for the reason that I differ in opinion from a majority of the members. The vote is about to be taken without giving me time to be heard. It were idle for me to say that I am ignorant of the disposition of a majority to pass the resolution. I have been violently assailed in a personal manner, but have no opportunity of being heard in reply. I do not stand here at this time to crave any favor, or to ask mercy at the hands of members; but in the name of an insulted constituency, in behalf of one of the sovereign States of this Union, in behalf of the people and of the Constitution, I demand a hearing, agreeably to the rights guaranteed to me, and in the ordinary mode of proceeding. I accept of no other privilege. I WILL RECEIVE NO OTHER COURTESY."

I read this to show that I was not permitted even to demand my rights, nor to express my contempt for the insulting propositions of individuals to hear me by unanimous consent, while they voted for the previous question in order to seal my lips. Now, sir, if the member from Virginia, [Mr. SMITH], or the Senator from California, [Mr. WELLER], intended to say that the privilege of defending myself was tendered me by the House, or by any vote or action of that body, such assertion is most distinctly and emphatically contradicted by the record. If they intend to say that the vote which sustained the previous question did not by parliamentary rules cut me off from all defense, then I reply that such declaration is equally opposed to the record and to truth. Or if they intend to say that I could have been heard by unanimous consent, they are equally unfortunate in contradicting the record; for that shows distinctly that objections were made up to the moment of taking the vote on the resolution of censure. That I repeatedly attempted to speak, and was as often silenced. I feel constrained to meet all these unworthy efforts to falsify the history of that transaction. Gentlemen should understand that here men act not merely for the day, but for all coming time; we are hourly writing our own biographies; and as they are written they must descend to our successors.

The letter of the Senator [Mr. WELLER] is very long, and embraces many things of a personal character to which I feel no desire to reply; but I refer to this point, on which he attempted to change the record of facts. To his personal attacks the people responded at the time. It is sufficient to say that I remained at my post here. He left. He then appealed to the people of our State to elect him Governor. They did not sustain his appeal, and he left our State. In process of time he appeared in the other end of the Capitol from a distant State, and now furnishes the member from Virginia with a scurrilous letter to aid him in his work of mendacity.

But the member, again, tacitly admitting his original charge to have been a fabrication, which he could not explain or justify, has recourse to other misrepresentations—charging me with disobeying the instructions of my constituents. Well, sir, if true, it would appear that those constituents were the proper persons to complain, and not the member from Virginia. Indeed, such a complaint from him looks very suspicious. At the meeting of our people, to which I have referred, honorable B. F. WADE, now a Senator in the other end of the Capitol, offered the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the Hon. JOSHUA R. GIDDINGS, on his return to Congress, be, and is hereby, instructed, at the first moment after it shall be in order, to offer the identical resolutions over again which he before offered, and insist that the House of Representatives act upon them by a direct vote."

It was, I believe, unanimously adopted. It is true, however, that I did not present the resolutions, and the member from Virginia assails me in no gentle terms for failing to present them. But his language is so characteristic, that I prefer to give it verbatim. He says, speaking of myself:

"Instructed by his beloved constituents! Did he obey that instruction? No, sir; his white-livered heart skulked from it. He even disregarded the instructions of his dear and much loved people, who sent him here, with instructions to carry out his original purpose. Big, sir, with pride and consequence, and offended feeling, he left this Hall with a determination to do or die. He was backed up by his people at home, better men than himself, I have no doubt, yet when he came into the presence of the majesty of the Representatives of the American people, he quailed; yes, sir, he quailed before it, and did not obey his instructions, or carry out his original purpose."

Well, sir, I am not about to deny that I quailed before the majesty of such Representatives as the member who thus attacks me. Professors of courage, or denial of cowardice, are of little importance, whether uttered by him or myself. The record must bear testimony to the port and bearing of members here. But this attack demands that I shall bring to the notice of this body and the country an important fact hitherto unpublished. I returned to this Hall instructed as I have shown. The intention which I entertained was well understood by all, both friends and foes, as the member, when referring to me, said: "It was understood that he would come back here and renew his resolutions." I could, however, only present them in order, when my State should be called for resolutions, under the rule which required the States to be called for that purpose on each alternate Monday. Yet the business of the House was under the control of the majority. That majority had voted to censure me for introducing my resolutions, and they knew that the first moment Ohio should be called I should again present them, and put gentlemen to the test of either censuring me again or of receding from the position they had taken.

Now, sir, I do not say that those one hundred and twenty-five members were held in fear by me, or that they trembled before me, but I do say that they evaded that rule which, if observed, would have permitted me to put them to the test which I designed. On each alternate Monday of that entire session I sat at my desk with my resolutions before me, hoping and desiring most ardently an opportunity to test the moral firmness of those who censured me by constraining them either to vote another censure, or to acknowledge their error before the world. There was no earthly consideration within my power that I would not have given for the privilege of thus exhibiting the statesmanship of those who attempted to dictate my course on this floor. But, sir, it was all in vain. The majority had control of the business, and they would not suffer the States to be called for resolutions. They were too wary to be placed in the dilemma which I contemplated. During that entire session, after my return to this body the rule to which I refer was violated, and no call for resolutions was permitted.

Nor was that an end of this singular exhibition of legislative evasion. We again assembled in the following December. The rules of the body required the States to be called for resolutions on each of the first thirty days of the session, and on each alternate Monday afterwards. During that whole session, too, I was prepared to test the firmness of the majority who had censured me. But during that entire period the House was not called for resolutions; the rules were again violated and wholly disregarded, and the presentation of my resolutions avoided. I repeat, there stands the record. It shows these violations of the rule, these subterfuges, these evasions by a majority of this body, in order to escape the necessity of maintaining the attitude they had assumed, or of backing out from the obvious error into which they had fallen.

And now, sir, after the lapse of twelve years, the member from Virginia, one of that majority, charges me with skulking from the presentation of my resolutions; with disregarding the instructions of my constituents. Let the record of that day declare who skulked, who evaded, who dodged. Certainly no member was afraid of me; no one trembled before me; but they feared the force and power of truth—of justice—of the popular will. He says I quailed before the majority of the representatives of the American people. I do not retort, and say that the majority quailed before me. God forbid! But I say that member, and the majority of that Congress, quailed before the apprehension of being constrained to vote another censure, or receding from the position they had assumed.

I thank the member for affording me this opportunity of calling attention to a fact hitherto unnoticed in our public press. It was a rare exhibition of the influence which an humble individual may wield over a legislative body when he has truth, justice, and the Constitution on his side.

At the close of that Congress we separated. I bore with me no unkind feelings toward any of them. Few, very few, came back. Many retired to private life. Many have now gone to their final rest. To those who survive I would tender my best wishes, my prayers for their prosperity and their happiness.

The President and his Cabinet receded from the position they had assumed. They no longer demanded of Great Britain compensation for the people who obtained their freedom on board the Creole. The law of nature and of nations stood vindicated; the rights of persons to their liberty when taken beyond the jurisdiction of slave laws was acknowledged. The objects which I had in view when I presented my original resolutions were attained. The doctrines asserted in them now stand acknowledged truths.

These transactions have long since passed into history, the truth of which it is my duty and my pleasure to vindicate.

Mr. SINGLETON. I have not risen to address the committee at this time, but merely to secure the floor that I may have an opportunity of doing so to-morrow.

Mr. McDUGALL. With the permission of the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. SINGLETON,] I move then that the committee rise.

The question was taken; and the motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the Chairman reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration the Union generally, and particularly House bill No. 259, being a bill to authorize the construction of the Pacific railroad, and had come to no conclusion thereon.

Mr. PERKINS, of Louisiana, by the unanimous consent of the House, introduced a bill to "remodel the diplomatic and consular establishments of the United States," which was read the first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

On motion by Mr. HAVEN, the House then (at five minutes before four o'clock, p. m.) adjourned till to-morrow at twelve o'clock, m.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, June 8, 1854.

Prayer by Rev. WILLIAM H. MILBURN.

The Journal of Monday was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

THE PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 3d of April, transmitting a report from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, in reference to the manner in which the Government had fulfilled the stipulations of the treaty of October 26, 1832, with the Potawatomie Indians; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Also, a communication from the Second Auditor of the Treasury, in compliance with the act of Congress of June 30, 1834, transmitting copies of such accounts as have been rendered by persons charged or intrusted with the disbursement and application of moneys, goods, or effects, for the benefit of the Indians, from July 1, 1852, to June 30, 1853; which was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. SFUJART. Mr. President, when the Senate adjourned last week it was understood by Senators generally that no business of importance would be done during this week. At the suggestion of several Senators, I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day, it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

Mr. ADAMS. I see no necessity in the world for adjourning over perpetually. We have had one week of recess. If we have nothing to do we had better adjourn finally and go home.

The motion was agreed to.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Mr. SEBASTIAN presented the memorial of John S. Watrous, late agent for the Chippewa Indians, praying indemnity for losses sustained by him in consequence of the burning of the Chippewa agency buildings; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. GEYER presented the memorial of citizens of St. Louis, Missouri, praying the adoption of such measures as will insure to American citizens, in foreign countries, the enjoyment of the rights of conscience and religious worship; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. FESSENDEN presented the petition of Ephraim Hunt, praying compensation for services rendered by him during the war of 1812; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. SLIDELL presented the petition of William Duer, praying compensation for expenses incurred, and services rendered as consul in Valparaiso, in the case of William N. Stuart; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. HAMLIN presented the petition of C. B. H. Fessenden, collector and superintendent of lights for the district of New Bedford, Massachusetts, praying an increase of compensation; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. MASON presented a petition of the inhabitants of Richmond, Virginia, praying the reduction of the rates of ocean postage; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Also, a petition of the inhabitants of Gum Spring, Loudon county, Virginia, praying the reduction of the rates of ocean postage; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. FISH presented the petition of Royal Phelps, attorney in fact of James, Earl of Selkirk, praying that a patent may be issued for certain lands granted to his father by the Hudson's Bay Company; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. FESSENDEN presented the petition of citizens of the United States, remonstrating against the extension of Woodworth's patent for a playing machine; which was referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

Also, a petition of the inhabitants of Vassalboro', Maine, praying the reduction of the rates of ocean postage; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Also, a petition of the inhabitants of Winthrop, Maine, praying the reduction of the rates of ocean postage; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. FISH presented the petition of Abraham Cutler, praying the payment of a balance due him for his services as a lieutenant in the late war with Great Britain, and that he may be allowed a pension for injuries received while in the discharge of his duties; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BROWN presented the petition of Dimity Canna, John B. Toulme, and Dudley R. Walker, praying the correction of an error in the location of certain lands in the State of Mississippi; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. FOOT presented three petitions of citizens of the towns of Starkboro', Ferrisburgh, and Monckton, State of Vermont, praying a reduction of the present rates of ocean postage; which were referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. SEBASTIAN presented a memorial of the directors of the Moravian Board of Missions, in behalf of the "Christian Indians," living on lands belonging to the Delaware, about being surrendered to the United States, praying compensation for their improvements; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

REPORT FROM A STANDING COMMITTEE.

Mr. HAMLIN, from the Committee on Commerce, reported a bill for the better preservation of life and property from vessels shipwrecked on the coasts of the United States; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

ALDEN'S REEF, PORTLAND, MAINE.

Mr. FESSENDEN submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making an appropriation for the purpose of building a light-boat, and maintaining the same on Alden's Reef, lying off the harbor of Portland, Maine, and substituting a steam whistle for the fog bell on Cape Elizabeth, Maine.

NEW MAIL ROUTE.

Mr. SEBASTIAN submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing, by law, a mail route from Danville, in Yell county, Arkansas, to Milton Gilbraith's, in Scott county, by way of Rover and Bluffton, and report by bill or otherwise

COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS.

Mr. CLAYTON. There is a vacancy in the Committee on Foreign Relations, which has been occasioned by the resignation of Mr. EVERETT, late Senator from Massachusetts. It is a committee of importance, and it is necessary that the vacancy should be filled. I hope that, by unanimous consent, the Chair will be authorized to make the appointment.

There being no objection, it was so ordered, and Mr. FISKE was appointed.

THOMAS FRAZER.

Mr. HAMLIN. There is a private House bill on the table for the relief of Thomas Frazer, which was indefinitely postponed by the Senate, but, subsequently, at our request, was returned to us from the House. A motion is pending to reconsider the vote by which it was indefinitely postponed. I ask the Senate now to proceed to its consideration.

The motion was agreed to.

The question was taken on the motion to reconsider; and it was adopted.

The PRESIDENT. The question is now on the motion to indefinitely postpone the bill.

Mr. WELLER. What is the bill for?

Mr. HAMLIN. I will state in a very few words what it is. As the law now stands, when a pension is granted by Congress to an invalid, and that pension is for half pay—four dollars a month—the Department has determined that it cannot increase that to a full pension, if the pensioner should subsequently become wholly disabled, because it is a pension granted under a special law. This case belongs to that class. The pensioner has a half pension. The evidence now is ample, coming from intelligent surgeons, that he is entirely blind. The House passed the bill to increase the pension to eight dollars a month. The Committee on Pensions of this body asked to be discharged from its further consideration, on the ground that they had reported a general bill covering the case. That general bill may never pass, and then this man will not get the benefit of it. If it does pass, it will only put him within its provisions.

Mr. CASS. Let us pass the bill.

The motion to postpone the bill indefinitely was not agreed to.

The bill was then considered as in Committee of the Whole; and no amendment being proposed it was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read a third time, and passed.

On motion, the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, June 8, 1854.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. WILLIAM H. MILBURN.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. RIDDLE. Will the gentleman from Tennessee withdraw that motion for a moment, to allow me to offer a resolution?

Mr. HAVEN. I desire to make a privileged motion. I wish, before the vote is taken upon the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. JONES,] to offer a resolution to close debate upon the Pacific railroad bill at two o'clock on Tuesday next.

Mr. HENDRICKS. That is too soon.

Mr. BENTON. I have to say that I desire to offer some remarks upon that subject, which I have yet to prepare, based principally upon the winter explorations of Colonel Frémont. Tuesday is the earliest day upon which I can present them to the House.

Mr. HAVEN. In looking about the Hall, I fear that if I were to press a vote upon the resolution now I might prevent the House going into the Committee of the Whole to-day. I am willing to change the day, so as to accommodate the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. BENTON.] I will not ask the House to act upon the resolution now, but I will do so on next Monday, when the House meets.

The SPEAKER. The question now recurs upon the motion made by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. JONES.]

Mr. GIDDINGS. I rise to a privileged question. I wish to call the attention of the House to the conduct of one of its officers. I refer to A. O. P. Nicholson, the editor of the Daily Union, and printer of this body. Without further remark, I ask the Clerk to read that portion of the article to which I invite the attention of the House.

The article was then read, as follows:

"In one word, protection and obedience are reciprocal and inseparable; and those who, like the Abolition incendiaries, Parker, Phillips, GIDDINGS, and others, are incessantly proclaiming their hostility to the laws and the Constitution, and stimulating men, women, and children to violate them as a sacred duty, in my opinion have no claim to the protection of those laws or that Constitution. They are the apostles of sedition, violence, and murder, they are feræ naturæ—wild beasts of the forest, knowing no law and no restraint but their wild, ungovernable instincts, and, like dastardly midnight prowlers, after firing the train, sneak to their holes, leaving their wretched dupes to become the victims of those acts which they themselves have stimulated. Is there no law that can reach these cowardly incendiaries, who, after throwing the fire-brand, skulk away in darkness to enjoy the blaze? And are those who, on the floor of both Houses of Congress, openly declare their disaffection to that Constitution they have sworn to support and maintain, worthy of a seat in the sacred halls of legislation when any act should emanate from that source?"

Mr. BOCKOCK. I wish to know how that article comes before the House?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GIDDINGS] rises in his seat, and addresses the Chair, announcing that he has a privileged question to which he desires to call the attention of the House.

Mr. BOCKOCK, (interrupting.) Well, I do not see any question of privilege in all this.

The SPEAKER. He desired to have the article read; for what purpose the gentleman himself will state.

Mr. GIDDINGS. It is my intention to state very distinctly the purpose for which I have introduced the subject.

Mr. McMULLIN. I submit that there is no question of privilege in this.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I will, according to the established laws of this House, state my question of privilege, under the direction of the Speaker.

Mr. PARKER. I wish to ask the gentleman from Ohio a question. I have not read the article of which he complains; but from its reading by the Clerk, I hear a name announced which is familiar to me, and I wish to know whether a member of the House is spoken of under the name of Parker?

Several MEMBERS. Oh, no; it is Theodore Parker, a minister of the Gospel. [Laughter.]

Mr. GIDDINGS. I know my own name, Mr. Speaker, and believe there is no doubt that it was the intention of the author of this article to refer to me, when he said that "GIDDINGS and others are incessantly proclaiming hostility to the laws and the Constitution, and stimulating men, women, and children to violate them, as a sacred duty. In my opinion they have no claim to the protection of those laws, or that Constitution." This declaration comes from an officer of this body. It declares members of this House outlaws, beyond the pale of legal protection. It is a direct invitation to assassinate, to perpetrate violence upon members of this body. Now, sir, I know very well that I am in a minority here, and that this attack upon me and others is to be sustained by a majority of the House, if sustained at all. But I merely desire to place this matter before them; and if they take the responsibility of maintaining and encouraging those who thus publicly invite to assassination and mob violence, the responsibility of doing so must rest with them—with the friends of the Administration. Sir, I have prepared a resolution which I proposed to offer on this subject, but I prefer to leave the matter entirely with the majority of the House, and so I now submit it to them.

Mr. OLDS. I would like to have the gentleman's resolution read. I might want to move an amendment to it.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Without any intention of taking any part in this controversy, I submit to the Chair that there is nothing in the question made by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GIDDINGS] which partakes of the character of a question of privilege. If the editor of the paper in question has assailed any member of the House, he did so in a capacity different from that which he occupies as an officer of this body. He has not done thus as an officer of this House, but as a private individual, as the editor of one of the papers of the city. In that capacity alone he is, I think, responsible to the gentleman from Ohio for what he has published.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the question of order submitted by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. JONES.] The gentleman from Ohio, however, announced his purpose to introduce a resolution, and the Chair is of opinion that he has a right to submit his resolution, if it proposes to dismiss the printer, or any other officer of this House.

Mr. GIDDINGS. The Chair will permit me to make one suggestion as to the practice of the House on this point. The Speaker will recollect, by consulting precedents, that all these questions of privilege have been submitted to the House for their adjudication as to whether the questions presented are questions of privilege or not.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will follow that example.

Mr. GIDDINGS. In reply to the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. JONES,] I can refer him to a case in which he was himself concerned. I would remind him, and I think there is no member of this House who was here a few years ago but remembers the fact, that a few years since we expelled the reporters of the New York Tribune for an attempt to ridicule a member of this body. I think the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. JONES] voted for that expulsion.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I do not recollect how I voted, but I recollect that there was such a proposition made here. I recollect, also, that the reporters of the Union were once expelled from this House, or, at least, an attempt was made to expel them, since I have been a member of this body. But that was an action against them in the characters of "reporters" here. They were privileged here as "reporters." They were here under the special authority of the House, through the Speaker, as "reporters." I think, in neither of the cases to which I have referred, were the editors of those papers arraigned, but only the reporters. Then, if the gentleman has a proposition to make, it might, perhaps, be directed against the editor of the paper, and it might exclude him. But I do not see how he can make it a privileged question upon the printer to the House for what he does in another character—that of the editor of a public newspaper.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I assure the gentleman that I have consulted the precedents with which both you, Mr. Speaker, and myself are personally acquainted. My proposition is to exclude from this Hall all persons who are connected with that paper. I place the editor of the Union in precisely the same position in which I place all other editors and persons connected with a paper.

The resolution offered by Mr. GIDDINGS was then read, as follows:

Whereas, A. O. P. Nicholson, Esq., printer of this body, and editor and proprietor of the Washington Union, in his paper of this morning has published an article most evidently designed to excite unlawful violence upon members of this body: therefore,
Resolved, That the said A. O. P. Nicholson, and all other persons connected with the Washington Union, be expelled from this Hall.

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

33d CONGRESS, 1st Session.

MONDAY, JUNE 12, 1854.

NEW SERIES.....No. 86.

Mr. OLDS. I understand my colleague as asking for the protection of this House, from the fact that he is threatened personally with violence. Perhaps the members of this House may have seen the effort made by my colleague not long since in the city of Boston—I am not able to say whether it was in Faneuil Hall, or where it was—in which he also intimates that he is afraid of being assassinated for the course of policy which he has pursued in reference to certain measures before this House.

But, sir, when he comes before this House to claim its protection, from the fear of being assassinated for what he has thought fit to do in the course of his official duty in this House, he ought to come with clean hands and a pure heart. If I recollect aright, in that very speech in Boston, the gentleman charged that his colleagues in this House have been bribed, and have cast their votes under a bribe.

Mr. HOUSTON, (interrupting.) I desire to know of the Chair whether he entertains this as a question of privilege; and if he does not, I object to the resolution, and to all debate upon it.

Mr. GIDDINGS. The gentleman has not the floor for that purpose. I yielded it only to my colleague, [Mr. OLDS.]

Mr. HOUSTON. I rose to a point of order, and I am entitled to the floor for that purpose.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I yielded only to my colleague.

Mr. HOUSTON. I inquire of the Chair if he entertains the matter as a question of privilege; and if he does not, I object to this discussion?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will refer to the House the question, whether there is any question of privilege involved in the resolution of the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. GIDDINGS. I suppose I have a right to proceed and finish my remarks?

The SPEAKER. The Chair decides that the gentleman has no such right; because if it is not a question of privilege, discussion will be out of order.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I call for the yeas and nays upon the question.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky. I do not understand Mr. Nicholson as standing in that position which entitles him to the privileges of this Hall. He is a mere contractor. I do not understand that there is any rule of this House which authorizes him to be admitted here, and therefore a resolution expelling him would have no effect.

Mr. HOUSTON. That is precisely the point I proposed to make.

The SPEAKER. As printer of the House, Mr. Nicholson is entitled to the privileges of the floor, or, at least, to the privileges of the Hall.

The question now being upon whether the point raised was a question of privilege,

Mr. GIDDINGS demanded the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HAVEN. If the Chair will pardon me for one moment—I do not wish to do anything hastily or rashly in reference to this matter—I wish, however, to say that the removal of the drapery in the rear of the Speaker's chair seems to have so affected the sound in the Hall as to make it wholly impossible for us in this direction to hear what is going on. Now, sir, whether this is a question of privilege or not depends very much upon the character of the article alluded to. I would like to have the article again read. But I desire to take this opportunity of calling the attention of the Speaker to the fact that exists in reference to the difficulty of hearing in the Hall. I think some measures ought to be taken to remedy it.

Mr. STANTON. Will the gentleman allow me to say that this is not an article from the editor; it is an article signed "Old Fogey."

Mr. GIDDINGS. I understand that. It is evidently from the pen of the editor.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I understand the question submitted to the House to be, to determine whether the case presented is what is commonly known as a question of privilege; and this, like any other question, I suppose, is debatable. If it be, I want to make a suggestion upon the subject. I will not occupy much of the time of the House; but I submit this point to the Chair and the House—

Mr. COBB. I think this is not a debatable question. I raise that question of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would suggest that the article and the resolution be read in connection.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I desire first to state the precise point which I understand to be made. I understand the Speaker to decide that, under the rules of the House, the public printer is entitled to come upon this floor, and is entitled to certain privileges here. The gentleman from Ohio offers a resolution, the effect of which is to deprive him of these privileges. Now, whether the paper referred to is of such a character as to justify us in adopting the resolution, is a question I do not propose to go into.

Mr. HOUSTON. Does the Chair decide that this is a debatable question?

The SPEAKER. The Chair decides that it is debatable.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Well, Mr. Speaker, I say this: Where we give special privileges to individuals to come into the Hall, we put them, to some extent, on the footing of members and officers of the House, and therefore a proposition to deprive such of that privilege, to expel them from the Hall, is properly a privileged question. Having this view of the matter, and the gentleman from Ohio having submitted his resolution, I think that the House ought to entertain it. He comes forward, and upon his responsibility as a member of this House, proposes to deprive individuals of privileges which they now enjoy in this Hall.

Now, I beg leave to say that, from the reading of the article indicated, I do not see anything which would justify the adoption of the resolution of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GIDDINGS.] If I correctly understood it, in my opinion, it is much less violent than many of the speeches made by the gentleman here against individuals and members of this body. At the same time I hold that while the gentleman from Ohio is apprehensive of personal attack, he has the right to ask the House to protect him; and, if he can make out a proper case, I will myself vote for furnishing him a guard for his protection while in the discharge of his duty. [A laugh.] If his object be to secure protection against violence, I shall be very much disposed to accord it to him, provided the facts stated make out his case. But I do not think that there is anything in the article which would lead him, you, Mr. Speaker, or me, to suppose that the gentleman is in personal danger. If, however, he apprehends that Mr. Nicholson, or any other person, at his instigation, intends to interfere with his personal safety, I would vote to protect him as readily as I would any other gentleman upon the floor, though I differ from him so much.

The SPEAKER. The Chair must confine the gentleman to the single point as to whether or not the question is or is not privileged in its character.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I hope my friend from Alabama will withdraw his objection. I think the gentleman's resolution is one which ought to be entertained.

The SPEAKER. The Chair indicated, when the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GIDDINGS] remarked that he had a resolution of that character, that, in the opinion of the Chair, it would be a privileged question. The editor, or editors of the Union have the privilege of the Hall, but they have not the privilege of the floor. That paper has a number of reporters here, and they are here by law of the House, and under the direction of the Speaker. The gentleman proposes to expel them all, editors and reporters. The Chair is of the opinion that the question is a privileged one, and so decides.

Mr. MILLSON. I desire to make a simple suggestion on this question of privilege. It seems to me that there is some confusion arising from the mingling of questions. I understand the Chair to decide that the proposition to expel the public printer is a privileged question. I presume there can be no doubt of it. I take it for granted that Mr. A. O. P. Nicholson, as an officer of this House, may be expelled from it. I think the Chair is right—indeed, I am sure that he is right—in the statement that the public printer is entitled to the privilege of the Hall, or admission to the Hall of the House as public printer; but I conceive that the public printer is not entitled to admission within this Hall as editor of the Union. I conceive, moreover, that the other persons who are proposed to be expelled by the resolution of the gentleman from Ohio as connected with the Union, are not entitled to the privilege of the floor, unless so entitled as the reporters for that paper.

The SPEAKER. They are in that character. And Mr. A. O. P. Nicholson is entitled, under an express law of the House, to the privilege of the Hall, as an ex-Senator of the United States. He is named in the resolution.

Mr. MILLSON. The questions ought to be separated. If it be proposed to expel Mr. A. O. P. Nicholson as an officer of the House, then it may be material for us to inquire whether he has done anything in that character which would subject him to expulsion. But I will not express my opinion on that point now. If, on the other hand, the object be to expel the reporters as well as the editor or editors of the Union, as persons entitled to the privilege of using the reporters' desks, and not as officers of the House, and the editor not as public printer, then it will become important for us to inquire whether any of them, the editor, or his associates in the Union, have done anything in their capacity as reporters to subject them to expulsion.

Now, I think that the resolution of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GIDDINGS] is drawn so vaguely and indeterminate as not to present to the House a question of privilege as it ought to be presented. I think that it is a question of privilege whether the public printer ought to be expelled. At the same time I do not know that the public printer, as public printer, ought to be expelled for the publication of an objectionable article in the Union newspaper. On the other hand, perhaps the reporters connected with the Union may subject themselves to censure by the publication of objectionable paragraphs in that newspaper, and they then incur the censure of the House, not as officers of the House, but as reporters. In the state of confusion in which the question is involved, I find it difficult to determine upon what grounds to present it.

Mr. HAMILTON. Is there anything before the House for consideration?

The SPEAKER. The resolution offered by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GIDDINGS.]

Mr. HAMILTON. I move to lay the resolution upon the table.

Mr. OLDS. I suppose I have the right to the floor, as it was taken from me by the question of order.

Mr. PRESTON. I understand the question to be one of order, which the Chair has not decided.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. OLDS] was addressing the Chair when the suggestion was made by some gentleman upon the floor that questions of privilege were heretofore referred to the judgment of the House. The Chair acquiesced in that suggestion for a moment; but afterwards, however, determined that there was involved in this resolution a question of privilege, and that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GIDDINGS] had a right to move to expel from the Hall any officer of this House.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I yielded the floor to my colleague for explanation.

The SPEAKER. The Chair asked the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GIDDINGS], just as he was taking his seat, if he yielded the floor, and he said, "I yield it."

Mr. GIDDINGS. It was not my intention to yield it entirely, but merely to my colleague for the purpose of explanation.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GIDDINGS] yields the floor to his colleague for explanation.

Mr. OLDS. I supposed I had obtained the floor by the decision of the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GIDDINGS] positively states that he yielded the floor for explanation merely.

Mr. OLDS. I desire to make no personal explanation.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I will yield to my colleague one half of the time allotted to me.

Mr. OLDS. If the gentleman is entitled to the floor, he can occupy it, and I will try and get it afterwards.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I do not desire to occupy the attention of the House for any considerable time. I merely wish to repeat, that this question rests with the majority, and not with me nor my friends. That I may be understood as to the definite point upon which I rest the question of privilege, I again call attention to the emphatic language used in the article of the Union to which I refer:

"In one word, protection and obedience are reciprocal and inseparable, and those who, like the Abolition incendiaries, Parker, Phillips, GIDDINGS, and others, are incessantly proclaiming their hostility to the laws and Constitution, and stimulating men, women, and children to violate them as a sacred duty, in my opinion, have no claim to the protection of those laws or that Constitution."

Now, Mr. Speaker, here is a distinct, a palpable, an obvious invitation to assassins and mobocrats to perpetrate personal violence on members.

Mr. LANE, of Oregon, (interrupting.) I desire to ask the gentleman from Ohio whether he feels that he is in danger of personal violence, or of assassination?

Mr. GIDDINGS. My friend from Oregon will excuse me from answering that question, as I think he has no right to put it. I will say, however, that I fear for the dignity of this body, if not for my own safety. I entertain fears for the character of the American Congress, and for the maintenance and security of its rights?

Mr. LANE. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him again?

Mr. GIDDINGS. Certainly.

Mr. LANE. I did not distinctly hear the gentleman's answer, but I will say this to him, that I am certain he is in no danger of being personally maltreated.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I do not thank the gentleman for an assurance of that kind.

Mr. LANE. I am confident that nobody will hurt him. [Laughter.] Nothing truer has been ever said than that "Conscience makes cowards of us all."

But there is no danger of my friend from Ohio. He will not be hurt. [Laughter.] I propose to go security for his safety. We may thus save time, and proceed to other business.

Mr. GIDDINGS. Mr. Speaker, I could not hear very distinctly the observations of my friend from Oregon, though I have no doubt that whatever he said was said in the kindest terms and with the best intentions. I understood him, however, to say that he would go security for my personal safety. I am much obliged to him, but I have not yet asked for that.

Now, Mr. Speaker, to resume the remarks which I was making when interrupted. I was saying that the editor of this paper has pronounced myself and others without the pale of the law, liable at any moment to be shot down by an assassin, whenever he shall please to perpetrate the work of murder on our persons. It remains, sir, for the Administration, whose organ this paper is, and for the supporters of that Administration, to say whether editors of this character shall be maintained by this body, and admitted to privileges in this Hall. If the Administration is to be sustained by braggarts and bullies, the country should know it.

In reply to my colleague, [Mr. OLDS,] when he talks of my speech in Boston, be it understood, in the first place, that I have served too long in this body to permit him or any other man to call me from the question before us to any newspaper reports of what I said in Boston. I spoke what I pleased, and am responsible for it in the proper mode; but what I may have said there does not authorize the assassin to enter this Hall to slay me or my fellow-members. My colleague has not the power to dictate to me what I shall say, and when

I shall speak, and what language I shall utter. I have been, as I said, somewhat too long in this body to allow gentlemen to rise here, and undertake to crack their whips over me in this style.

"Go tell your slaves how choleric you are,
And make your bondsmen tremble."

But do not assail freemen with such language as that, as though we were unacquainted with our rights, or did not know how to maintain them. The amount of his argument is this, that I said that which he deems wrong in Boston; therefore the printer of this House may call on rowdies and blacklegs to commit violence on my person; and tell them that I am beyond the protection of law.

No, Mr. Speaker, let it be understood that, whatever I may say, or wherever I may say it, I am responsible to gentlemen whom I assail and to the public, in the same manner that other men are; but I am not outlawed, and made the legitimate object of murder, on account of a speech in Boston, or here, or anywhere. I am a member of this body, by the grace of God, and by the aid of an enlightened constituency. And being here, it is my duty to maintain, as far as in me lies, the rights, the privileges, and dignity of this body. If gentlemen may pronounce me an outlaw, they may pronounce every other member an object of murder. Indeed, the question has already arisen whether members are to be driven from their propriety by editors who play the whipper-in, and attempt to hiss on their bloodhounds. Shall members here appear in their seats armed and prepared to protect their persons from violence? That now appears to be the question.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in reply to the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. CLINGMAN,] and the gentleman from Oregon, [Mr. LANE,] let it be understood that I do not call for protection for myself. But I seek protection for the dignity and rights of this House. I say in plain, distinct, and definite language, that I ask the body to protect itself, its dignity, its honor, and the purity of the representative character of the nation. Every member has the same interest in the subject which I have. They will be affected to the same extent, and, in voting, will incur the same responsibilities which I must meet. It is true I am the person particularly assailed. My name is used; but the act, the threatened violence, is intended to affect all, to affect the entire body, the whole nation.

My resolution asks no more protection for myself than for the body. It seeks to purify this Hall from the contamination of such editors.

And here let me say, that if I recollect aright, my colleague over the way [Mr. OLDS] voted to exclude the reporter of the Tribune. I am not certain about it, but speak from my present impression. And if my memory serves me aright, he voted to exclude from this Hall the correspondent of the Tribune, for holding up a colleague of ours to ridicule. And all persons connected with that paper were also excluded from this Hall by the same resolution. I have had no time to refer to precedent; I speak from recollection; but I am perfectly conscious that I speak accurately.

And here I will reply one word to the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. MILLSON.] The resolution before the House is in the precise order, and in the exact language, I think; I drew it from memory, and I may have possibly varied in some words from the resolution which excluded the reporter, and all persons connected with the New York Tribune on a former occasion, and which was carried entirely by the votes of the Democratic party of this House. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MILLSON] insisted that the editor might be expelled, but not the reporters. I know not who the reporters of that paper are. They may be my warmest friends. But are the agents of this paper, a paper in which this assault is contained, through which it is communicated to the country, to be allowed the privileges of this Hall? The object of my resolution is to stamp the paper with our disapprobation; to say to the country we will allow no persons connected with such a paper to enjoy the privileges of this Hall. It is on account of the character of the paper, on account of the editor whose agents they are, that we would exclude them from the Hall.

I have no design to occupy the time of the House. All I ask is, that gentlemen shall place their names upon the record of yeas and nays, in this case, that each shall say, in distinct language, whether he will take upon himself the responsibility of maintaining, of encouraging, an assassin like him who controls the Washington Union, or whether he will exclude such men from this Hall. I care not whether you are Whigs, or Free-Soilers, or Democrats, I desire each to express his own sense of moral duty, of self-respect. Let it be entered upon our records, and go forth to the people. Let gentlemen come up and place their names before the country, and let the people know whether we tolerate a man who puts forth such an article as that which has been read. Let each member speak to his constituents; let them and the country understand our action, our own sense of propriety.

Sir, I see my colleague [Mr. OLDS] is ready to speak upon this matter. I want him to express his views in relation to it, and I desire to hear his views in relation to it. I wish to ascertain whether he would sustain a man, as officer of this body, who invites assassination, because I or some other member has spoken severe things of members in Boston or elsewhere. Does he advocate the maintenance of rowdies and bullies here to prevent members from doing what they please? Why, sir, I said nothing in Boston that has not been substantially uttered in this Hall on repeated occasions. But I shall not enter upon that subject at this time. I will, on a proper occasion, meet my colleague on that subject; but I am not now on trial; Mr. Nicholson is the man now before us. We will try him, and then my colleague may arraign me if he pleases. But now, I will not permit myself to be drawn into a discussion of anything I have said in Boston, or here, or elsewhere; yet I will say that my colleague does not happen to possess the power to read me out of the pale of human society.

It has been suggested that the article complained of is not editorial; that it appears under another name. Why, sir, I shall not stand here to argue before the American people the question that an editor is responsible for matters he puts forth. The presumption is that he wrote it under another name for the very purpose of excusing himself before the public. He has placed it there, he has sent it before the American people, proclaimed it, and must be held to the same responsibility as though it were written by himself. Indeed, the presumption is that he wrote it.

Mr. OLDS here obtained the floor.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Will the gentleman from Ohio permit me to refer to the case of the Tribune reporter?

Mr. OLDS. Certainly.

Mr. JONES. That case had nothing of a privileged character in it. Here is the record:

"Mr. SAWYER rose, and, by leave, made a personal explanation in reference to a letter from this city, which had appeared in the New York Tribune, purporting to be a description of some of the personal habits of Mr. S., and otherwise of a scurrilous and abusive character."

"The reason assigned by Mr. S. for bringing the matter before the House was not to ask any interference on its part, but to say that he had been unable to fix the letter on any individual; the one who was the reputed correspondent denying the authorship, and gave notice that in future when attacks of this kind were made upon him he should take the matter into his own hands."

The reporter does not go into explanation further than necessary to render intelligible the subsequent action of the House.

"Mr. BRINKERHOFF offered the following resolution: Resolved, That the reporters or letter-writers of the New York Tribune be expelled from this House."

"And Mr. B. demanded the previous question."

"Mr. WASHINGTON HUNT moved to lay the resolution on the table, but subsequently withdrew that motion, remarking that his only reason for making it was to give time for explanation to the editor of the New York Tribune."

"The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered."

"And after a good deal of conversation, and some confusion, the resolution was adopted by the following vote."

The vote stands—121 yeas, 49 nays. Upon that resolution I voted in the affirmative, and the gentleman from Ohio voted in the negative.

The SPEAKER. The decision of the Chair, that this is a privileged question, is not based upon what appears in the Union newspaper. It is based upon the matter embraced in the resolution offered by the gentleman from Ohio, which is to expel from the Hall of the House the editors of the Union, who are entitled to the privileges of the Hall under the law of the House.

Mr. JONES. The editor of the Union is entitled to the privilege of the Hall, as I understand it, not as an officer elected by this House, but as one of those to whom, under a standing rule of the House, the Speaker is authorized to assign seats within the Hall.

Mr. OLDS. My colleague has warned me that he has been too long a member of this House not to be acquainted with the privileges which he personally holds in consequence of being a member of the Congress of the United States; too well to allow himself to be called in question here for what he has pleased to say elsewhere. Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to call him in question. I do not propose to arraign my colleague before this House for saying in Boston that others of his colleagues had given votes upon this floor under the influence of bribery and corruption. But I think, and I will say, that it comes in bad grace from him, after having thus slandered his colleagues, to call in question A. O. P. Nicholson for what appears in this morning's Union. It comes in bad grace from one who could leave his colleagues with a friendly farewell, and then, when hundreds of miles distant from them, attempt to strike them, assassin-like, in the dark; to strike them, not in their person, oh, no; my colleague is a man of peace; but to strike them in their reputation; to strike them behind their back; to strike them before an audience of strangers, where he knew they could not be heard in defense; to strike them with accusations which he knew to be false, false in their inception, and false in their utterance—

Mr. GIDDINGS. Will my colleague allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. OLDS. I will.

Mr. GIDDINGS. Does my colleague speak for himself, or for others?

Mr. OLDS. Ay, Mr. Speaker, do I speak for myself, or for others? I tell my colleague that I speak for myself and for others.

Mr. GIDDINGS. That will do.

Mr. OLDS. I speak for myself and for others. I speak to my colleague and to others. What I say I do not say in the dark. I do not go to the city of Boston, where I can be surrounded by an Abolition mob, to protect me in what I say. What I say, I say here upon the floor of the American Congress, for my colleague to hear, and for the American people to hear; and I say that he who comes upon this floor and claims protection, under the fear of personal violence, should not be the man to go, and, assassin-like, seek to stab his colleagues in the dark. Sir, the man who says that he cannot be held responsible for slanders uttered elsewhere against his colleagues—slanders, I repeat, sir, false in their inception, and false in their utterance—slanders which had no existence except in the distempered imagination of my colleague—ought not to receive from this House protection either in his person or reputation.

But, sir, my colleague says that he does not speak from fear—fear of personal violence; he brings this matter before us that the House may take care of its own dignity. If I recollect, on a memorable occasion this House did try to take care of its dignity. Yes, sir, the House did undertake to preserve its dignity when the conduct of that colleague of mine was such that, under a vote of censure by this House, he thought fit to resign his seat upon this floor. A friend near me remarks that my colleague was not expelled, but only resigned his seat. Yes, sir, I so understand it. The House, to preserve its dignity, passed resolutions censuring my colleague; and he, like the man who was kicked down stairs, coolly remarked that he left before the row commenced. [Great laughter.] Perhaps the same course now would greatly tend to the dignity of this House.

I have already said that he who comes here to make accusation against his fellow-members, or against the officers of this House, ought to come with clean hands and a pure heart. Can the gentleman do so? I would ask whether, if those of the gentleman's colleagues whom he has vilified and slandered, who voted in opposition to him on a recent measure, felt the same personal fear of violence that he has manifested, they could not claim the protection of this body? I know they would scorn to do it. Like honorable men, they will and can protect themselves. Have they not been threatened with personal violence? Did not the organ of a fanatic party in this country call on the incendiary to apply his torch to this Capitol, that its inmates might perish beneath its crumbling ruins? Did the fanatics stop there? Let me read what the gentleman's colleagues—I do not mean his colleagues upon this floor, but his colleagues in fanaticism—say on this subject. Here is what Cassius M. Clay says, speaking of gentlemen from the North who voted for the Nebraska bill:

"What, then, shall be done? 1. In the first place, punish the traitors, as an example for all future times. I honestly believe that every man of the free States who voted for the repeal of the Missouri restriction deserves death. But there is no legal way of inflicting the penalty—the halter, then, they must escape."

So thought Horace Greeley, and therefore he would have the incendiary apply the torch to the Capitol of the country, that its inmates might perish beneath its crumbling ruins. So think Cassius M. Clay, Wendell Phillips, Theodore Parker; and so think the strong-minded women of the North with whom they are associated. [Laughter.]

"The halter, then, they may escape. But one thing can be done—break them on the wheel of public opinion."

That is what my colleague undertook to do. He went to Boston to break them down on the wheel of public opinion. How did he undertake to do so? By branding them as bribed; by making charges which he knew, in giving them utterance, were false; as I said before, false in their inception, and false in their utterance. Break them on the wheel of public opinion! Yes, sir, by falsehood my colleague, and those associated with him, attempt to create public opinion, as he did against his colleagues in his Boston speech, and then break them down on its wheel! Sir, you cannot reach such men by law. They have not the courage to strike personally in the dark; but they have the courage to strike reputations in the dark. They have not the courage to apply the torch of the incendiary to the Capitol; but they have the courage to go to Boston, and there stab reputation in the dark, calling on the country to break honest men's reputations on the wheel of public opinion, and then to skulk into this House and claim that the printer of this House shall be expelled—for what? For having given utterance to the truth, so far as my colleague and those associated with him are concerned, in relation to this matter.

Mr. Speaker, I feel that I ought to ask pardon of this House and of the country for having said what I have said in relation to this matter. I feel that I have really done my colleague a service; for every attack made upon him in this House, every attack made upon him by the lovers of the Constitution, and upon the fanaticism of the party with which he operates, by either the Democratic or the Whig party, only helps to build him up, and return him constantly to occupy a seat on this floor. Talk about preserving the dignity of the House—what, after receiving a virtual expulsion, he can come back here year after year to hold a seat on this floor! Ay, and if I mistake not, he talked in Boston about attempting to kick the South into the support of right measures on this floor.

A MEMBER. Kick them into indignation.

Mr. OLDS. Well he knows how to do that. He knows, by personal experience, what it is to be kicked into indignation. [Laughter.] But, as I said before, every word uttered in relation to this matter only tends to make my colleague stronger; and perhaps that was his object in bringing the matter before the House. It is not personal violence that the member fears. His peace notions would protect him from that. He is not a war man. He never voted for a war measure; and if you had an altercation with him, it would be coffee for two instead of pistols for two. [A laugh.] Begging pardon of the House for thus noticing my colleague, I move to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I hope my colleague will withdraw that motion, so as to afford me an opportunity of replying to him.

Mr. OLDS. My colleague had better say what he has to say in Boston.

Mr. HUNT. I think the gentleman ought to be heard in reply to his colleague.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I hope my colleague will be as generous to me as I was to him, in affording me a moment's reply.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Give him fair play.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I ask for the yeas and nays on the motion of my colleague.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The resolution was again read.

Mr. WARREN. I ask for the reading of the article in the Union to which the resolution refers. Several MEMBERS objected.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I suppose that if we vote down the motion to lay the resolution upon the table, we can have the article read again.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that it would not be in order, if objection be made, both papers having been read. Does the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CAMPBELL] ask a vote of the House upon the propriety of having the article read?

Mr. CAMPBELL. I do. I move that it be read.

The question was taken upon Mr. CAMPBELL's motion; and it was agreed to.

The article was again read.

The question was then taken on Mr. OLDS's motion to lay the resolution upon the table; and there were—yeas 77, nays 29; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Aiken, James C. Allen, Willis Allen, David J. Bailey, Barksdale, Barry, Bell, Bocock, Boyce, Breckinridge, Bridges, Caruthers, Chrisman, Clark, Clingman, Cobb, Colquitt, Cox, Cullom, Curtis, Cutting, John G. Davis, Dawson, Dent, Dowdell, Dunbar, Edmundson, John M. Elliott, Faulkner, Goode, Greenwood, Hamilton, Wiley P. Harris, Hendricks, Henn, Hill, Hillyer, Houston, George W. Jones, Kidwell, Letcher, Lindley, Macdonald, McDougall, McMullin, Macy, Maxwell, John G. Miller, Smith Miller, Millson, Olds, Mordecai Oliver, John Perkins, Phelps, Powell, Preston, Riddle, Thomas Ritchey, Robbins, Ruffin, Seward, Seymour, Shannon, Shaw, Singleton, Samuel A. Smith, William R. Smith, George W. Smyth, Frederick P. Stanton, Richard H. Stanton, Hester L. Stevens, Nathaniel G. Taylor, Trout, Vail, Warren, Daniel B. Wright, and Hendrick B. Wright—77.

NAYS—Messrs. Appleton, Benton, Campbell, Cook, Corwin, Crocker, Dick, Edmunds, Everhart, Goodrich, Aaron Harlan, Haven, Howe, Hunt, Knox, Lindsey, McCulloch, Norton, Parker, Pringle, David Ritchie, Russell, Sapp, Skelton, Gerrit Smith, Upham, Walley, and Tappan Wentworth—29.

No quorum voting.

Mr. HAMILTON. I move that there be a call of the House.

The question was taken; and the motion was agreed to.

The roll was then called, and one hundred and twenty-four members answered to their names.

The following are the names of the absentees:

Messrs. Thomas H. Bayly, Banks, Bennett, Benson, Bissell, Bliss, Brooks, Buga, Carpenter, Caskey, Chamberlain, Chase, Chastain, Churchill, Craig, Cumming, Thomas Davis, Dean, De Witt, Dickinson, Disney, Drum, Dunham, Eastman, Eddy, Edgerton, Thomas B. Eliot, English, Etheridge, Farley, Fenton, Flagler, Florence, Franklin, Fuller, Gamble, Grey, Grow, Andrew H. Harlan, Sampson W. Harris, Harrison, Hastings, Hibbard, Hughes, Ingersoll, Daniel T. Jones, Roland Jones, Keitt, Kerr, Kirtledge, Kurtz, Lamb, Lane, Latham, Lilly, Lyon, McNaughton, McQueen, Mace, Matteson, Maurice, May, Meacham, Middlesworth, Morgan, Murray, Noble, Andrew Oliver, Orr, Packer, Peck, Peckham, Pennington, Phillips, Pratt, Puryear, Ready, Reese, Richardson, Rogers, Rowe, Sabin, Sage, Shower, Skelton, William Smith, Snodgrass, Solters, Alexander H. Stephens, Straub, David Stuart, John J. Taylor, John L. Taylor, Tracy, Tweed, Wade, Walbridge, Walker, Walsh, Elihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, Wells, John Wentworth, Westbrook, Wheeler, Witte, Yates, and Zolllicoffer.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. Jones, of Tennessee, in the chair.) The Doorkeeper will now close the doors.

Mr. CLINGMAN. If we have a quorum present, I hope that all further proceedings in the call will be dispensed with. I make that motion.

The question was taken on Mr. CLINGMAN's motion; and it was agreed to.

So all further proceedings under the call were dispensed with.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question now is on laying the resolution of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GIDDINGS] upon the table; upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question was then taken; and there were—yeas 79, nays 31; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abernethy, Aiken, James C. Allen, Willis Allen, Ashe, David J. Bailey, Barksdale, Barry, Belcher, Bocock, Boyce, Breckinridge, Bridges, Caruthers, Clark, Clingman, Cobb, Colquitt, Cullom, Curtis, Cutting, John G. Davis, Dawson, Dent, Dowdell, Dunbar, Edmundson, Ellison, Ewing, Faulkner, Goode, Green, Greenwood, Hamilton, Hendricks, Henn, Hill, Hillyer, Houston, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Kidwell, Letcher, Lindley, Macdonald, McDougall, McMullin, Macy, Maxwell, John G. Miller, Smith Miller, Millson, Olds, Mordecai Oliver, Bishop Perkins, John Perkins, Phelps, Powell, Preston, Riddle, Thomas Ritchey, Robbins, Ruffin, Seward, Seymour, Shannon, Shaw, Singleton, George W. Smyth, Frederick P. Stanton, Richard H. Stanton, Hester L. Stevens, Stratton, Nathaniel G. Taylor, Vail, Vansant, Warren, Daniel B. Wright, and Hendrick B. Wright—79.

NAYS—Messrs. Appleton, Benton, Campbell, Cook, Corwin, Crocker, Dick, Edmunds, Everhart, Giddings, Goodrich, Aaron Harlan, Haven, Howe, Hunt, Knox, Lindsey, Mayall, Norton, Parker, Pringle, David Ritchie, Russell, Fapp, Simmons, Skelton, Gerrit Smith, Thurston, Upham, Walley, and Tappan Wentworth—31.

No quorum voting.

Mr. BRIDGES. I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. HOUSTON. There are several members here who happened to be out when their names were called. We can get a quorum in a few minutes more.

Mr. ELLISON. I ask the yeas and nays on the motion to adjourn.

Mr. BRIDGES. I withdraw the motion to adjourn, and move that there be a call of the House.

Mr. RITCHIE, of Pennsylvania. I renew the motion to adjourn.

Mr. ELLISON. Upon that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question being taken on Mr. RITCHIE's motion, there were—yeas 32, nays 81.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. HAVEN. Is there a quorum present?

The SPEAKER. There is not.

Mr. HAVEN. I intended to make a motion, if there was a quorum, to get rid of the business before us.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question now is upon the motion made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BRIDGES,] that there be a call of the House.

The question was then taken; and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I move that the House adjourn, and I hope the motion will be agreed to, with the understanding that we adjourn till Monday next. It is very evident that you cannot keep a quorum for five minutes at a time, and it is, therefore, of no use for us to stay here, as no business can be transacted without a quorum.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Ohio make the motion that the House adjourn till Monday?

Mr. CAMPBELL. I do not. I make a motion to adjourn, with the understanding that we shall not come back here to-morrow, or the next day, without a quorum.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The motion cannot be made with any such understanding.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I am aware of that; but I hope that will be the understanding.

Mr. HILLYER. Has the House done any business since the vote was taken upon the last motion to adjourn?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. A motion has been made and agreed to that there be a call of the House.

The question was then taken upon Mr. CAMPBELL's motion; and it was agreed to.

And thereupon (at ten minutes after two o'clock, p. m.) the House adjourned till to-morrow at twelve o'clock, m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, June 9, 1854.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. WILLIAM H. MILBURN.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Superintendent of Public Printing, submitting estimates of deficiencies in the public printing; which, on motion, was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

LEGISLATIVE ACTS OF NEW MEXICO.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from William S. Messervy, Secretary of the Territory of New Mexico, transmitting, in compliance with the requirement of the fourth section of the organic law of that Territory, two copies of the laws passed by the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of New Mexico at its last session, begun on the 5th day of December, 1853, and closed on the 2d day of February, 1854.

Referred to the Committee on Territories.

DEATH OF HON. JOHN F. SNODGRASS.

Mr. FAULKNER then rose and said: Mr. Speaker, at the request of some of my colleagues, and with the concurrence of all of them, I rise to discharge the melancholy office of announcing to this House the death of Hon. JOHN FRATT SNODGRASS, late a Representative in Congress from the eleventh district of Virginia. This painful and unexpected event occurred in Parkersburg, on Monday, the 5th day of the present month; it is said, while engaged in the trial of an important cause in court. The deceased left this city on the evening of the 30th of May, to pay a brief visit to his family, and to attend some of the courts of his district. He bade us adieu on that day, to all human eyes, certainly to mine, in a better condition of bodily health, than he had at any time enjoyed since he first assumed to discharge his duties in this Hall. This was a subject of remark and congratulation both by himself and friends on that day. And yet, in the brief space of one week, we were shocked by the intelligence that he, too, had contributed another trophy to the remorseless triumphs of the grave.

This, Mr. Speaker, is the fifth occasion, since the commencement of the present session of Congress, that some surviving member of this body has been called upon to perform that duty which I have risen to discharge to my departed friend. KING, ATHERTON, CAMPBELL, MULENBERG, and SNODGRASS, have all in the brief period of a few months passed from the fretful scenes of public life, leaving nothing behind them but the memory of their virtuous deeds. The North and the South, the East and the West, have each in their turn been called upon to contribute a victim to the common destroyer of our race, and to mingle their griefs at the fall of some lofty column that graced this temple of representative freedom. Sir, we have in all this much to admonish us of the vanity and emptiness of all human honors, and of all earthly aspirations—much to bring with impressive force to our minds, "what shadows we are, and what shadows we pursue"—and to chasten our thoughts for a higher, purer, and more permanent inheritance in regions beyond the grave.

Mr. SNODGRASS was a native of the county of Berkeley, and State of Virginia, born within two miles of the place of my own birth and present residence. He was one of an extensive family residing in that portion of Virginia—a family, whose ancestors were among the early settlers of that picturesque and productive valley, and some of whose descendants still occupy their ancestral homes, engaged in the quiet and ennobling pursuits of agricultural life. He was born on the 2d day of March, 1804, and was thus in the fifty-first year of his age at the period of his death.

My acquaintance with the deceased commenced at an early period of my life—immediately after my return from college. He had then finished his course of preparatory study, under the guidance and instruction of General Boyd, an eminently successful member of the Virginia bar; and he had commenced the practice of his profession as a lawyer. The cheerfulness and vivacity of his temper at that period of his life, before disease had prematurely furrowed his cheek, and saddened the expression of his face, made him a general favorite with all classes of persons; whilst the ardor and enthusiasm with which he dedicated himself to the labors of his profession, aided by an anxious circle of influential friends, soon gave him a commanding position in the practice of the courts. He pursued his profession in his native county some five or six years, when, contrary to the advice and wishes of his friends, he removed to Parkersburg, a prosperous town in Western Virginia, situated on the Ohio river, where he continued to reside to the period of his death.

In his new location in Western Virginia he rapidly achieved for himself an honorable professional fame. In those days, and I presume it is to a great extent so now, the life of a circuit court practitioner in that portion of Virginia, when in full business, was one of great endurance and toil. His theater of practice was necessarily large, few facilities for rapid and comfortable travel existed, and a large proportion of the most important causes involved the complex and recondite refinements of the law of real estate, rendered doubly and trebly obscure by the fluctuating and inconsistent statutory enactments of our State for the last seventy years. This field of practice reared a body of acute and subtle practitioners in the law of real actions, that might have done credit to the Court of Common Pleas in England, during the palmiest days of Hargrove or Fearn. Against this formidable array of intellect and skill, Mr. SNODGRASS determined to enter the contest for professional eminence and emolument.

And it is no mean praise to say that he maintained a high and elevated position amongst his rivals at the bar—rising daily in the confidence and esteem of his fellow-men, and realizing, by his arduous and unwearied labors, a fortune sufficient to relieve his widow and infant children from all dependence upon the cold and unfeeling charities of this world.

Mr. SNODGRASS had no fondness for the noisy and exciting scenes of political life. His nature instinctively recoiled from its bitter and senseless animosities, and he looked with horror upon its treacherous and deceptive quicksands. Eminently domestic in all his tastes, he found his greatest solace in the society of his own family circle, and in those holy cares of home education and instruction by which a parent best fulfills the obligations imposed by nature and by God. The law was his favorite field of usefulness and employment. With all its numerous and refined distinctions he had become familiar. In its unimpassioned contests it was his delight to mingle. To excellence in that department he had disciplined all his faculties; had fashioned all his habits of thought, and concentrated all the energies of his mind. There he felt himself at home, and there he found a premature grave. And yet, sir, notwithstanding his strong aversion to public life, occasions did occur, in which, from the confidence reposed in the soundness of his judgment and in the inflexibility of his principles, and in consequence of the strong appeals addressed to his sense of duty as a citizen, he was constrained to abandon, for a time, his favorite pursuit, and accept of service upon a higher theater of action.

The first of these occasions to which I allude, was the convention which assembled in Richmond in the fall of 1850, to frame a new constitution of government for the people of Virginia. The public mind of that State had long brooded in sullen discontent over the evils incident to the then existing government, and nothing short of a radical and fundamental change in its whole structure, could satisfy the progressive aspirations of a people who felt that their energies were held in subjection by artificial restraints, inconsistent with the true principles of republican freedom and equality. It was well known that great questions—embracing all the organic principles of popular government, with all the necessary safeguards for the protection of property—involving a sectional transfer of political power from the east to the west—would engage the deliberations of that body, and find a solution in its action. Mr. SNODGRASS was a member of that convention. I also had the honor of a seat in that body, and I will not revive by any review of its proceedings, those exciting and absorbing topics, which at that time so fearfully agitated the popular heart of that Commonwealth. Its result was one of the proudest triumphs of the principles of popular government which the records of history can attest. A revolution, as decided in its results as any of those which for the last century have deluged the monarchies of Europe with blood, passed off under the influence of the acknowledged principles of popular supremacy as quietly and tranquilly as the most ordinary county election. Mr. SNODGRASS was not distinguished as a speaker in that convention. I have no recollection of his appearance upon the floor, except upon one occasion, and then he was drawn from his habitual silence by some local distribution of representative power which he believed did injustice to his district. I well remember his effort on that occasion. It was earnest, emphatic, and forcible, and was followed at the time by the overwhelming triumph of his views. But, although not distinguished as a speaker, the soundness of his judgment and the unshaken fidelity of his course to those cherished principles of representative government in which his section of the State took so deep an interest, gave value to his counsels, and caused them to be eagerly sought after by those associated with him in action; and his friends may proudly point to the record of his votes in that body as evidence of the just discrimination, the clear-sighted sagacity, and of the inflexible adherence to principle which marked his opinions and conduct during all the trying scenes of that protracted and exciting struggle.

In May, 1853, Mr. SNODGRASS was elected a Representative in Congress from the eleventh district of Virginia. He reached this city at the opening of Congress in feeble health, which caused him to be much absent from our deliberations; and it was only a few days ago, before he left this city for Virginia, that he seemed to realize the prospect of a speedy restoration to his usual state of health.

As a member of this body, his course is familiar to all who hear me. No one could fail to have been favorably impressed by his modest and unobtrusive deportment, by his courteous and gentlemanly bearing, and by the uniform kindness of his manner. If he has added nothing to the fame of Virginia by intellectual exhibitions upon this floor, he has detracted nothing from her pure and lofty escutcheon by his conduct in this Hall, or elsewhere. If not a conspicuous, he has, so far as his health permitted, been a useful and attentive member; and if Virginia holds within her limits, sons of higher eloquence and genius, she can point to none more true and loyal to all of her cherished principles than him whose loss from her public service we this day deplore.

Mr. SNODGRASS was not a brilliant man. His friends would scorn to dishonor the memory of one so distinguished for truth, by undeserved praise after his death, such as would not have been held to have been just, if pronounced while alive. But although not a brilliant man, he was eminently a good man; he was an honest man, scrupulous in the discharge of all of his public and private obligations, charitable and benevolent in his feeling, firm in his friendships, and faithful to all his associations. And, sir, when the places which know each and all of us now, shall know us no more, forever, on this earth, it will be a source of proud consolation to our children and friends, if we shall leave a record as free from blemish and reproach, as that which will universally be accorded to the late Representative of the eleventh district of Virginia.

Mr. Speaker, I offer the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the House has heard with deep regret the announcement of the death of the Hon. JOHN FRYATT SNODGRASS, late a member of the present Congress, and from a sincere desire of showing every mark of respect due to his memory, will wear crape on the left arm for thirty days.

Resolved, That the Clerk of this House be directed to communicate a copy of these proceedings to the family of the deceased; and that as a further mark of respect this House do now adjourn.

Mr. LETCHER said: The cordial intimacy and sincere friendship and confidence which has existed between my lamented colleague and myself, will prove a sufficient excuse, if indeed any be necessary, for adding a few remarks to the eloquent, appropriate, and deserved tribute which has just been paid to his character and his virtues.

Our acquaintance commenced in the year 1850, when we met in Richmond to enter upon the discharge of the important public duties which had been assigned to us, as members of the Virginia Reform Convention. In that body as in this we sat side by side; there as here we formed part of the same mess, and the acquaintance then formed soon ripened into an intimacy and cordial friendship that has strengthened with each successive year.

The sad news of the death of our colleague came upon us all most unexpectedly. Though he had been in ill-health for some time past, yet he had recently improved so rapidly that we cherished the agreeable hope that he would soon be restored, and that his friends, and family, and country, would enjoy the benefit of his sound judgment and practical wisdom for years to come. When he left this city, on the 30th of May, I know he fondly anticipated a speedy restoration to health, and an early return to his public duties with renewed vigor. When we parted, it occurred to neither of us that it was a final separation in this world. There was a buoyancy of spirits, and a gaiety and sprightliness in his manner and conversation, that I had rarely seen him exhibit before in our intercourse. Little did I then think that these indications were the bright flashes of a light so soon to be extinguished in death. But alas! such they were!

He was a man of great purity of character and singleness of purpose. There was nothing of that selfishness and cold calculation about him which is often, too often, visible in the conduct of the public men of our day and generation. Principle was the chart which regulated and governed his conduct and controlled his action. No man, either in his public or private action, was less influenced by what the cold, selfish, and calculating world has been pleased to designate as expediency or policy.

Among all my friends there was not one who possessed nobler traits of character. He was a man of generous and manly impulses—the sternest integrity, personal, professional, and political. In his friendships he was ardent, faithful, and sincere. In all the relations of life, as citizen, husband, parent, he was a true man, scrupulously exact in the discharge of the obligations due to his country, and the duties due to family, friends, and neighbors. He enjoyed in a most remarkable degree, the confidence, respect, and esteem of all who knew him, and particularly of that community in which he lived; as is strikingly illustrated in his professional and political success. He has never, I believe, been a candidate for office without being successful.

I feel that I have lost a devoted friend, whose confidence I enjoyed, and whose sound judgment and practical advice has often been of the greatest service to me in times of trial and embarrassment. No one can regret his death more sincerely than I do, and no one outside of his immediate family circle will feel his loss more sensibly. But he is gone, and we must bow in humble submission to that Providence which disposes all things wisely and well.

This sudden and unexpected death of one so universally esteemed, should admonish us of the uncertainty of life, and should lead our minds to solemn reflections.

"Passing away," is written in strong and legible characters upon the world, and all the world contains. Look around you, and wheresoever the eye rests, those startling words attract the vision, and admonish man that his days are few. We see generation follow generation in the sad and solemn march to the tomb. How quickly, how unexpectedly, the spell is dissolved, that binds us to those we love, respect, and admire for their virtues, their intelligence, their patriotism. The beauties of the year fade, and its bounties perish. The loveliest scenes of nature lose their power to charm and to delight. The religions of one age pass away, and are succeeded by others entirely different in character, in form, and in belief. The human governments of one day are exploded by others in rapid succession:

"Like bubbles on the sea of matter borne,
They rise, they break, and to that sea return."

We feel, therefore, that those solemn words, "passing away," are stamped with fearful distinctness upon everything around us, and upon all of us. Each day impresses upon our minds the stern reality, that there is but a step between us and the grave, yet we live, we move, we act as if the services in which we are now so busily engaged were never to have an end. We stand upon the grave of our fellow, and yet we seem not to realize the great truth, that we too must, in a brief space, slumber beneath the same sod!

Let us then strive to profit by the lesson which the sad, sudden, and solemn death of our colleague teaches. Let it admonish us,

"That man's uncertain life
Is like the rain drop, hanging on the bough
Amongst ten thousand of his sparkling kindred,
The remnant of some passing thunder shower,
That have their moments one by one to fall;
And which shall soonest lose its perilous hold,
We cannot guess."

The question was then taken; and the resolutions were unanimously agreed to.

And thereupon (at half past twelve o'clock) the House adjourned until to-morrow at twelve o'clock, m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, June 10, 1854.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was here received from the Senate, at the hands of ASBURY DICKINS, Esq., their Secretary, informing the House that the Senate had passed a bill of the House for the relief of Thomas Frazer.

Mr. MILLSON. As there is probably not a quorum present, and as a vote on laying on the table the resolution of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GIDDINGS] might disclose that fact, and compel a precipitate adjournment, with a view to save a day for the public business, now pressing, I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

The rules were accordingly suspended, and the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. BOCCOCK in the chair.)

The CHAIRMAN. When the committee last rose they had under consideration the Pacific railroad bill, upon which the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SINGLETON] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. SINGLETON. I did not expect to address the committee to-day, and if there is any other gentleman who would like to do so, I will yield the floor with the understanding that I shall occupy it on Monday next.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Mississippi abandon the right to the floor?

Mr. CHASTAIN. With the consent of the gentleman from Mississippi, I would like to occupy a few minutes of the time of the committee.

Mr. SINGLETON. I have not troubled the House at all during this session, and I would be very much gratified if the committee would allow me to speak on Monday next.

The CHAIRMAN. It is not in the power of the Chair to say that, under any circumstances, the gentleman from Mississippi shall be entitled to the floor on Monday, for some other gentleman may occupy the chair. The gentleman from Mississippi, if he yields the floor, must take his chance with other gentlemen.

Mr. SINGLETON. I yield the floor, then, to the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. CHASTAIN.]

Mr. CHASTAIN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to make a few remarks on a subject which, in my opinion, is second, in political and commercial importance, to none before the country. The recent seizure of the Black Warrior by the Spanish authorities at Havana, the many insults and wrongs imposed upon our merchants and shipping at that port for a series of years, together with the disposition manifested by certain foreign Powers to interfere in all that concerns our intercourse with, or policy in regard to Cuba, combine to make it essentially necessary that prompt and determined action should mark our diplomacy with Spain, in relation to the future possession of that island; in other words, and in plainer language, Mr. Chairman, whether Cuba is to remain the property of Spain, or whether, by fair and honorable means, it shall be transferred to the United States! If to remain the property of Spain, the time has arrived, sir, when our intercourse with that island should be regulated by treaty, guaranteeing to this Government privileges, in a commercial sense, the most liberal conceded by one Government to another; a protection of the rights of slaveholders there, (such as Spain, I fear, will never grant;) and providing for prompt indemnity, without a resort to the Spanish Court, whenever undue exactions, or wrongs, are inflicted upon either our shipping or our citizens. And if, sir, the contrary is to be the policy of our diplomacy in relation to Cuba—that is, if the "stars and stripes" are to wave where now the Spanish flag indicates whose property it is—then let it be upon a scale marked, not only by strict regard for national and personal rights, but let it be characterized by a liberality which shall show to the world, that while commercial and political necessity forces upon our Government the possession of another's property, the necessities or weakness of that other shall prove her protection against injustice.

Of the two policies thus indicated, sir, I am decidedly for the latter. The time has arrived, Mr. Chairman, when the great interests of the country demand that Cuba shall change hands. This is demanded as well by social as by commercial, agricultural, and political interests. Notwithstanding these, sir, I am aware that the proposition will be dissented from and opposed in certain quarters, with a zeal and spirit displayed often upon this floor in days long past, as well as on a more recent occasion. But what of this, sir? Opposition was made to the acquisition of Louisiana; opposition was made to the acquisition of Florida; opposition was made to the annexation of Texas; to the war with Mexico, the indirect or direct consequence thereof; and to the acquirement of California and New Mexico.

Let us look to the results of all this. Mr. Chairman, all who supported those measures look with pride to the fortunate and glorious results attending them, while those who so vainly opposed wonder at the progress which the country has made—at the prosperity resulting from each of those measures, the wisdom and importance of which are so clearly discerned and so universally acknowledged. Doubtless the United States would be a flourishing Republic, her limits still bound by the French and Spanish possessions on the Mississippi and the Gulf of Mexico; doubtless our Government would indicate an enviable prosperity without Oregon, California, Texas, or New Mexico. But, while admitting this, what aspect does she present to the world with her present limits? Look to the cane and cotton lands of what were once the French and Spanish possessions! Look to the soil of Texas, and the gold, silver, and other minerals and agricultural products of California and New Mexico! Look to Oregon, and then compare the original "Thirteen" and their possessions with the United States now and her possessions! Who so weak, Mr. Chairman, as not to perceive and acknowledge that the policy which brought about this change was that of wisdom? Who so skeptical as to doubt that it was what some term destiny, but which, in my humble judgment—and I say it with due reverence—was the work of an overruling Providence?

Sir, two hundred years ago, oppression drove to the American continent a people, whom force could not utterly subdue, but who sought in a land far from that of the oppressor, a home where peace should supplant strife, and liberty despotism. And is it not so even now? The oppressor's scourge is still driving from the Old to the New World a people who regard our political liberties as inestimable privileges, and Republican institutions with enthusiasm and reverence. Go to the wharves, sir, of our great commercial marts, and not, as in old times, by tens and by hundreds do they reach our shores, but by thousands and tens of thousands. From our already overgrown cities these people, Mr. Chairman, seek the far West, and not even the most distant Territory but evidences that the tide of emigration will soon make "the wilderness blossom as the rose." Cut off from resources such as the policy of territorial acquisition has provided, and what would now be the condition of things? On all sides of us, sir, save where the waves of the Atlantic roll, there would now be a population, and a growing one, recognizing crowned heads as their rulers, or a people contending with monarchs, for liberty of conscience, speech, and the press—at the best, a people, who, having thrown off the yoke of foreign oppression, have established Republics for themselves, thus dividing a power and prosperity now all our own. It might be, sir—and I call the attention of gentlemen who have been opposed to our acquisitions of territory to this particular remark—it might be, sir, that we should see a Confederacy of States organized with an eye to the protection of their peculiar agricultural interests and domestic institutions, having exclusive privileges of trade with foreign Governments, by which the great mechanical and manufacturing interests of the North would be greatly depressed. Mr. Chairman, in making these remarks, I wish to be distinctly understood as not desiring to witness such a state of things. I am, and have always been, a Union Democrat. As long as we of the South, and they of the North, can hold together upon rights guaranteed to each by the Constitution, I am here, there, and everywhere, ready to "pledge life, fortune, and sacred honor," in the maintenance of this Confederacy. But it is a great misfortune for gentlemen who have any regard for the existence of this Union, to suppose that such a feeling is to be used for the base purposes of the designing, or to countenance fanaticism. It can only be used, sir, to maintain our charter of rights—the Constitution of the United States—and when it ceases to do this, I am for such government as will most likely secure the prosperity and happiness of the people whom I and my colleagues of the South represent.

Well, sir, having, at greater length than I intended, referred to the policy of our acquisition of territory, and the glorious results therefrom, discernible to every eye, I come now to the consideration of some of the reasons which induce me to urge upon this committee the acquisition of Cuba from Spain, by negotiation with her Spanish Majesty, at the earliest practicable period.

The Africanization of Cuba, Mr. Chairman, whatever may be said to the contrary, is contemplated. Yes, sir, here in the United States it is advocated; and it is doubtless designed by France and England. There is no time, on this subject, to dally or delay. Far be it from me, sir, to trifle on this matter, or to apply what may be conceived improper epithets, to Powers not represented on this floor. But, sir, this is the time to seize the "Bull" by the horns, and to show to the "tricolor" that the "stars and stripes" are destined to wave where either Spanish, British, or French influence dares to interfere with the principles and settled policy of our Government. Fanaticism may set its hand to stay this work—for what may it not do? But with regard to Cuba, ere the contemplated outrage shall be perpetrated, the blood of thousands upon thousands shall deluge that beautiful island, and the sons, and even sires of those who at Buena Vista, Vera Cruz, Chepultapac, and Cherubusco, achieved immortal renown, shall whiten the sands of her plains. Such an assault upon the social relations and domestic institutions of the South, as the Africanizing Cuba, even deliberation upon it by foreign Powers, should not be tolerated for a moment, North nor South. That it is contemplated, testimony is abundant; and such being the fact, it is time for those in this House, and elsewhere, who are devoted to the maintenance of this Confederacy upon just principles, to express their abhorrence and disgust of so obscene a violation of social life and domestic decency, and to act accordingly.

Mr. Chairman, the time for action is propitious. Look to the condition of affairs in Europe. France, England, and Turkey are at war with Russia. Harsh things have been said, sir, of this last named Power; but, in my humble opinion, it is more sinned against than sinning. At the outset I confess that my sympathies were with Turkey; but my judgment, the result of calm reflection, tells me to side with Russia. Our people, Mr. Chairman, have never suffered oppression at her hands. Our domestic institutions have never been assailed by her. Our diplomatic relations have ever been friendly, and marked by a due regard for the rights of each. Our commerce with that nation is at once extensive and profitable. From Turkey we have nothing to expect, and nothing to exact. Her firs we are willing to transfer to England, and her dates to France. Her rights as a nation we shall not infringe upon, nor to protect them would I consent that this Government should form any entangling alliance. In my mind, sir, the interference of France and England, to the extent which it has gone, between Russia and Turkey, requires justification. At any rate, it is my opinion that the cause of Russia should, by this Government, and by our people, be respected, if not supported. Show me the instance where Russian aggression upon our commerce has not been promptly atoned for. Show me the instance where complaint has not received respectful attention, and a just response. It is true, sir, that Russia is a despotism; but what better friends to American liberty are France, England, or Turkey, than is Russia? Whose population crowd our shores more than that of Great Britain, seeking shelter from oppression? Whose hard-earned dollars, by every steamer that leaves our shores are mailed, with religious punctuality, to relieve an oppressed people, but those of the Irish immigrant, who never forget father, mother, nor country? No, sir, our relations with Russia should be most friendly. It may be possible that ere long her enemies will be our open and declared foes. The continued agitation of the slavery question, in Great Britain, particularly, and the interference of that Power and France, with our relations with Spain, in all that concerns Cuba, admonish us to respect and maintain friendly relations with friends, and to guard against foes. And if, in our efforts to procure the cession of that island, we are to come into collision with either England, or France, or both, let the strife come, and the sooner the better. While the armies of the Czar are entertaining the French and English in the eastern, the United States will be prepared to tender them a banquet fit for heroes, in this western hemisphere. And I have no doubt, sir, that when it is all over, the mind-your-own-business policy will be admitted, by all parties, to be the best for Governments, as it is for individuals.

Mr. Chairman, before I leave this subject, I desire to say a few words more in relation to the relative position which England and France bear to Russia in the war now progressing. It is charged, sir, that it is aggressive on the part of the latter. Whatever of truth there may be in this charge, it must be admitted that it is a policy equally aggressive that involves in it England and France. The true secret of their interference is commercial supremacy. These Powers, sir, are for supremacy on the land and supremacy on the seas. They can brook no rivalry, and having, as they anticipate doing, subdued Nicholas, they will undertake to cripple our commerce, and take Cuba into their own keeping. Shall we then suffer their one-sided statements of Russian aggression to prejudice the minds of our people, and the disclaimers of intended interference with Cuba, put forth by irresponsible sources, to blind us for a season, and until they have done with Russia? I hope not, sir. The public mind has already been led astray by the artifices of these two Governments. The war in which they are engaged is essentially one for their own aggrandizement. Sympathy for the Turks is of trifling import with them. Nor should sympathy, sir, blind us to the fact that Russia is now engaged fighting an enemy whose diplomacy is now, and has been for some time past, directed to the destruction of the domestic institutions of the South—the Africanization and ultimate possession of Cuba. It is time, then, sir, for our Government to be up and doing. It is time to banish all sickly sympathy, to extend the right hand of fellowship to friends, and to unsheath the sword for foes; to wish Nicholas success, and to France and England defeat!

I deem it, Mr. Chairman, unnecessary to present in detail the proofs which, for days past, have been multiplying relative to the diabolical scheme of Africanizing Cuba, entertained by Spain, France, and England. As far as circumstantial evidence can be received, even by the most incredulous, it has already been presented to the Senate; and is of itself sufficient to induce this Government to demand the cession of that island to the United States.

But our commercial interests demand this cession also. The Black Warrior case, Mr. Chairman, is but one among the many outrages perpetrated upon our citizens, and our commerce, by the authorities of Spain at Havana. The number and history of these would make a volume. In Executive Document, of the present session, No. 86, a volume of three hundred and seventy-eight pages, the Secretary of State, in communicating to the President sixteen cases of outrage upon our commerce and citizens at Havana, commencing with that of the Crescent City, says, that "Papers in reference to other cases are in the course of preparation, and will be laid before the President as soon as they are completed." Now, sir, is it not outrageous, in an age enlightened like this, that the peaceful pursuits of commerce are to be embarrassed, within a few miles of our own shores, by a Government like Spain? That citizens of this Republic are to be immured in cells, upon suspicion of wrong, by the most jealous nation under the sun? Think you, Mr. Chairman, that Spain would dare to act in this wise, did she not feel encouraged by a guarantee of some sort on the part of other Powers?—Powers, sir, envious of our prosperity, and who only bide their time to strike a blow for the possession of that same island! And are we tamely to submit to all this? For one, sir, I say, no! Better that it should be sunk in "the deep bosom of the ocean," than that it shall remain a barrier to our commerce, a place of refuge for our enemies within a few hours' sail of our own shores! Our policy, and our commercial enterprise, acknowledged to be beneficial to the whole human family, must not be restrained by crowned heads. We shall maintain this position, Mr. Chairman, or we shall neglect our own interests. We shall maintain this position, or we shall fail in the performance of a duty we owe to commerce and to ourselves.

Sir, the great interests of agriculture are also involved in this matter. The Africanization of Cuba will materially interfere with the domestic institutions of the South, and the culture of her great staples, cotton and rice. This, sir, would affect the West, upon which we depend, in the main, for wheat, corn, and stock. All these interests would be affected by such a calamity; and years and years would pass ere the country, if it ever did, would recover from the shock such an outrage would produce.

Political considerations, Mr. Chairman, also demand prompt action on the part of our Government to secure the possession of Cuba. It is idle, sir, to waste words in connection with this branch of the subject. American policy must prevail on this side of the Atlantic. Spain must yield Cuba to the United States, and England and France must acquiesce. Such concession cannot but be for the benefit of the commerce of the world; and who will reap, of all Europe, greater advantages from it than these two Powers? If cupidity tempt them, however, to induce Spain to barter her rights to them, let them take the consequences! And should Spain be weak enough to refuse liberal compensation for Cuba, she also must take the consequences! It is necessity that demands the sacrifice on her part, and that sacrifice will redound to the benefit of the whole human family.

With these views, Mr. Chairman, I ardently hope that those to whom are intrusted our diplomacy with Spain, will direct their attention at once, and without delay, to the acquisition of Cuba. That there shall be no dallying, but a frank and open diplomacy; calling upon Spain to name her terms, and if within the bounds of anything like reason, to accept them. If not, to make her the most liberal proposition; and if that be refused, and nothing else will do, as a matter of self-preservation, I go for an undisguised, open war, for taking Cuba by force of arms!

Mr. WALBRIDGE. I do not desire to address the House to-day, and I therefore move that the committee rise.

The question was taken; and the motion was disagreed to.

Mr. WALBRIDGE. Then am I forced to go on?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman cannot be forced to speak unless he chooses to speak. It is not in the power of the House to force him to speak. [Laughter.]

Mr. WALBRIDGE. I did not expect to be called upon to speak to-day, and as I intend to speak from notes, I shall be under the necessity of relinquishing the floor. I ask the privilege of doing that, if it is according to custom.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has certainly a right to relinquish the floor, but he will resume his position on the floor with other members, and must take his chance with others to get the floor again.

Mr. WALBRIDGE. Well, I should like very much to speak on this question early next week.

The CHAIRMAN. Unless some gentleman desires to address the committee, the Clerk will proceed to read the bill by sections.

Mr. LETCHER. To save time, I move to strike out the enacting clause of the bill.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. It is very evident that if this motion is pressed to a vote, it will break up the committee. As soon as there is a division the fact will be ascertained that there is no quorum present; and it will be necessary that we adjourn or proceed only with our business by unanimous consent.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee move that the committee rise?

Mr. STANTON. I make that motion.

Mr. CARUTHERS. I hope the gentleman from Tennessee will withdraw that motion for a moment.

Mr. STANTON. I withdraw the motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs upon the motion made by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. LETCHER,] to strike out the enacting clause of the bill.

The question was then taken; and the motion was disagreed to.

Mr. CARUTHERS. I have no desire to detain the committee at this time by making any extended remarks. I had desired upon some fit occasion to address the House upon the subject of donating public lands for the construction of railroads, and more particularly to the subject of a donation of public lands to the Iron Mountain Railroad Company, in which I feel a particular interest. I shall not detain the committee now by discussing those questions. I would, if the committee had been in a proper humor, have endeavored to show that these grants of land are proper in themselves, and that it is peculiarly proper to make a grant of land to the Iron Mountain railroad, which runs through my district. I should have addressed the committee upon the subject of public lands generally, and endeavored to convince them that the public lands should be ceded to the States in which they lie, but I prefer writing out the remarks which I would have made upon that subject, and now ask the consent of the committee to do so.

The CHAIRMAN. There being no objection, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CARUTHERS] has the assent of the committee to publish his remarks. The question now recurs upon the motion made by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. YATES,] to strike out the word "fifteen" in the first section of the bill, and insert the word "sixteen."

Mr. LATHAM. I believe the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. STANTON] made a motion that the committee rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. STANTON] made that motion, but he subsequently withdrew it.

Mr. WALBRIDGE. I move that the committee rise.

The question was taken; and a division being had, there were—ayes 61; noes not counted.

So the motion was agreed to.

The committee then rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the Chairman reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the Union generally, and particularly House bill No. 295, being a bill to authorize the construction of the Pacific railroad, but had come to no conclusion thereon.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. GREENWOOD. I ask the permission of the House to enable me to present a report or two from the Committee on Indian Affairs, with a view that they may be appropriately referred.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the reports will be received.

Mr. COBB. I have had considerable complaint urged against me for the course I pursued the other day in objecting to reports being received from the various committees, with a view to their appropriate reference. I desire to ask pardon of the House for making an objection then; and I now make the motion that the House to-day consume an hour or two in receiving reports from committees, and giving them their appropriate direction. I propose that the committees shall be called on now for reports, and that such bills as do not give rise to debate shall be read a first and second time and referred.

Mr. HAMILTON. As the committee of which I am chairman—the Committee for the District of Columbia—is one of the first to be called, and as I have several bills to report which I propose to have put upon their passage, I must object.

Mr. COBB. Oh, withdraw your objection, and let us go on with business.

Mr. HAMILTON. Well, I desire to know whether, if the committees be called to-day so far as we go, we will, when we resume the calling of the committees on Monday, commence where we commenced to-day?

Mr. COBB. No, unless by unanimous consent.

Mr. HAMILTON. I do not speak of unanimous consent. If the course I suggest be not followed, I must object to calling the committees to-day, for I have some bills from my committee which I desire to have read and put upon their passage.

The SPEAKER. Is it the unanimous consent of the House, that in addition to the proposition made by the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. COBB,] the Speaker will, on resuming the call of committees, commence where we now do.

Mr. COBB. There can be no objection to that. No objection was made.

The SPEAKER. Then reports are in order from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. UPHAM. I am instructed by the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads to present to the House a joint resolution for the relief of John B. Colmoniel, for compensation for carrying the United States mail from New Orleans to Louisville, in 1833. The committee have reported a joint resolution for his relief, which, together with the report accompanying it, I move may be laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

The joint resolution was read a first and second time by its title, as follows:

Joint resolution for the adjustment of the accounts of John B. Colmoniel.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. UPHAM] desire that the resolution be laid on the table, or that it be referred?

Mr. UPHAM. My desire was, that the report from the committee, together with the joint resolution, should be printed and brought to the knowledge of the House, and that, with the consent of the House, it might be put upon its passage, as it is a joint resolution for the adjustment of accounts by the proper officer. I will, however, adopt the course which may be considered most proper and suitable. I therefore move that the joint resolution and report be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. OLDS. I am very anxious to report back from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads a bill which passed this House, and which has been returned from the Senate with an amendment. I presume there will be no objection to it; and if the House will listen, they will probably concur in the amendment of the Senate. If there be any objection made, however, I will not attempt to report it now.

Mr. ORR. I think it better not to have it reported now. I object.

Objection being made, the bill was not reported.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, made an adverse report upon the memorial of Professor J. C. F. Salmon, asking a charter for a company to supply the citizens of Washington and Georgetown with a supply of pure and wholesome water; which was laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. DAVIS also, from the same committee, reported the following bill; which was read a first and second time by its title, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed:

A bill to amend an act entitled "An act to establish an auxiliary watch for the protection of public and private property in the city of Washington," approved August 23, 1842.

Mr. HAMILTON, from the same committee, reported the following bills; which were read a first and second time by their respective titles, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and ordered to be printed:

A bill granting certain additional powers to the corporation of Washington; and

A bill for the relief of William G. Howison.

Mr. HAMILTON also, from the same committee, made an adverse report upon the petition of one hundred and sixty-nine citizens of Niagara county, New York, for an act to remunerate Solomon Northrup for his services as a slave, and to punish kidnapping; also, to allow all persons, irrespective of race or color, to testify as witnesses in the courts of the United States; which was laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana, from the same committee, reported the following bill; which was read a first and second time by its title, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed:

A bill authorizing the Washington Gaslight Company to increase the capital stock of said company.

Mr. SEYMOUR. I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary to report a bill more effectually to provide for the punishment of crimes against the United States.

The attention of the House was called to this subject by the message of the President of the United States at the commencement of this session, and, more recently, by a special communication from the same source. The bill relates to crimes against the Government, and, more especially, to frauds against the Pension Office. My object, at this time, is to report the bill, in order that it may be printed, and recommitment to the committee. I do not know whether such a proposition comes within the purport of the arrangement which has been made in reference to making reports.

No objection being made, the bill was read a first and second time by its title, as follows:

An act more effectually to provide for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States.

It was then ordered to be printed, and recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back Senate bill (No. 147) "for the relief of the legal representatives of the late Thomas Chapman, formerly collector of the port of Georgetown, South Carolina," with a recommendation that it do pass. The bill was referred to a Committee of the Whole House.

Mr. PARKER, from the same committee, made an adverse report upon the petition of Joshua Shaw and others, citizens of the State of Ohio, praying for a change in the present system of surveying the public lands; which was laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CUTTING, from the same committee, reported back sundry petitions from various parts of the Union, praying for a law more perfectly to prohibit the slave trade in the District of Columbia; also, sundry petitions from various parts of the Union for the repeal of the fugitive slave law; which were laid upon the table, and the committee discharged from the further consideration thereof.

Mr. CUTTING. Do I understand the order of the House under which we are acting to extend only to the reporting of those bills which are to be referred without explanation?

The SPEAKER. That is the order of the House.

Mr. CUTTING. I have a report upon a very important subject, which I would like to bring before the House. A Senate bill, authorizing the temporary lease of a building for a court-house in Boston, was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. That committee have instructed me to report the bill back, with an amendment in the nature of a substitute, authorizing the President of the United States to purchase permanent sites in the cities of Boston, New York, and Philadelphia, and to erect buildings thereon for court-houses and post offices. It is an important subject, and I am anxious to bring it before the House at the earliest moment.

Mr. HAMILTON. That will involve discussion. I think it had better be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. CUTTING. It is a bill which ought not to be referred. If its consideration be objected to, I think it had better be laid upon the table, where it may be called up at any time.

Mr. HAMILTON. I object to that.

Mr. CUTTING. Then I will withdraw the report.

Mr. ORR. I would suggest to the gentleman from New York, that he had perhaps better take the same course adopted a moment ago by the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. SEYMOUR,] and have his bill printed and recommitted to his committee.

Mr. CUTTING. I will take that course. I move that the Senate bill, as amended by the Committee on the Judiciary, be printed, and that the bill and amendment be recommitted to that committee.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Pennsylvania, from the same committee, reported back sundry petitions of citizens of western Pennsylvania, praying for the establishment of a United States district court at Erie, in the State of Pennsylvania; which were ordered to lie upon the table, and the committee discharged from the further consideration thereof.

Mr. DRUM, from the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, reported a bill for the relief of Captain Nehemiah Stokely, for commutation pay; which was read a first and second time by its title, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, made the order of the day for to-morrow, and ordered to be printed.

Also, a bill for the relief of the heirs of Captain Matthew Jack, deceased; and

A bill for the relief of the widow and children of Ezra Chapman; which received the same direction.

Mr. D. also, from the same committee, reported a bill; which was read a first and second time by its title, as follows, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, made the order of the day for to-morrow, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed:

A bill for the relief of the heirs and legal representatives of Joseph Savage, deceased.

Mr. D. also, from the same committee, reported adversely on the petition and papers of Captain Tarpley White, and the petition and papers of William V. Heard; which were laid upon the table, and, with the reports, ordered to be printed.

Mr. MILLSON. I presume it is the general understanding that in all these cases where bills are reported and referred to the Committee of the Whole, there are to be no motions to reconsider the reference on Monday next.

Mr. COBB. That was the understanding.

Mr. HAMILTON. There are to be no motions to reconsider, of course.

The SPEAKER. Such a provision, to be sure, is not in the order; but, so far as the Chair knew, that was the understanding.

Mr. MILLSON. If a motion to reconsider be made on Monday, as it is a privileged motion, it may seriously obstruct and embarrass the public business. If it be denied that the understanding was as indicated, I shall submit motions now to reconsider the votes on references and lay upon the table.

Mr. COBB. My understanding in making the motion which I did was, that on Monday next there were to be no motions to reconsider references.

Mr. MILLSON. Very well.

Mr. CORWIN, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, reported two bills; which were read a first and second time by their title, as follows, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, made the order of the day for to-morrow, and, with the accompanying reports, ordered to be printed:

A bill for the relief of the heirs of Thomas Park, deceased; and

A bill for the relief of William A. Duer, John Duer, and Beverly Robinson, trustees of the estate of Sarah Alexander, widow of Major General William Alexander, commonly known as Lord Stirling.

Mr. CROCKER, from the same committee, reported bills; which were read a first and second time by their titles, as follows, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, made the order of the day for to-morrow, and, with the accompanying reports, ordered to be printed:

A bill for the relief of the heirs of Gott Hall, deceased; and

A bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Henry Hoffman, deceased.

Mr. HILLYER, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported the following bill; which was read a first and second time by its title, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and ordered to be printed:

A bill for the relief of the heirs of John Rice Jones, deceased.

Mr. SMITH, of Tennessee, from the same committee, reported back Senate bills of the following titles, with a recommendation that they do pass:

No. 199. An act authorizing a patent to be issued to Peter Poncin, for certain lands therein described;

No. 234. An act for the relief of Conrad Wheat, junior, or his legal representatives; and

No. 154. An act for the relief of Richard King. The bills were severally referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and ordered to be printed.

On motion by Mr. SMITH, of Tennessee, the Committee on Private Land Claims was discharged from the further consideration of the petition of James W. Marshall of California, praying Congress for a grant of land, in consideration of his being the first discoverer of gold in that State; and said petition was referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. WESTBROOK, from the same committee, reported back Senate bill of the following title, with a recommendation that it do pass:

No. 257. An act to confirm the claim of Dasuan de la Croix to a lot of land therein described.

Mr. NICHOLS. I am instructed by the Committee on Private Land Claims to report the following bill:

A bill for the relief of Lloyd Dorsey and others.

Mr. HILLYER. If my colleague upon the Committee on Private Land Claims will withhold the report in that case for the present, I would state that I found among the papers of the committee a document which it is very important to the committee to consider in relation to this claim before it is reported. I found the paper after the committee had ordered the bill to be reported.

The SPEAKER. If no objection is made, the report made by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. NICHOLS] will be withdrawn.

Mr. NICHOLS, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported a bill for the relief of Robert McGuire, and Louisa, his wife, late Louisa Larney; which was read a first and second time by its title, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. ORR, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, made an adverse report upon the resolution of the House, asking an inquiry into the expediency of passing a law for the payment of claims arising out of the Black Hawk war of 1832, which was laid upon the table, and, together with the accompanying papers, ordered to be printed.

On motion by Mr. ORR, the same committee was discharged from the further consideration of the petition of James M. Coleman and wife, Cherokees, asking that the provisions of law of July 29, 1848, for the benefit of Cherokee Indians of North Carolina, may be extended to the Cherokees of Tennessee, and that said petition lie upon the table.

Mr. BALL, from the same committee, reported a bill indemnifying Moses D. Hogan for cattle destroyed by the Indians in 1842; which was read the first and second time by its title, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. GREENWOOD, from the same committee, made an adverse report in the case of John Johnson, asking compensation as sub-agent for the Wyandott Indians in 1841 and 1842; which was laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HOWE, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred Senate bill No. 162, being a bill "for the relief of Colonel Alexander G. Morgan," made an adverse report thereon, and asked that the bill be laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. Is there a written report accompanying the bill?

Mr. HOWE. No, sir.

Ordered, That the bill be laid on the table.

Mr. H., from the same committee, to whom was referred Senate bill, No. —, being a bill for the relief of Lieutenant Edward Cantwell, made an adverse report thereon, and asked that the bill be laid on the table.

It was so ordered.

On motion by Mr. HOWE, from the same committee, it was Ordered, That the Committee on Military Affairs be discharged from the further consideration of the proceedings of a public meeting held some time since in Indianapolis, with reference to the obstruction of travel and commerce at Erie, in the State of Pennsylvania.

Mr. H., from the same committee, reported a bill; which was read a first and second time by its title, as follows, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed:

Bill granting the same pay to officers of the Army who served in New Mexico as was granted by the act of September 28, 1850, to officers of the like grade serving in Oregon and California.

Mr. McDOUGALL, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported the following bill and joint resolution; which were read a first and second time by their titles, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and ordered to be printed:

Bill for the relief of Lieutenant George H. Page, of the United States Army; and Joint resolution for the relief of Brevet Captain J. H. Landrum, of the United States Army.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Mr. Speaker, the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs is absent, being unable to occupy his seat here to-day. The second gentleman on that committee [Mr. FAULKNER] is also absent. There are very many important bills which should be promptly reported by the committee, and I therefore move that the House do now adjourn.

[Cries of "Oh, no!" "No!"]

Mr. McDUGALL. Well, I withdraw that motion.

Mr. BOCOCK, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred Senate bill No. 128, entitled "An act for the relief of Hiram Paulding," asked that the committee be discharged from the further consideration thereof, and that it be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

It was so ordered.

Mr. BOCOCK, from the same committee, reported back, with a recommendation that it do not pass, Senate bill No. 114, "for the relief of Thomas Pember."

Ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. BOCOCK, from the same committee, reported back, with a recommendation that it do not pass, Senate bill No. 115, viz: "An act for the relief of Daniel Mickam."

Ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. MILLSON. I think in these cases, where Senate bills are reported back, courtesy requires that they should be referred to a Committee of the Whole House, with the recommendation of the committee.

Mr. BOCOCK. I have no objection to that disposition of them.

Mr. HOUSTON. I would inquire of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. Boccock] if the adverse reports, in these cases, are accompanied by a written report?

Mr. BOCOCK. They are accompanied by the Senate reports.

Mr. HOUSTON. Are they printed?

Mr. BOCOCK. They are.

Mr. HOUSTON. Does the committee make any written report?

Mr. BOCOCK. Not at all.

Mr. MILLSON. If we had a quorum here I should have no objection to these bills and reports being laid upon the table. But as there is not a quorum present, to lay them upon the table is equivalent to their rejection. It is final action, and that, too, by less than a quorum.

Mr. BOCOCK. I have no objection to their being referred to a Committee of the Whole House, with the recommendation of the committee that they do not pass. They will then come up regularly for consideration.

No objection being made, the last two bills reported, with the recommendation of the committee, were referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. BOCOCK. There have been several memorials referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs asking for pensions as invalids. The committee considered them, and came to the conclusion that they did not legitimately belong to that committee; they therefore directed me to ask that the Committee on Naval Affairs be discharged from their consideration, and that they be referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

The following memorials were accordingly referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and the Committee on Naval Affairs discharged therefrom:

Petition of Charles H. Robinson, a naval pensioner, for increase of pension;

Petition of Eli Darling, for pecuniary aid, in consideration of the loss of his eyes while in the service of the United States, at the naval station of Brooklyn;

Petition of Benjamin Cressey, for a pension as an invalid seaman, from wounds received during the late war with Great Britain; and Petition of William Gore, for a pension in consideration of injuries received while in the Dartmouth prison ship.

Mr. BOCOCK, from the same committee, reported back the Senate bill entitled "An act for the relief of passed shipmen George P. Welsh and Clark H. Wells," with a recommendation that it do pass.

Referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BOCOCK. I have in my hand a bill, in reference to which, before I make a report upon it, I desire to make an inquiry of the Chair. The House has agreed to receive the report of bills which do not give rise to debate. If a report elicits debate upon this occasion, it cannot be made to the House. I have a bill here which I wish to report to the House, and to move that it be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and printed, and then let the motion lie over.

Mr. HOUSTON. Let it be referred back to the committee.

Mr. BOCOCK. I do not want it referred back.

Mr. HOUSTON. I object.

Mr. BOCOCK. Then, as there is objection, I report a bill entitled "An act to reorganize the Navy of the United States."

The bill was read a first and second time by its title, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MACDONALD, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported back the following bills; which were referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and ordered to be printed:

S. No. 30. An act for the relief of Thomas Mars-ton Taylor;

S. No. 31. An act for the relief of purser Francis B. Stockton; and

S. No. 113. An act for the relief of the widows and orphans of the officers and seamen of the United States schooner Grampus, who were lost in that vessel in March, 1853, near the coast of the United States.

Mr. LANE, of Oregon. The chairman of the Committee on Territories is not present, and I do not know whether I shall succeed in the motion I wish to make. I do not know that this is a proper time to make the motion, but the object I wish to accomplish is an important one, and I hope the House will indulge me in it. I desire to set apart two or three days of next week for the consideration of Territorial business.

Several MEMBERS. Oh, no; do not do that!

Mr. BOCOCK. I would suggest to the gentleman from Oregon, that if he should succeed in his motion, he would accomplish nothing by it. The bill which is already a special order in committee would take precedence until it is disposed of.

Mr. LANE. I do not yield the floor to the gentleman. I want to talk a little. [A laugh.] There is much important territorial business yet undisposed of, and there is no prospect of our being able to reach it at all in its regular order during the present session. Now, sir, up to this time there has not been a single bill passed for the benefit of the Territory I represent. Not one. We have considered most of these bills in the Committee of the Whole, and they are now upon the Speaker's table; and unless there are some days set apart when we can be certain of their consideration, we shall have no further action upon them before the close of the session, or if there is action, it will be too late to secure the concurrence of the other House. I ask gentlemen to remember what they said to me some time ago; how they appealed to me not to press this business then, promising that a sufficient time should be set apart for the transaction of all the territorial business upon the Calendar. I hope the House will set apart the next week for that purpose.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oregon must be aware that his proposition can only be entertained by unanimous consent. Unanimous consent would be required for various reasons, and among others for the reason that we already have a special order for the next week, which is not disposed of in committee.

Mr. HAMILTON. I want to know what is before the House?

The SPEAKER. Nothing.

Mr. HAMILTON. Is not the regular order of business the call of committees for reports? I object to everything else.

The SPEAKER. There is, however, a proposition made by the gentleman from Oregon, asking the unanimous consent of the House to set apart the next week for the consideration of territorial business.

Mr. HAMILTON. I object.

Mr. McDUGALL. I propose to ask the unanimous consent of the House to postpone the further consideration of the special order in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, until the first Monday in July next. I will state to the House that my object in submitting this request is to secure for that measure a full and proper consideration. I will state further that the reports upon the various surveys will probably be ready in about a week from this time. These reports will present to the House the information which is desired, in order to determine upon the practicability and merits of the various routes upon which it is proposed to construct the road.

This information is of great importance, and is desired by members previous to action on the bill. For the purpose, therefore, of having the matter properly and satisfactorily understood by the House, I ask that the special order be postponed until the first Monday in July next.

Mr. LETCHER. We have been considering this bill for two weeks, and if its consideration is now postponed until the first of July, we shall in all probability have two or three weeks more discussion upon it. It was proposed the other day that the debate upon this measure should be closed some day early in the next week, and the House brought to a vote upon it. I think it should not be postponed, and the House would then be brought to action in regard to it.

Mr. McDUGALL. That was not proposed by a friend of the bill. The bill will have to be discussed, and that discussion, if continued now, will occupy sometime. Gentlemen are anxious to speak on it, and unless the course suggested be pursued they will proceed to address the committee on Monday next. Is it not best to have the discussion when all the facts are laid before us?

The SPEAKER. This discussion is irregular and out of order. The Chair must insist on gentlemen preserving order.

[Cries of "Withdraw the objection!"]

* Mr. LETCHER. I will not withdraw my objection. I cannot see why any one measure is entitled to all the consideration of this House to the exclusion of others.

The SPEAKER. Reports are in order from the Committee on Territories.

Mr. LANE, of Oregon. I am in hopes that there will be no objection to fixing a day for the consideration of territorial business.

The SPEAKER. Is the objection made to the gentleman's proposition withdrawn?

Mr. HAMILTON. I am indisposed to object to the gentleman's proposition; but he has time enough yet to make it. We already have a special order, and I, for one, am not willing to clog business by making special orders one on top of the other.

Mr. ELLISON, from the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, reported adversely on the petition and papers of Sarah Chesley, and on the petition and papers of Mary Blakeney; which were laid upon the table, and, with the accompanying reports, ordered to be printed.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine, from the same committee, reported back the petition and papers of John Marsh and others, children of John Marsh, for compensation for the services of their father in the revolutionary war; which were referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Mr. W. also, from the same committee, reported adversely on the petition of Elizabeth Martin; which was laid upon the table, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

Mr. DENT, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported adversely on the petition of John Russell, on the petition of Alpheus Hill, and on the petition of Mary R. Adrain; which were laid upon the table, and, with the accompanying reports, ordered to be printed.

Mr. D. also, from the same committee, reported back Senate bill No. 275, "for the relief of Andrew J. Dickerhoff;" which was referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. D. also, from the same committee, reported a bill "for the relief of Oliver Brown, of Chemung county, in the State of New York;" which was read a first and second time by its title, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. D. also, from the same committee, reported a bill "for the relief of Edmund Mitchell;" which was read a first and second time by its title, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. DENT. I am instructed by the Committee on Invalid Pensions to report the following bill:

A bill to provide a pension for George W. Torrance.

I desire to say that this is a particularly meritorious case. The individual for whose benefit this pension is intended is now in this city. I would ask that the bill be taken up and passed immediately, but seeing that it would be useless to do so, owing to the order of business, I would ask that the bill and report be printed, and that they be recommitted to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

The bill having been read a first and second time by its title, was then recommitted to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. VAIL, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported the following bills; which were read a first and second time by their respective titles, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, made the order of the day for to-morrow, and ordered to be printed:

A bill for the relief of James Butler;

A bill for the relief of John H. Hicks, of Indiana;

A bill for the relief of John Brown, 2d, of New Hampshire;

A bill for the relief Mrs. Anne W. Angus, widow of the late Captain Angus of the United States Navy;

A bill for the relief of Betsey Nash;

A bill for the relief of Thomas Ellis;

A bill for the relief of Mrs. C. S. Westcott.

On motion by Mr. VAIL, it was Ordered, That the Committee on Invalid Pensions be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Lydia Prather, of Franklin county, Maryland, asking that the bounty land to which she is entitled, as minor heir of David W. Prather, may be allowed her, and that said petition be laid upon the table.

On motion by Mr. STUART, of Ohio, it was Ordered, That the Committee on Invalid Pensions be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Ezekiel Hook, for an invalid pension, and that it be laid upon the table.

Also, that the same committee be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Sylvanus L. Henderson, and that it be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

On motion by Mr. STUART, it was Ordered, That the Committee on Invalid Pensions be discharged from the further consideration of the petitions of citizens of Michigan, for an extension of the pension lands, and of Peter H. Willets, a soldier of the late war with Mexico, praying for an increase of pension for injuries sustained while in the line of his duty.

Mr. STUART, from the same committee, reported back, with an amendment, Senate bill No. 133, which was referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and ordered to be printed:

An act for the relief of Lavinia Taylor.

Mr. STUART, from the same committee, to which was referred Senate bill No. 192, "for the relief of Amos Knapp," made an adverse report thereon, and moved that it be laid on the table.

It was so ordered.

Mr. LETCHER. Is it a Senate bill on which the gentleman reports adversely?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. LETCHER. Is it accompanied by a written report?

The SPEAKER. No; there is no written report presented.

Mr. LETCHER. And how can that committee expect us to know the merits of the controversy in regard to a question acted favorably on by the Senate, without a written report?

The SPEAKER. There is no written report in the case. This is a very fashionable mode of doing business now.

On motion by Mr. EDMANDS, it was

Resolved, That the Committee on Invalid Pensions be discharged from the further consideration of the following petitions, and that they take the direction designated below.

Petition of Lemuel Smith. Referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions.

Petition of Margaret Bowne for bounty land. Referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. EDMANDS, from the same committee, presented adverse reports on the following petitions; which were ordered to lie on the table:

Petition of Chester Parish;

Petition of Eunice Morrison, for arrears of pay due her late husband, Lieutenant Joseph Morrison;

Petition of Orange Mansfield;

Petition of Henry Welch; and Petition of Horatio Seymour, for amendment of the invalid pension laws.

Mr. EDMANDS, from the same committee, reported a bill; which was read a first and second time by its title, as follows, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and ordered to be printed:

A bill for the relief of Thomas Bronough.

Mr. EDMANDS also, from the same committee, reported the following bills; which were severally read a first and second time by their titles, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and ordered to be printed:

A bill for the relief of Anne E. Cook; and

A bill for the relief of Abraham Ausman.

On motion by Mr. CHRISMAN, it was Ordered, That the Committee on Invalid Pensions be discharged from the further consideration of Senate bill (No. 241) for the relief of James Wormsley, and that the same be referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions.

Mr. PRESTON, from the Committee on Roads and Canals, reported the following bill; which was read a first and second time by its title, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed:

A bill to provide for taking charge of the Louisville and Portland canal, and to prevent the same from falling into bad repair.

Mr. RITCHIE, of Pennsylvania. As a member of the Committee on Roads and Canals, I have no objection to the reference which has been made of this bill. But to enable me to look into the matter, I desire to have a motion to reconsider the vote by which it was so referred entered.

Mr. COBB. Such a course is contrary to the understanding entered into this morning.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I prefer that this matter should be disposed of now, otherwise it will be called up at some future time, and a motion made to put the bill upon its passage.

The SPEAKER. In the opinion of the Chair, a motion to reconsider is not within the spirit of the understanding this morning, and is not properly in order.

Mr. COBB. That was so understood.

The SPEAKER. The bill gives rise to controversy, and no bills were to be reported except such as should not give rise to debate.

Mr. PRESTON. I ask my colleague on the committee to withdraw his motion.

Mr. RITCHIE. I will withdraw it.

Mr. PRESTON. This bill was unanimously reported from the committee, and I think the reference had better be changed. I therefore move that it be referred back to the committee, and that it be printed.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I object to that course being taken. I do not want this bill to have any advantage over any other. It was not the intention of the agreement this morning to place bills in that position.

Mr. COBB. But, if it goes back to the committee, it is in the same position as if it had not been reported.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Well, let it go back without printing.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would suggest that several bills have been disposed of in this way in the course of the day.

Mr. DISNEY. I do not believe there is a man in the House to object. I hope the bill will go back to the Committee on Roads and Canals, and be printed.

The SPEAKER. That is the proposition before the House; but it can be acceded to only by unanimous consent.

Mr. JONES. I object to the printing. If it goes back to the committee, let them take it as it came from them.

Mr. COBB. I will say to the gentleman from Tennessee, that if he objects to the printing and reference, the bill will be brought directly before the House for consideration.

Mr. JONES. Oh, no.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the objection comes too late. The bill was reported, and, by unanimous consent, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RITCHIE] then moved to reconsider the reference, and to re-refer it to the Committee on Roads and Canals. The Chair thinks the order to print would not be affected by the motion to reconsider.

Mr. JONES. Well, let it go; but gentlemen will find that it will come up to be put on its passage some day.

Mr. PRESTON. My own opinion is, that the gentleman from Tennessee will vote for it himself whenever it does come up.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires the House to understand precisely in what form the matter now stands. The gentleman from Kentucky reported the bill from the Committee on Roads and Canals under the order of the House made this morning. In the ordinary course of business, the Chair announced that, by unanimous consent, it was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed. The gentleman from Kentucky now proposes to change the order, and to re-refer the bill to the Committee on Roads and Canals. The Chair decides that it can only be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. JONES. I will withdraw my objection, and let it go.

So the bill was rereferred to the Committee on Roads and Canals, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BRIDGES, from the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office, reported a "bill for the relief of Francis Pettit Smith;" which was read a first and second time by its title, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, made the order of the day for to-morrow, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. RIDDLE. I have no report to make from the Committees either upon Roads and Canals or Engraving, and I presume there are but few other reports to be made from the committees remaining to be called. I therefore take advantage of the opportunity now afforded to ask the indulgence of the House, and its unanimous consent, to present a memorial upon a subject in which at least three fourths of the people of the United States are interested, which is of great importance to my own constituents, and in which I am certain every member of the House will feel some interest. It relates, too, to a subject which has several times been brought to the attention of the present Congress, both in the Senate and House of Representatives, but upon which, as yet, no action has been taken. It is, sir, the memorial of the Agricultural Societies of Delaware, and of two thousand citizens of that State, praying the Government of the United States to effect some arrangement with Peru, by which, for a just and proper equivalent, the Peruvian Government will either cede to the United States one of her guano islands, or, by removing the existing restrictions upon American vessels engaged in the guano trade, place the trade in that article upon a more just and liberal commercial basis.

Mr. COBB. That may all be very proper, but let us get through with the call of committees first.

Mr. RIDDLE. My friend from Alabama knows full well that if objection be made now, I may never have such another opportunity. I therefore call upon him to withdraw his objection. The memorial could be presented under the rules of the House, but in that event it would necessarily go to either the Committee on Agriculture, or the Committee on Foreign Affairs. Without intending any disrespect to those committees, composed, as I know they are, of able gentlemen, and friends to the object of the petitioners, I must be permitted to say that the subject is one of such vast importance to the agricultural interests of all the States—interests which have never asked the protection of the American Congress, but which are eminently entitled to all it can give, as to demand particular and specific action unembarrassed by the action of a standing committee. I shall, therefore, move, before taking my seat, that a special committee be raised to take the subject in charge. If the House will gratify me in this particular, something may be done, either during this session or the next, and the lands upon the Atlantic slope, and, I may add, throughout the entire country, which are accessible from the coast, and which are now so poorly paying the grain and tobacco grower for his labor, may be enriched by the Peruvian guano, purchased, as it should be, at a moderate price, and not four times the cost of introducing it.

I am aware that the Peruvian Government derives a great portion of its revenue from this guano trade. I am equally aware that the United States and Great Britain are its best customers; but in all this I can see no reason why that Government should not, for a fair equivalent, remove the onerous restrictions imposed upon it, and particularly when demanded by the people of a friendly Power.

In an interview which I lately had with the Secretary of State upon the subject; that officer informed me he had had the same matter under consideration, and been in correspondence with the Peruvian Government, but that nothing had been definitely decided. If, under these circumstances, a special committee be raised, we shall, besides having a hope that something will be done, have the subject properly brought before Congress.

I move that such committee be raised, and consist of seven members. All the gentlemen around me I know to be in favor of such committee.

There was no objection.

The question was taken, and the proposition, that there be appointed a special committee of seven on the subject indicated, was agreed to.

Mr. CHANDLER, from the Committee on the Library, submitted a report on a resolution in reference to unsatisfied contracts for furnishing books, &c.; which was laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. C. also, from the same committee, reported a bill; which was read a first and second time by its title, as follows, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, made the order of the day for to-morrow, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed:

A bill for the relief of Titian R. Peale.

Mr. HENN, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported back as correctly enrolled bills of the following titles; which thereupon received the Speaker's signature:

H. R. No. 343. An act to authorize a register to be issued to the steamer El Paraguay by a new name; and

H. R. No. 318. An act to authorize the selection of school districts in lieu of the sixteenth section, within the twelve miles square reservation, State of Alabama.

Mr. HOUTON, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported adversely on the petition and papers of Sheonjashub Spooner, and on the presentment of the grand jury of the United States court for the district of Wisconsin, recommending an appropriation by Congress for the erection of a suitable building at Milwaukee, Wisconsin, to be used as a custom-house, United States court-room, and post office; which were laid upon the table.

Mr. HAVEN. I want as well the ear of the gentleman from California as that of the Speaker. The Committee of Ways and Means have had under consideration House bill No. 90, entitled "A bill to authorize and direct the payments of certain moneys into the treasury of the State of California, which were collected in the ports of said State as a revenue on imports since the ratification of the treaty of peace between the United States and the Republic of Mexico, and prior to the admission of said State into the Union;" and have directed me to report it back, with the recommendation that it do not pass. I understood that the gentleman desired to be heard on the subject when the report was made; and if it be his pleasure, I will submit the report now.

Mr. LATHAM. I have nothing further to say in the matter. My speech has been printed and laid upon each member's desk. I am willing that the bill shall be reported, and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. HAVEN reported the bill back, with the recommendation from the committee that it do not pass, and it was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, was ordered to be printed.

Mr. MILLER, from the Committee of Claims, reported back the petition of James W. Breedlove, late collector of customs at New Orleans, praying to be refunded the amount of a judgment obtained against him in his aforesaid capacity; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. M., from the same committee, also reported back the petition of George Mowry, Esq., of Pennsylvania, for compensation for services, &c.; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. M., from the same committee, made an adverse report upon the petition of Stephen Warner, of Niagara county, New York, asking compensation for property destroyed by the British and Indians during the late war with Great Britain; which was ordered to be laid upon the table, and be printed.

Mr. LETCHER, from the same committee, reported back the petitions and papers in the following cases; which were laid upon the table, and the committee discharged from their further consideration:

John Wilson, praying compensation for extra duty in the General Land Office;

Joseph D. Ward, praying compensation for services performed as a temporary clerk in the Clerk's Office, House of Representatives, in the years 1836 and 1837; and James B. Estes, of Wisconsin, asking Congress to remunerate him for property destroyed during the Sac and Fox war of 1832, and to compensate him for services rendered during said war.

Mr. L., from the same committee, reported a bill "for the relief of Sylvester Humphrey, and the heirs of Alexander Humphrey, deceased;" which was read a first and second time by its title, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, made the order of the day for to-morrow, and the bill and report ordered to be printed.

On motion by Mr. RUFFIN, it was Ordered, That the Committee of Claims be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Ann E. Brough, and that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. FULLER, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back Senate bill No. 143, with an amendment, being "An act for the compensation of James W. Low and others, for the capture of the British private armed schooner Ann, during the late war with Great Britain;" which was referred to a Committee of the Whole House, made the order of the day for to-morrow, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. FULLER. I am instructed by the Committee on Commerce to report the following bill:

An act to amend the act requiring the foreign regulations of commerce to be laid annually before Congress, approved 16th of August, 1842, and for other purposes.

I ask that it be referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and that it be printed.

The SPEAKER. It is so ordered.

Mr. FULLER. I desire to reconsider the motion I made. It is a matter of some importance, and when the bill has been printed, and members shall have looked at it—

Mr. COBB. That is contrary to the understanding entered into this morning.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. COBB] objects to the motion for reconsideration being entered.

Mr. COBB. I am for adhering to what was the general understanding.

Mr. FULLER. I move that the bill be re-committed to the Committee on Commerce.

No objection being made, it was so ordered.

Mr. F., from the same committee, reported back Senate bill No. 112, making Brunswick, in Georgia, a port of entry, which was ordered to be printed and re-committed to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. F., from the same committee, reported back Senate bill No. 200, "An act to constitute San Pedro, in the State California, a port of entry and delivery," and asked that it be ordered to be printed, and re-committed to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. This thing of reporting bills from a committee, and then re-committing them, is all wrong. The effect of it is to put all such bills in advance of all other bills that have been reported, and which have been referred either to a Committee of the Whole House, or the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; and it affords gentlemen an opportunity to put them upon their passage in the House. There is no opportunity of discussing or amending them in any particular, and you can do nothing but pass them under the operation of the previous question, or vote them down.

The SPEAKER. The Chair must rule, if objection be made, that the bill cannot be reported.

Mr. FULLER. I submit the point of order, that objection was made too late by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. JONES.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the objection is not made too late.

Mr. FULLER. With the permission of the Chair, and to quiet the feelings of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. JONES.] I will say that the bills I have reported and asked to have re-committed involve no principle and no expenditure of money; they merely provide rules and regulations for the collection of the revenue.

The SPEAKER. The Chair repeats that, under the order of the House, the latter bill having been objected to, and giving rise to debate, cannot be reported.

Mr. FULLER. Do I understand the Chair to say that the objection taken by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. JONES] was made in season in regard to the latter bill?

The SPEAKER. In regard to the latter bill only.

Mr. FULLER. Then I ask to withdraw that bill.

The SPEAKER. The ruling of the Chair will be that the bill was not reported at all.

Mr. FULLER. Oh, very well; that is satisfactory.

The SPEAKER. The Chair believes that was the understanding of the House. At all events, the Chair so understood it.

Mr. NICHOLS. I inadvertently omitted to report from the Committee on Private Land Claims a bill which I now ask to present.

The bill was read a first and second time by its title, as follows, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and ordered to be printed:

A bill for the relief of A. B. Roman, of Louisiana.

Mr. WENTWORTH, of Massachusetts. I am instructed by the Committee on Commerce, to report bills to the House on behalf of my colleague from Illinois, [Mr. WENTWORTH.]

The following bills were read a first and second time by their titles, referred as indicated below, and ordered to be printed:

A bill making appropriations for the repairs, preservation, and completion of certain public works hereafter commenced under authority of law.

Referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

A bill for the relief of Jacob McLellan. Referred to a Committee of the Whole House.

A bill for the relief of Nathaniel Goddard and others. Same reference.

Mr. DUNBAR. I am instructed by the Committee on Commerce to report back Senate bill No. 67, being "An act to amend an act making appropriations for the improvement of certain harbors and rivers, approved August 13, 1852," with an amendment, and a recommendation that it do pass.

Referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. DUNBAR. I am also directed by the same committee to report back Senate bill No. 243, being "An act to establish a port of delivery on Lake Ponchartrain, and for other purposes," with a recommendation that it do pass.

Same order and reference.

Mr. DUNBAR. I am also directed by the same committee to report back Senate resolution for the relief of the owners of the steamer Fanny.

Referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HARLAN, of Ohio, from the same committee, reported back, with a recommendation that it do pass, Senate bill No. 240, being "An act to extend the limits of the collection district of Milwaukee, in the State of Wisconsin, and for other purposes."

Referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. H., from the same committee, reported the following bill, which was read a first and second time by its title, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed:

A bill to constitute Keokuk and Dubuque, in the State of Iowa, ports of delivery.

Also, with an amendment, Senate resolution No. 3, "for the relief of the owners of the brig Kate Boyd;" which was referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and ordered to be printed.

On motion by Mr. HENN, it was Ordered, That the Committee on Public Lands be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of George Messersmith, for a patent to certain lands, and the petition of Robert W. Steel, asking to be relieved from the erroneous location of a land warrant, and that the same be laid upon the table.

Mr. COBB. I believe that we are now through with the call of committees. We have done a pretty good day's work. I find that there are many private bills upon the Speaker's table, and if it is the pleasure of the House, I move that the House proceed to refer them to their appropriate committees.

Mr. LETCHER. I hope we shall get beyond the Committee on Public Lands, of which the gentleman [Mr. Cobb] is a member. I do not want to stop at that committee, as I am anxious to get to some other committees, which will not occupy the whole balance of the session.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Call the next committee.

Mr. COBB. I hope the gentleman will not throw any reflection upon what I have done. We are through with the call of committees, according to the understanding this morning, and the Committee on Public Lands cannot be called until we meet again.

The SPEAKER. In order that gentlemen may understand each other, the Chair would state that the order made by the unanimous consent of the House this morning was, that the committees be called, beginning with the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and that such matter should be reported as should give rise to no debate or vote, and that the same should be referred; and that when the Chair should again resume the call, he should begin with the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads. The Committee on Public Lands immediately precedes the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads. Therefore the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Cobb] is not more interested in the proposition which he has made than any other member.

If there is no objection, the bills on the Speaker's table will be disposed of in the same manner, either generally, or if the House prefers, such as relate only to private business.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. I ask the consent of the House to make a report or two. They are not of any particular importance; but I was not in the House at the time my committee was called.

No objection was made.

On motion by Mr. STANTON, it was Ordered, That the Committee on the Judiciary be discharged from the further consideration of certain petitions for the election of President and Vice President by the people, and that the same be referred to the select committee on that subject appointed some time since.

On motion by Mr. STANTON, it was Ordered, That the Committee on the Judiciary be discharged from the further consideration of certain petitions for the election of postmasters by the people, and that the same be laid upon the table.

Mr. STANTON, from the Committee on the Judiciary, also reported back "a bill declaratory of the second section of an act of Congress approved February 3, 1853, entitled 'An act to continue half pay to certain widows and orphans.'"

Mr. S. said the Committee on the Judiciary looked upon this bill as the enactment of a new law upon the subject of pensions, which does not come within the province of our committee; we therefore ask to be discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and that it be referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

The bill was ordered to be so referred.

Mr. STANTON, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back a joint resolution providing for the election of United States Senators by the people; which was referred to the select committee appointed to consider that subject.

Mr. S., from the same committee, reported back a bill entitled "An act for the more effectual prosecution of land claims belonging to the United States."

Mr. S. said: I will state to the House that this bill is a proposition to purchase witnesses and prosecutors by giving them a portion of the property to be recovered. The Committee on the Judiciary considered it to be one very improper and injurious in its character. They have therefore instructed me to report it back to the House, with a recommendation that it do not pass. I move that it be laid upon the table.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill ordered to lie upon the table.

Mr. HAVEN. Some time since I gave notice of the introduction of a bill upon a subject of some consequence. It involves the expenditure of no money; and I now propose to throw myself upon the well known indulgence of the House, and ask leave to introduce it, simply for the purpose of having it referred to the Committee on Commerce.

There was no objection; and the following bill was introduced, read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce:

A bill to amend the act entitled "An act to provide for recording the conveyances of vessels, and for other purposes," approved July 29, 1850.

Mr. DRUM. Among the papers of the member from Virginia, lately deceased, [Mr. SNODGRASS,] I find a bill and report from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, of which he was a member. I ask leave to present it and have it referred.

There was no objection, and the following bill was reported from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, read a first and second time by its title, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, made the order of the day for to-morrow, and the bill and report ordered to be printed.

A bill for the relief of Charles J. Davis, administrator of Captain John Davis, an officer in the war of the Revolution.

BILLS ON THE SPEAKER'S TABLE.

The House, by unanimous consent, then proceeded to take up and dispose of bills upon the Speaker's table, as follows:

An act (H. R. No. 185) granting the right of way to the St. Louis and Iron Mountain railroad, through the arsenal, magazine, and Jefferson barracks tracks. Reported from the Senate with amendments.

Mr. COBB. I move to refer the bill to the Committee on Public Lands, and that it be printed.

Mr. MILLER. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. The bill was originally referred to the Committee on Public Lands, but subsequently that committee was discharged from its consideration, and it was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. COBB. With that explanation I withdraw my motion.

So the bill was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

The following Senate bills received their first and second reading, and were referred as indicated:

An act (No. 245) to amend the provisions of the fifty-sixth section of the act entitled "An act to regulate the collection of duties on imports and tonnage," approved the 2d day of March, 1799. Referred to the Committee on Commerce.

An act (No. 262) granting to the State of Alabama public lands, in alternate sections, to aid in the construction of a central railroad from some point on the boundary line of the States of Alabama and Tennessee to a point on the boundary line of the States of Alabama and Florida. Referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

An act (No. 348) to grant other lands in lieu of certain sixteenth sections heretofore disposed of by the United States for other than school purposes. Referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

An act (No. 355) to authorize the purchase of portraits of the first five Presidents of the United States. Referred to the Committee on the Library.

A resolution (No. 9) manifesting the sense of Congress towards the officers and seamen of the vessels and others engaged in the rescue of the officers and soldiers of the Army, the passengers, and the officers and crew of the steamship San Francisco, from perishing with the wreck of that vessel. Referred to the special committee on the subject.

An act (No. 178) to incorporate the National Hotel Company of Washington city. Referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

An act (No. 334) for the relief of François Cousin. Referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

An act (No. 358) to make compensation to Henry Cronchey for extra services. Referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

An act (No. 352) extending in certain cases the provisions of the act entitled "An act to extend preemption rights to certain lands therein mentioned," approved March 3, 1853. Referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

An act (No. 64) for the relief of the legal representatives of John G. Mackall, deceased. Referred to the Committee of Claims.

An act (No. 175) for the relief of John Bronson. Referred to the Committee of Claims.

An act (No. 188) for the relief of Captain Langdon C. Easton, assistant quartermaster United States Army. Referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

An act (No. 203) for the relief of Thomas Snodgrass. Referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

An act (No. 222) for the relief of John S. Wilson. Referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and ordered to be printed.

An act (No. 225) for the relief of Isaac Cook and others. Referred to the Committee of Claims.

An act (No. 231) for the relief of the legal representatives of John Metcalf. Referred to the Committee of Claims.

An act (No. 239) for the relief of Sylvester Pettibone. Referred to the Committee of Claims.

An act (No. 240) for the relief of James Edwards and others. Referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

An act (No. 248) for the relief of William Harris, of Georgia. Referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

An act (No. 252) for the relief of the personal representative of William A. Slacum, deceased. Referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

An act (No. 290) for the relief of Rufus Van Brunt. Referred to the Committee of Claims.

An act (No. 291) for the relief of Horace Southmayd and son. Referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

An act (No. 301) for the relief of the legal representatives of Thomas D. Anderson, deceased, late consul of the United States at Tripoli. Referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

An act (No. 322) for the relief of Samuel Bray. Referred to the Committee on Commerce.

An act (No. 324) for the relief of Seneca G. Simmons. Referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

An act (No. 329) for the relief of Thomas D. Jennings. Referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

An act (No. 330) for the relief of Juan M. Lucio and José L. Lucio. Referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

An act (No. 337) for the relief of Eliza M. Evans. Referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions.

An act (No. 340) for the relief of Sarah Crandall. Referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions.

An act (No. 374) for the relief of Sylvester T. Jerauld, assignee of the interest of Henry Richard. Referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

An act (No. 269) granting the right of way over, and depot grounds on, the military reserve at Fort Gratiot, in the State of Michigan, to the Port Huron and Lake Michigan Railroad Company. Referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

An act (No. 88) for the relief of William G. Ridgley. Referred to the Committee of Claims.

An act (No. 377) regulating the time of holding the sessions of the district and circuit courts of the United States in the eastern district of Louisiana. Referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

An act (No. 378) to establish an additional land district in the State of Florida. Referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

An act (No. 382) further to amend the act entitled "An act to appropriate the proceeds of the sales of the public lands, and to grant preemption rights," approved September 4, 1841. Referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

A resolution (No. 16) manifesting the sense of Congress towards Commander Edward Marshall, commanding her Britannic Majesty's ship Virago, and the officers and crew who were detached, by his order, for the relief of the surveying party under the command of Lieutenant J. G. Strain. Referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

An act (No. 372) in favor of Charles D. Arf-wedson. Referred to the Committee of Claims.

An act (No. 320) supplementary to an act entitled "An act to authorize notaries public to take and certify oaths, affirmations, and acknowledgments in certain cases." Referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

An act (No. 373) to ascertain and adjust the titles to certain lands in the State of Indiana.

Mr. HENDRICKS. As the gentleman who has special charge of that bill is absent, I ask that it be left upon the Speaker's table, and that no action be taken upon it at this time.

The SPEAKER. There being no objection, the bill will remain upon the table.

Mr. HOUSTON. All the bills from the Senate on the Speaker's table having now been disposed of, let us take up the territorial bills.

The SPEAKER. The business first in order upon the Speaker's table will be the consideration of Senate bill No. 373, "granting to the States of Indiana and Illinois a portion of the public lands, to aid in the construction of the Indiana and Illinois Central railroad."

Mr. COBB. That goes to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. HENDRICKS. My colleague, who is also interested in this bill, is not here, and I will object to its consideration in his absence. Let it remain on the table.

Mr. LETCHER. What is the reason that that bill is not referred like others?

The SPEAKER. Because objection is made. The bill has been referred and reported back.

Mr. LETCHER. The object, I presume, in leaving it on the table now, is to have it passed without being referred.

The SPEAKER. For the information of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. LETCHER,] the Chair will state that the pending motion in regard to the bill is one submitted by himself to lay the bill upon the table; and on that motion the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. MILLER, of Missouri. As my colleague from the St. Louis district [Mr. BENSON] is not here, I ask that the order referring the bill granting a right of way to the St. Louis and Iron Mountain Railroad Company be reconsidered, and that the bill be laid upon the table.

Mr. HOUSTON. If that motion be entertained, I will ask the Speaker also to entertain a similar motion in reference to a bill in which I have an interest.

The SPEAKER. If objection be made to the proposition of the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. MILLER,] the Chair cannot consistently, with the order of the House, entertain the motion to reconsider.

Mr. MILLER. I only want that the bill may be reinstated in the position it was in, and laid on the table, as my colleague is not here.

Mr. HAVEN. I understand that the request of the gentleman from Missouri is not made for the purpose of allowing the matter to lie over, but simply that the bill may be left where it was, one of his colleagues who had charge of it, being absent.

The SPEAKER. Is it the unanimous pleasure of the House that the bill referred to be placed back on file on the Speaker's table?

There being no objection, it was so ordered.

POSTPONEMENT OF THE SPECIAL ORDER.

Mr. LETCHER. For the purpose of permitting the gentleman from California [Mr. McDougall] to renew his motion for a postponement of the special order, I withdraw my objection to it.

Mr. McDougall. Then I ask the consent of the House to postpone the special order on the Pacific railroad bill to the first Monday in July, for the reason that the reports of the engineers are about being completed, and will soon be before the House, so that it may understand the practicability of the route proposed.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. If the gentleman's motion be adopted, the special order will come up at a very bad time. It will come up at a time when we have all the other business of the House to perform. Besides that, we have not now a sufficient number of members present to make a disposition of this bill in any way. And I, for one, would prefer that there were no action taken on it until, at least, there were a quorum in the House.

Several MEMBERS. That is right.

Mr. McDougall. I wish it to be understood by the gentleman from Tennessee, that all the friends of the measure ask for it is a full and fair consideration, and we will insist on that.

Mr. JONES. Let us have enough members present to dispose of it properly.

THE HOOSAC TUNNEL.

Mr. GOODRICH presented the petition of the Troy and Greenfield Railroad Company for a grant of a portion of the public lands in aid of the construction of the Hoosac tunnel.

The petition states that the enterprise is one of the boldest and most important yet commenced in America, running, as it does, fifteen hundred feet below the summit of the Hoosac, by a tunnel four miles and a half in length, materially reducing the distance, grades, curvatures, time, and cost of transportation between Massachusetts, Maine, New Hampshire, Rhode Island, Connecticut, and Vermont, and the States of New York, Pennsylvania, and the West; that it is a great national enterprise, essential to the foreign and domestic commerce of the country, to the carriage of the mails, to social intercourse, and of vast importance in time of war, and well entitled to the countenance of the Government.

The petition further states that the State of Massachusetts, although interested in another and rival enterprise, has granted to this company a loan of the State credit to be advanced as the work progresses, and has thus indorsed its value and importance; that its feasibility has been shown by careful surveys and scientific research, but still the magnitude of the work and time required for its completion demand the fostering care of the Government.

The petition closes by respectfully asking that Congress would give its countenance to this enterprise by granting to the company, or to the State of Massachusetts in aid of the same, a portion of the public lands, upon such terms with respect to the carriage of the mails and munitions of war, and with such other provisions, as shall be considered just and reasonable.

The petition was received, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. HAMILTON. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken; and the motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly (at three o'clock, p. m.) adjourned till Monday next, at twelve o'clock, m.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, June 12, 1854.

Prayer by REV. WILLIAM H. MILBURN.

The Journal of Thursday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. FORNEY, their Clerk, announcing that the Speaker had signed the enrolled bill to authorize the selection of school districts, in lieu of the sixteenth sections, within the twelve miles square reservation, State of Alabama.

DEATH OF HON. J. F. SNODGRASS.

The message also communicated to the Senate intelligence of the death of Hon. JOHN FRYATT SNODGRASS, late a member of that House from the State of Virginia, and the proceedings of the House in relation thereto.

The proceedings were read.

Mr. MASON. I discharge a melancholy office, Mr. President, in asking the Senate to unite with me in the customary resolutions of respect to the memory of a colleague, whose death has just been announced from the House of Representatives.

Truly, we cannot tell what a day may bring forth. But little more than one week ago, when the two Houses were to be for a few days in recess, my deceased colleague took (as we all then believed) a short leave of his friends, availing himself of that interval for a brief visit to his home in Virginia. His health, somewhat infirm in later years, seemed to have been regenerate with the advancing spring, and he left us buoyant with hope, and rejoicing in the prospect of a speedy reunion with those he loved best on earth—his wife and infant children. He but lived to reach his distant home, and once more to bless them with his presence.

Death, inexorable creditor of all that live, sped with him on this his last journey on earth—Pallida mors æquo pede pulsat. Yet how grateful is the recollection to those who survive, that he was spared a death amongst strangers, and that the devoted partner of his life shared his last look in death.

The subject of this brief tribute, Mr. President, JOHN FRYATT SNODGRASS, represented the eleventh congressional district of Virginia, in the House of Representatives. A native of the county of Berkeley, on the northern frontier of the valley of Virginia, he had removed in early life to the banks of the Ohio, and established his home at Parkersburg, in the county of Wood.

His family are well known to me in his native county, occupying and cultivating their ancestral farms of more than a century, among the most respectable and respected of those whose occupation develops the full dignity of man in social position—those who plow and till the soil that it may bring forth the fruits of the earth, the immediate almoners of the Deity, who has chosen and sent them forth as the true benefactors of their race; for who does not feel with England's gifted philosopher, when he gave it for his opinion, "that whoever could make two ears of corn or two blades of grass to grow upon a spot of ground where only one grew before, would deserve better of mankind and do more essential service to his country than the whole race of politicians put together."

Educated for the bar, Mr. SNODGRASS soon rose to eminence in his profession, sustained and borne forward to success by diligence, labor, and spotless integrity.

It was my fortune to have known him in early life, before he sought his new home in the West, but his progress and advancement there were marked by those from among whom he had gone forth to the world. The charm of life to him was in private station.

It would seem from his career that public employment, with all its seductions for many, had few attractions for him. I have been informed that he was never a candidate for office, in its proper sense, yet he was a man of fixed and stable opinion on the great measures of policy which divide the parties of the country—a republican of that Democratic school instituted by Jefferson, and in which Henry, Wythe, Roane, and other home bred statesmen of Virginia were the illustrious teachers.

At the solicitation of his friends and neighbors, he represented them, for the first time, in the convention of the State called to revise the constitution of Virginia, in 1850. Of that body he was what is usually termed a silent member; with the flippant, perhaps a designation of disparagement; yet Jefferson, whose commanding intellect moulded and gave being to all the great institutions of our popular Government, was himself always a silent member too. It is said, I think, of Mr. Jefferson, that, on even the greatest question before him, he seldom made a speech exceeding four minutes in duration. Fortunate in a plain and sensible mind, not unstored with the results of reading and reflection, my deceased friend and colleague was one of those who thought it safer, and perhaps not less seemly, rather to think and act without talking, than to talk and act without thinking.

At the close of the convention, he returned to the quiet of his unobtrusive life, until again, unsolicited on his part, he was returned to serve in the House of Representatives of the present Congress, and here, after an interval of some twenty years, I had the good fortune to renew my acquaintance with him.

He was a warm, liberal, and confiding friend, a sound, judicious, and informed statesman, and, above all, an upright and honest man.

I offer, sir, the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the Senate receives, with sincere regret, the announcement of the death of Hon. JOHN FRYATT SNODGRASS, late a member of the House of Representatives from the State of Virginia, and tenders to the relatives of the deceased the assurance of its sympathy with them under the bereavement they have been called to sustain.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be directed to transmit to the family of Mr. SNODGRASS, a certified copy of the foregoing resolution.

Resolved, As a mark of respect for the memory of the deceased, that the Senate do now adjourn.

The resolutions were unanimously agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, June 12, 1854.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by REV. WILLIAM H. MILBURN.

The Clerk commenced reading the Journal of Saturday, when

Mr. COBB (interrupting) said: I learn that there are about thirty-six pages of the Journal, all relating to the reception of reports from committees, and the reference of Senate bills, which occupied nearly all of Saturday's session. Cannot we dispense with the reading of the Journal, when it contains nothing else, and the reading of which would consume from an hour to an hour and a half? In order that we may proceed to business, and save time, I move that the further reading of the Journal be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. That can only be done by unanimous consent.

No objection being made, the further reading of the Journal was accordingly dispensed with.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The business first in order is the consideration of a motion to suspend the rules of the House for the purpose of allowing the gentleman from New York [Mr. WALBRIDGE] to introduce a resolution, offered by him some two weeks since, in reference to fixing the day for the final adjournment of Congress.

Mr. ORR. As that resolution is one of some importance, and with the view of having a full House for its consideration, I move that there be a call of the House.

Mr. MACE. I rise to a privileged question. I desire to make a partial report from the Committee on Rules, and I send it to the Clerk's table.

The SPEAKER. The Committee on Rules, under the rules of the House, can report at any time; but the present proposition is to suspend those rules, and therefore the report of the gentleman would not take precedence of the privileged question which is pending.

The question was then taken on the motion that there be a call of the House; and it was decided in the affirmative.

The roll of the House was then called, and one hundred and thirty-nine members answered to their names.

The following is a list of the absentees:

Messrs. David J. Bailey, Thomas H. Bayly, Banks, Barksdale, Bell, Bennett, Benton, Bissell, Bliss, Chase, Churchwell, Craige, Culton, Cumming, Cutting, Thomas Davis, Deau, De Witt, Dickinson, Disney, Eastman, Eddy, Edgerton, Farley, Faulkner, Fenton, Flagler, Florence, Franklin, Grey, Grow, Sampson W. Harris, Wiley P. Harris, Harrison, Hibbard, Daniel T. Jones, Keitt, Kerr, Kidwell, Kirtledge, Kurtz, Lane, Lilly, Lindsley, Lyon, McCulloch, McNair, McQueen, Macy, Matteson, Maurice, Mayall, Meacham, Middleswarth, Morrison, Noble, Packard, Peckham, Bishop Perkins, John Perkins, Phillips, Powell, Pratt, Preston, Puryear, Reese, Richardson, Rowe, Ruffin, Sapp, Seymour Shannon, Shower, Simmons, Samuel A. Smith, Sellers, Straub, David Stuart, John J. Taylor, Tracy, Tweed, Vansant, Wade, Walker, Walsh, Ellihu B. Washburne, Wells, John Wentworth, Wheeler, Witte, Daniel B. Wright, Yates, and Zollieoffer.

Mr. ORR. I move that all further proceedings in the call be dispensed with.

The question was put; and the motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs upon the motion to suspend the rules, for the purpose of introducing the resolution, which will be reported by the Clerk.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, (the Senate concurring.) That the President of the Senate, and the Speaker of the House of Representatives adjourn their respective Houses sine die on Monday, the third of July next, at twelve o'clock, m.

Mr. ORR. I would inquire of the Chair if that resolution will be amendable if the rules are suspended for its introduction?

The SPEAKER. It will be.

Mr. ORR. I then give notice that I shall move to amend it by striking out "Monday, the 3d of July next," and inserting in lieu thereof "Wednesday, the 9th of August."

Mr. HOUSTON. I cannot vote to suspend the rules for the admission of that resolution. I should like to have the gentleman who introduced it modify it before the question is put, and that he shall make the day of adjournment the 15th day of August. He has the right to do that.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon the suspension of the rules, and it is not debatable.

Mr. HILLYER. I merely wish to give notice that if the rules are suspended, I shall move to amend the resolution offered by the gentleman from New York, so as to make the present Congress adjourn on the first Monday of August next, and to fix the permanent day for the meeting of Congress hereafter the third Monday of October instead of the first Monday in December.

Mr. SKELTON. I ask for the yeas and nays upon the motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. ORR. Perhaps we can suspend the rules without the yeas and nays; and I hope the gentleman will withdraw the call until we take the question.

Mr. SKELTON. I withdraw my call.

The question being put, and there appearing only twenty-four members in the affirmative,

Mr. COBB called for the yeas and nays, and tellers upon the same.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. McMULLIN and VAIL were appointed.

The House was divided; and the tellers reported 29 in the affirmative, (more than one fifth of those present.)

So the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was then taken on the motion to suspend the rules; and there were—yeas 104, nays 38; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Aiken, Willis Allen, Appleton, Ashe, Ball, Barry, Bell, Benson, Bridges, Brooks, Bugg, Campbell, Carpenter, Caruthers, Chandler, Chastain, Chrisman, Clingan, Colquhoun, Cook, Corwin, Cox, Crocker, Curtis, Cutting, John G. Davis, Dawson, Dent, Dick, Dowdell, Drugg, Dunbar, Dunham, Edmunds, Edmundson, Thomas D. Eliot, John M. Elliott, Ellison, English, Etheridge, Everhart, Ewing, Fuller, Gamble, Giddings, Goodrich, Greenwood, Hamilton, Aaron Harlan, Andrew J. Harlan, Hastings, Haven, Hendricks, Hiestler, Hill, Hillyer, Howe, Hughes, Hunt, Johnson, Knox, Lamb, Latham, Lindley, McDougal, Mayall, Meacham, John G. Miller, Smith Miller, Morgan, Morrison, Murray, Norton, Olds, Andrew Oliver, Mordcair Oliver, Orr, Packard, Pennington, Phelps, Pringle, Radey, David Ritchie, Thomas Ritchey, Robbins, Russell, Sage, Sapp, Samuel A. Smith, William Smith, George W. Smyth, Frederick P. Stanton, Richard H. Stanton, Alexander H. Stephens, Stratton, John L. Taylor, Nathaniel G. Taylor, Trout, Walbridge, Walley, Warren, Israel Washburn, Tappan Wentworth, and Hendrick B. Wright—104.

NAYS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Belcher, Boeck, Boyce, Breckinridge, Caskie, Chamberlain, Clark, Cobb, Goode, Henn, Houston, Ingersoll, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Roland Jones, Leitcher, McMullin, Mace, Maxwell, May, Millson, Nichols, Riddle, Rogers, Ruffin, Sabin, Seward, Shaw, Singleton, Skelton, Gerrit Smith, Hector L. Stevens, Straub, Andrew Stuart, Thurston, Upham, and Vail—38.

So two thirds having voted in the affirmative, the rules were suspended.

Mr. WALBRIDGE. For the purpose of meeting the wishes of a large number of gentlemen around me, I now propose to modify my resolution by striking out the 3d of July and inserting the 17th of that month; and also to add that the two Houses convene again on the first Monday of November next.

[Cries of "No!" "No!" all over the House.]

Mr. WALBRIDGE. Very well, I will then leave it so as to provide for an adjournment sine die on the 17th of July.

Mr. ORR. I move to amend the resolution by striking out "the 17th of July" and inserting "Wednesday, the 9th day of August."

The SPEAKER. The Chair will suggest to the gentleman from New York, that it is scarcely in his power to modify his resolution after having been introduced by a suspension of the rules. He may accomplish his purpose by moving to amend it, but he has not the right to modify it.

Mr. WALBRIDGE. I then submit the proposition I have indicated as an amendment.

Mr. ORR. I then offer my proposition as an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from New York. I move to strike out whatever day is there named, and to insert in lieu thereof "Wednesday, the 9th day of August."

Mr. HAVEN. I ask the gentleman from South Carolina to yield me the floor.

Mr. ORR. I ask the Speaker whether the resolution is debatable? If it is, I will yield to the gentleman from New York temporarily.

The SPEAKER. It is debatable.

Mr. HAVEN. I desired the floor for the purpose of submitting a proposition in reference to the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Chair must remind the gentleman from New York that there are already two amendments pending—an amendment offered by the gentleman from New York, and an amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina. No proposition further to amend will, therefore, be in order. The gentleman from New York proposes to strike out the 3d of July and to insert the 17th; and the gentleman from South Carolina moves to strike out the 17th of July and to insert the 9th of August.

Mr. HAVEN. Will the gentleman from South Carolina yield me the floor, so that I may submit an explanation, and such a motion as may be in order? I shall not occupy more than two minutes.

Mr. ORR. Will the gentleman please indicate what motion he proposes to submit?

Mr. HAVEN. It is one in reference to the resolution.

Mr. ORR. If I properly understand the state of the question before the House, no further amendment is in order. The gentleman from New York [Mr. WALBRIDGE] proposes to amend the resolution. I propose to amend the amendment. Another proposition to amend would be in the third degree, and therefore not in order. I do not perceive how the gentleman from New York [Mr. HAVEN] can subserve the purpose he has in view, even should I yield him the floor.

Mr. HAVEN. If I cannot make a motion that is properly in order, I shall at once yield the floor to the gentleman.

Mr. HOUSTON. I would make a single suggestion by the gentleman's permission. The resolution is now in a condition to prevent the submission of further amendments. I would like the gentleman from South Carolina to modify his amendment, so as to fix the time at 15th of August. My preference is for a later day, but still I am willing to compromise with the gentleman on the 15th.

Mr. McMULLIN. With the permission of the gentleman from South Carolina, I would inquire of the Chair whether the question is not divisible? Have I not the right to call for a division on the motion to strike out?

The SPEAKER. A motion to strike out and insert is not divisible by express rule.

Mr. ORR. If the resolution be adopted, modified as indicated, we shall have two months lacking a few days. In that time we can finish all business necessary and proper to be finished. I think that the time from now till the 9th of August is ample; and if there be a majority of the House concurring with me, it will sustain the demand for the previous question which I now make.

Mr. HAVEN. I would like to be heard a moment. Will not the gentleman from South Carolina withdraw his call for the previous question for two minutes so that somebody on this side of the House may be heard?

Mr. ORR. I withdraw my call for the previous question, temporarily, so that the gentleman from New York may make his explanation.

Mr. HAVEN. I shall not abuse the gentleman's favor. I desire to move as a substitute for the resolution, the joint resolution which has been sent down to us from the Senate. This one thing I will say in regard to the matter: The Senate has kindly offered us that resolution. It was, to some extent, ex gratia on its part. The condition of the appropriation bills is such that the Senate would have the right to complain if we undertook to send it a new proposition. We have not given it the time it ought to have to act on these bills. If we take the proposition sent in to us, it will not have the right to complain. We may take the proposition and say—gentlemen we take you at your word and will go to work, and between this and the third day of July, accomplish the same amount of work that would be accomplished, under the resolution of the gentleman from South Carolina, between this and the first Monday in August. Fix a time for the adjournment, and my word for it, all the necessary work will be done. I will only add, from what I have seen in my experience in these matters—I do not say it unkindly of the House—that I am inclined to think, from our past action, that the House has got into that condition of demoralization in reference to legislation in which we shall not effect any valuable purpose until we have separated and come together again at some future day. If it be in order, I move the Senate joint resolution as a substitute for the gentleman's resolution.

The SPEAKER. It is not in order to move as an amendment any bill pending before the House.

The resolution passed by the Senate is now before this House, and cannot be offered as an amendment, unless it is modified in some way by changing the day or week.

Mr. HAVEN. I see the propriety of the decision of the Chair. I will take the language of the joint resolution, and insert the 4th of July instead of the 3d.

The SPEAKER. Does the Chair understand the gentleman from South Carolina as yielding the floor to the gentleman from New York [Mr. HAVEN] to offer an amendment?

Mr. HAVEN. The gentleman from South Carolina yielded me the floor unconditionally.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood the gentleman from South Carolina as yielding the floor temporarily.

Mr. ORR. I said, at the time, that I yielded the floor temporarily.

Mr. HAVEN. I would inquire if the gentleman from South Carolina intends to avail himself of the rule, so as to cut off my right to offer a substitute?

Mr. ORR. I will answer the question propounded by my friend from New York. The principal inducement that operated upon my mind to vote for a suspension of the rules, was to take up this resolution, with a view of avoiding the proposition that was sent to us from the Senate. I am myself opposed to the proposition that this Congress should take a recess; for such a thing is unprecedented in the history of this Government. I think we should pursue the usual course of fixing the day of adjournment, and that this would be the earliest day at which we could reasonably anticipate finishing the public business. It would not be proper for me to yield the floor for the purpose of enabling a proposition to come in which I desire to defeat.

I propose now to withdraw the modification which I submitted, and to offer the following resolution as a substitute, which proposes to fix, instead of the 14th of August, the hour of the day at which the House shall adjourn, an omission in the preceding resolution, which escaped my attention, and to which my attention was directed by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. JONES.]

Mr. HILLYER. I hope the gentleman from South Carolina will yield me the floor for a moment.

Mr. ORR. I will yield the floor to the gentleman.

Mr. HILLYER. If it be in order, I wish to offer an amendment to the resolution now before the House. I do not intend to detain the House in discussing the substitute which I propose to offer. I apprehend the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. ORR.] can have no objection to it, as it will not preclude a vote upon the resolution offered by him. The substitute which I propose to offer is the following.

Resolved, (the Senate concurring,) That the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives adjourn their respective Houses on the first Monday in August next, and that hereafter the day appointed by law for the assembling of Congress shall be on the third Monday in October, in each year, instead of the first Monday of December.

Mr. ORR. Before the House proceeds further in the disposition of this matter, I submit to the Chair this question of order: that the substitute proposed by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HILLYER] is not in order as a substitute to the resolution now pending. If this substitute were adopted, it would be necessary for it to be laid before the President for his sanction before it could be carried into effect.

The SPEAKER. The question of order made by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. ORR.] is well taken. If the substitute proposed by the gentleman from Georgia were agreed to, the resolution would have to go to the President for his approval. This, on reflection, would change the whole character of the original resolution. It is competent for the two Houses to pass a joint resolution fixing the day of adjournment of the present session of Congress; but it is not competent for the two Houses, without the approval and signature of the President, to change the period of the annual meeting of Congress.

Mr. HILLYER. Well, I hope that the resolution of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. ORR.] will be voted down by the House.

Mr. ORR. I ask the previous question on the resolution.

Mr. SEWARD. I move to lay the substitute of the gentleman from South Carolina on the table.

Mr. McMULLIN addressed the Chair.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from South Carolina withdraw his call for the previous question, and yield to the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. McMULLIN?]

Mr. ORR. I do not wish to be discourteous to the gentleman from Virginia. I therefore withdraw my call for the previous question temporarily, for the purpose of permitting the gentleman to make any suggestion he may desire.

Mr. McMULLIN. I merely want to make a suggestion.

It occurs to me, that if gentlemen will only consent, one and all, to go to work as we ought to do, and as we are capable of doing, we could do much more business than we can transact in this way, getting up or adopting resolutions of this kind fixing days for adjournment. My experience, in this respect, is, that whenever we fix a day for an adjournment, there is a constant rush by gentlemen who happen to have bills pending in which they are particularly interested, to get these particular bills disposed of.

Now, I beg gentlemen to recollect that we have occupied a vast deal of the time of this Congress in discussing a question of general character. I allude to the Nebraska bill. There is, however, now before the House a vast amount of business of a private character—business in which the interests of almost every State in the Union are involved. There are many bills of a local character pending. And we have not yet appropriated a single day to the consideration of these private bills. I do not agree with the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HAVEN,] that we owe anything to the Senate for making this proposition to us. I think the public interests would be better served if we should go to work really, and in earnest; and when we shall have placed the public business in such a condition as that it will justify our adjourning, then let us adjourn.

I intended at a proper time to move to lay this whole subject on the table. It would be discourteous to the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. ORR,] who yielded me the floor, to do so now; but I give notice that when the subject comes to that point where I may legitimately make such a motion, I shall move to lay the whole matter on the table.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. SEWARD] has submitted a motion to lay on the table the substitute proposed by the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. ORR,] This is the first motion to be disposed of.

Mr. SEWARD. I withdraw that motion.

Mr. ORR. I think, Mr. Speaker, that I have manifested quite enough of a disposition to accommodate all my friends on both sides of the question. I now demand the previous question. And if the House concur with me, they will second it.

The question was put on seconding the demand for the previous question. The Speaker announced forty-one members rising.

Mr. ORR demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. Cox and Orr were appointed.

The question was then taken; and the tellers reported—ayes 52, noes not counted; not a sufficient number.

So the previous question was not sustained.

Mr. HAVEN. I believe I may, with some confidence, appeal to gentlemen in all parts of the House, for my sincerity, when I say I have as strong a desire as any fair-minded member here, to see the business of the country properly transacted. I am willing to make as many personal sacrifices, and submit to as great inconvenience as any other gentleman, but, it is only upon the ground that I have been impressed with the idea, that if we set here, in most we do we shall but keep the country in a state of turmoil and uneasiness without making any advance whatever in the public business—that I am in favor of taking the earliest possible day for going home to our constituents, and, if necessary, of meeting again in a better business frame of mind in the fall. There is a propriety, yea, an absolute necessity for disposing of the appropriation bills, and if I had the matter in my own hand, I would fix the middle or the latter part of July as the time for adjournment. But that is not the question. The Senate have made us an offer. They have told us that their business is in such a condition that they can afford to adjourn at the time indicated in their resolution. They have told us that, with a knowledge upon their part of the condition of the appropriation bills and other business in this House. I think it right, and just, and fair, to meet them upon that ground, and to take them at their word. I for one am ready to do it. The public interest will not suffer, but I think will be promoted, by concurring in the resolution of the Senate.

It has been suggested that there is a large amount of private business on our Calendar, which requires attention. I differ with gentlemen, if any such there are, who believe that from this day forward to the middle of August there will be any business of importance transacted upon the Private Calendar. Why, sir, before we had been jaded out by public service, during the fall, December and January, and the whole six and a half months which we have already consumed here, we have been upon the Private Calendar but two or three times, at most but a very few times. Now we are here, with this hot season upon us. Disease is approaching, and the cholera is abroad. Men have been home, and are going home, and if we shall have a quorum at all, hereafter, it will be a lean, rickety, and staggering one, obtained only by calls of the House, or scouring the city by the Sergeant-at-Arms of the House, for the purpose of bringing members in. I, for one, want to do the public work. My friends about me desire to do it. I tender my whole services to do it. I have labored faithfully to have it done; and I submit that the most feasible way of doing it, is the one which I have suggested; for no work will now be done, until a day of adjournment is fixed. You can, if you will give your attention to it, pass, between this and the 4th of July, the appropriation bills. The Senate will be satisfied with the time fixed. But fix another time, and you will hear from them again, and they will say that six and a half months have already passed, and you have not sent us the appropriation bills. Now that they have fixed a time, with a knowledge of the present condition of business in both Houses, let us put our shoulders to the wheel, transact the public business, and adjourn on the 3d of July. I ask the House to take the Senate resolution into consideration, and if not that, then the proposition suggested by me some time ago.

Mr. HENN. I desire to ask the gentleman from New York a question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would suggest that the gentleman from New York should first submit his proposition to writing.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Ohio. I desire to make a single suggestion, with the consent of the gentleman from New York and the House. If the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. ORR.] will so modify his proposition as to make the two Houses of Congress adjourn on the first day of August, I will cheerfully support the resolution in that form. I believe we can accomplish all the business which it is necessary for us to accomplish in six weeks, and go home. I am opposed to taking a recess, and I think the country is opposed to it. I hope no proposition for taking a recess will be agreed to by the House. I repeat, sir, that I think we can accomplish all the necessary business of the session by the 1st of August, and I hope we shall adjourn at that time, and go home.

Mr. HENN. I wish to ask the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HAVEN,] if his proposition, which I understand to be, in substance, the same as the resolution which has passed the Senate, is adopted, whether we shall not draw our per diem during the recess? I understand the Comptroller of the Treasury has so decided.

Mr. HAVEN. It is precisely for the purpose of correcting what I deem to be an erroneous impression upon that subject, that I have held the floor. I will occupy the time of the House but a moment. I wish to say that the resolution of the Senate is a resolution to adjourn, and not a resolution for a recess, and it seems to me clearly, will not carry with it the pay of the members from the time of adjournment until the next meeting. If I thought it would, I would add a provision to prevent such a construction.

Mr. HOUSTON. I would suggest to the gentleman from New York, that if the House adjourns sine die on the 3d or 4th of July, it will not meet again until the first Monday of December next.

Mr. HAVEN. That is the very thing that this proposition is designed to change. I offer it as a joint resolution for the purpose of enabling us to meet in October.

Mr. JONES. Then it must go to the President for his signature, must it not?

Mr. HAVEN. Well, sir, it will save all question on the subject, if it receives the signature of the President. One word more and I have done. I ask that the proposition which I have offered may be read.

It was read by the Clerk, as follows:

Resolved, (the Senate concurring) That the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives adjourn their respective Houses on the 4th day of July next, at twelve o'clock, m., until the third Monday in October next.

Mr. HAVEN. That, sir, is the language of the Senate resolution with a single modification as to the day of adjournment, for the purpose of avoiding the question of order. It proposes to adjourn from the 4th day of July, until the 3d Monday of October. But, sir, it has been suggested that the proposition would carry with it the pay of the members during the recess. I repeat that I would not offer a proposition that would admit of such a construction, and it seems to me very clear that this will not. The same question has arisen in reference to the recess of the Legislature in my own State, and it was decided that it did not carry pay to the members during the recess. I think they are as sharp there for pay as anywhere. I do not think such a construction can be given to the resolution.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I should like to know why it does not carry pay just as much as does a proposition to adjourn over for a week, or to adjourn for three days. I would suggest, therefore, to the gentleman from New York, that he add a proviso to the resolution that the provision of law fixing the time for the meeting of Congress shall be changed from the first Monday in December to the third Monday in October, and that the phraseology of the resolution be so modified as to provide that the members shall not draw pay during the vacation. As the resolution now stands, there is no reason why the per diem should not be allowed.

Mr. HILLYER. The gentleman will allow me one word, and what I have to say will be in reply to the gentleman from Ohio. The difficulty in regard to members drawing pay during the temporary recess will be fully obviated if the House will act upon the substitute which I have proposed. And I think that will meet wholly the views of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HAVEN.] I propose a final adjournment of this House on the first Monday in August; and the meeting on the third Monday of October will be the commencement of the next session of Congress; so that of course the members will draw no pay during the recess, and yet every legitimate purpose that gentlemen can have will be accomplished.

Now, I would suggest to the gentleman from New York, and to every member concurring with us, that the proper course for us to pursue in order to accomplish what we desire, will be to vote down the proposition of the gentleman from South Carolina; then to suspend the rules in order to take up the joint resolution of the Senate; and when that joint resolution comes before this body, it will be in order to amend it by changing the time of adjournment from the first Monday in July to some time in August, and changing the time for the meeting of Congress hereafter. Let us vote down, then, the pending motion of the gentleman from South Carolina, suspend the rules, and take up the Senate joint resolution, and the whole subject will be under the control of the House.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I move to add the following proviso to the resolution:

Provided, That no compensation shall be allowed members during the recess.

Mr. HOUSTON. Is the amendment of the gentleman from New York in order?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. WALBRIDGE] submitted an amendment to his original resolution. The gentleman from South Carolina proposes an amendment in the shape of a substitute. The amendment of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HAVEN,] as the Chair understands, is to amend the substitute.

Mr. HAVEN. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER. That is competent, if there be no further amendment to the original resolution.

Mr. HOUSTON. Does the Chair decide that on a resolution for adjournment it is in order to move amendment while an amendment to an amendment is pending?

The SPEAKER. The Chair decides that the original resolution, as the two propositions now stand before the House, is amendable. To the original resolution there is an amendment pending, which can only be amended at this moment. It is the amendment submitted by the gentleman from New York, the author of the resolution.

When the House shall have perfected the original resolution, then it will be in order to take up and amend the substitute offered by the gentleman from South Carolina. Both are amendable; first the original resolution, then the substitute. When you reach the substitute, you may amend it by striking out a part or all of its provisions, and then, as amended, vote it in place of the original resolution.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I would ask the gentleman from New York to accept, as a part of his resolution, the proviso which I have suggested:

Provided, That no per diem compensation shall be allowed members during the recess.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York has not yet sent his proposition in writing to the Clerk.

Mr. HAVEN. I desire first to inquire of the Chair whether there is pending a proposition to amend by my colleague, the author of the original resolution?

The SPEAKER. There is; and it is only for a change of time of the adjournment. The original resolution is to fix a time for closing the present session. An amendment is now pending to change the time as fixed in the original resolution. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. ORR] proposes an amendment, in the nature of a substitute for the original resolution. The Chair states that it is competent for the House to amend the original resolution; and having done that, they may take up the substitute.

Mr. HAVEN. Do I then understand the Chair to decide that the amendment I offered would not now be in order?

The SPEAKER. It is only in order now to amend the amendment proposed by the gentleman from New York [Mr. WALBRIDGE] to the original resolution.

Mr. HAVEN. Do I understand the Chair to say that there is an amendment in the second degree now pending, upon which we shall have to vote before any further amendments are submitted?

The SPEAKER. If the House will give their attention, the two propositions will be read, so that there may be no misunderstanding between the House and the Chair. The original resolution reads as follows:

Resolved, (the Senate concurring,) That the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives adjourn their respective Houses sine die on Monday, the third of July next, at twelve o'clock, m.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. WALBRIDGE] moves that the words "third of July" be stricken out of the resolution, and that the words "seventeenth of July" be inserted in their place.

The second proposition offered by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. ORR] reads as follows:

Resolved, (the Senate concurring,) That the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives adjourn their respective Houses on Monday, August 14, at twelve o'clock, m.

Mr. DISNEY. I desire to say but a word to the House in relation to this whole matter. In my judgment this discussion is premature, ill considered, and out of place. Gentlemen get up here and say in their judgment there is no doubt that the House would get through all its business at some time indicated by them. They do not mean by this that all the interesting and important business before the House can be disposed of at the time indicated, but they mean that all the business in which they individually feel an interest can be disposed of. This is what they mean.

All your committees are loaded down with matters which they desire to present to the House. My own drawer is full of bills upon the most important subjects. To be sure, they would not be of interest to my colleague, who spoke a moment since, but they are of deep and vital interest to many persons throughout the country, and many members of this House. I can understand the feeling which operates upon gentlemen, and engenders that impatience which manifests itself to get away from here at a very early day. But we were sent here to transact the public business, and not to consult our own pleasure or our own convenience. I say again, in view of the important matters pressing upon us for consideration, and awaiting our action, that it is ridiculous and absurd in the extreme for gentlemen to stand up here and say that, in their judgment, all these matters can be disposed of at a certain indicated time. They may say, and truly, too, so far as they are concerned, and so far as they individually feel an interest in them, that they may be disposed of by such a time.

The gentlemen upon the Committee of Ways and Means think that there is no legislation necessary in Congress except that of passing the appropriation bills, and that when you dispose of them it is time for Congress to adjourn. The act providing for the payment of the clerks and Executive officers of the Government is, in their judgment, the summum bonum of all acts of legislation. So, too, with the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HAVEN,] and other gentlemen, who have no business to be transacted here of any particular importance to their constituents, and therefore think that there is no business before Congress, although there may be bills to be disposed of in which the mightiest consequences to the Republic may lie in embryo. What care they? These do not, they think, affect their constituents, and therefore there is no business of importance to be disposed of! What they mean by "business," is some particular thing in which their constituents are concerned; some matter of a local character affecting their own evanescent popularity, their own ephemeral interests, or those of the people whom they represent. That is what these gentlemen mean by the term "business."

Now, Mr. Speaker, I understand that we were sent here for a very different purpose from all this. I believe that we were sent here to protect and to advance the public interests. We were sent here, not to exhibit patience or impatience at the work which we are called on to perform, and to consult our own inclinations as to its performance, but to attend faithfully and diligently to the business matters that may be legally and legitimately submitted for our consideration, and to give them that calm and proper deliberation which they require.

Sir, entertaining these views, and knowing, as I do, the amount of matter which is pending before the committees, and which the committees desire to offer for the consideration of the House, I can state that this matter cannot be disposed of in the time indicated in this resolution. I cannot, and no man can, undertake, in advance, to say the precise time when Congress can properly adjourn, after giving the due consideration to those matters which they are entitled to receive at their hands.

I understand that this resolution is now pending before the House. If a motion to lay it on the table be in order, I now make that motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DISNEY] cannot submit that motion unless by the consent of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HAVEN,] who yielded him the floor for explanation.

Mr. DISNEY. I understood that the gentleman has been up all the morning; and I supposed that I was at liberty to make the motion to lay it on the table.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood the gentleman from New York to yield the floor to the gentleman from Ohio for explanation only, and not to yield it absolutely.

Mr. HAVEN. I find that I have been damaging myself by allowing the floor to go to other gentlemen while I was entitled to it. I must not do so any further.

I could not hear very distinctly all that was said by the gentleman from Ohio; but I understood him to say that there is a large amount of public business which it is necessary should be performed. I think myself that there is business before the House which it is highly expedient should be transacted. But the question which I put to the House is, whether that business will be forwarded by our undertaking to prolong the time of our session. And let me ask the gentleman from Ohio himself, how much public business has been done or forwarded for the last two and a half weeks, while there has been no time fixed for adjournment? We have been waiting here day after day, and week after week, and have not had a quorum to vote on even a question of privilege, much less on questions of practical importance to the country. And such will continue to be the case until we come together again, after having separated for a time, and after having got into a more business state of mind.

Now, in regard to this matter, I am as desirous of performing the public business as any gentleman here can be; but this is not the way to do it. The

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

33d CONGRESS, 1st Session.

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 14, 1854.

NEW SERIES...No. 87.

Senate has tendered us the proposition indicated here; and if we take them at their word, they cannot complain. I am satisfied, too, that we should not do the business of the House in the intermediate time.

I desire now to ask the Chair whether the question to be first taken is on the amendment of my colleague [Mr. WALBRIDGE] to his own resolution?

THE SPEAKER. Yes; that is the first vote to be taken.

Mr. HAVEN. One question further. Is it in order for me now to submit a proposition?

THE SPEAKER. Yes, as an amendment to the substitute offered by the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. ORR.] which will be held in abeyance.

Mr. HAVEN. Then I desire to submit a proposition, and to let some other gentleman take the floor.

The proposition submitted by Mr. HAVEN was then read, as follows:

Resolved, (the Senate concurring,) That the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives adjourn their respective Houses on the 4th day of July next, at twelve o'clock, m., until the third Monday of October next; Provided, That no per diem compensation shall be drawn by members of the House and Senate for such recess.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I believe that every gentleman upon this floor will, by his professions, manifest to the country his disposition to work and to dispatch the public business. But, sir, I submit to you, and to all those present, how many, by their acts, have manifested a disposition to do the public business during the present session? Sir, we have spent the last ten days in idleness. Three days we adjourned—from Thursday, the 1st day of June, until the 5th. From that time to this, during the whole of last week, there has not been a solitary day in which there was a working quorum to be found in the House. Upon one solitary occasion, upon a call of the House, a quorum answered to their names; and then, when the roll was called upon the pending question, there was less than a quorum, and the House adjourned in consequence.

Sir, it is time now, if we had worked up to the present time, that this session should have terminated, and we should have returned to our homes. But we have idled away the time thus far, and that is no good reason why we should now go off, without doing the important business of the session, and without the transaction of which the interests of the country must materially suffer. One attempt made upon the present occasion is, perhaps, like too many others made in this House, and that is, to do two things at once—to adjourn the present session of Congress, and provide for the meeting of the next. The Constitution provides "that Congress shall assemble at least once in every year, and such meeting shall be on the first Monday in December, unless they shall, by law, appoint a different day."

Now, the Constitution fixes a day of meeting; and if Congress wishes to change that day, they must do it by the enactment of a law. That law will require the approval of the President before it will be effective. A simple resolution of adjournment, or for closing the session, does not require such signature.

The resolution from the Senate is a mere proposition for a recess—that you shall adjourn in July, and meet on the third Monday of October. Now, the law of 1818, regulating and prescribing the compensation of members, provides that they shall receive eight dollars per day for each day they shall attend. When you take a recess of three days, the members receive that compensation. If, by joint resolution, Congress take a recess of one or two weeks, members draw their pay, and I understand it is the opinion of the controlling officer of the Treasury, that if this Congress shall take a recess until October, or for any other period of time, under the law members will be entitled to their per diem. If we adopt the Senate resolution to adjourn on the 3d of July, and to meet again on the third Monday of October, it will be a continuance of this present session; and it will then be continued, I presume, until Saturday preceding the first Monday of December next.

It will be well for members to look to the law, and see what they are doing, before they adopt that resolution. There is a proviso to the law of 1818, which says:

"Provided always, That no Representative or Delegate shall be allowed a sum exceeding the rate of eight dollars a day from the end of one session to the time of his taking his seat in another."

If you adjourn, therefore, or take a recess from the 4th of July to the 3d Monday in October, the members of Congress, as I understand it, will, under the decision of the Comptroller of the Treasury, be entitled to their per diem during the recess. But I hope the proposition of the gentleman from New York will not be adopted. I hope the House will not take a recess, but that we shall adopt the substitute of the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. ORR.] and adjourn sine die on the 14th of August. I think it is probable that we can get through with most of the business of the session by that time; and if not, let us pass the resolution, and the Senate will have it in their power to extend the session to such time as will enable us to accomplish what it is necessary for us to do before we adjourn sine die. I shall, therefore, be willing, as far as I am concerned, to fix that day, and I hope the House will at least fix some day in August for bringing the session to a final close.

I repeat, sir, that I do not wish to take a recess. It will be setting a new precedent, which I think we had better not set. Let us fix the day for the final adjournment, and then if gentlemen desire to fix an earlier day for the meeting of the next session, or for the meeting of subsequent sessions of Congress, let a bill be introduced for that purpose; let it be passed through Congress, and let it go to the President for his signature. That, in my opinion, will be doing the thing as it should be done. Let us fix the day for adjournment by one resolution, and fix the day for the commencement of another session by a separate proposition—by a law introduced and passed through Congress in the regular form, as the Constitution requires, if it should be found desirable to meet at an earlier day than that fixed by the Constitution. For myself, I believe the first Monday in December is early enough for the meeting of the second session of a Congress. If we should meet on the third Monday in October, my opinion, based upon my experience, is, that we should transact no business until after Christmas, or after the 1st of January. You will do quite as much by meeting on the first Monday in December as on the third Monday in October.

Mr. HILLYER. I desire to ask the gentleman from Tennessee a question. I understood him to say, from experience, that Congress would do no more by meeting on the third Monday in October than by meeting on the first Monday in December. I ask that gentleman if he has ever had any experience in sessions that commenced on the third Monday in October?

Mr. JONES. No, sir.

Mr. HILLYER. Then the gentleman can have no experience of the fact of which he speaks.

Mr. JONES. My experience is, that Congress never does any business until after the Christmas holidays.

Mr. HILLYER. It is for that very reason that I want the session to commence earlier.

Mr. JONES. Well, sir, I think if we were to meet in the middle of October, the time until after Christmas would be spent in pretty much the same way that it now is from the first Monday in December. We should, perhaps, adjourn over every week from Thursday until Monday. How has it been during the present session of Congress? The House adjourned, if I recollect rightly, every week, before the 1st of January, from Thursday till the Monday following; and since that time we have adjourned every week from Friday till Monday, with two or three exceptions. The House did set on two or three Saturdays while the Nebraska bill was under consideration; but, if my recollection serves me right, they are the only ones during the session. Nothing of less importance than that bill could induce us to remain in session upon Saturday.

A MEMBER. We sat last Saturday.

Mr. JONES. Yes, sir, and with about sixty or seventy members present. And why did you meet here last Saturday? Because you could not get a quorum on Thursday or Friday to adjourn over until Monday. [Laughter.] I hope that the proposition for a recess may be voted down, and that there may be fixed a day for adjournment sine die.

Mr. KEITT obtained the floor, and yielded to

Mr. EWING. Is it in order to move to lay the substitute and amendments to the substitute upon the table? If it be, that motion will bring us to a vote on the original resolution.

THE SPEAKER. It would not alter the position of the original resolution, and the amendments to it, if the House chose to lay the substitute and the amendments to it upon the table. Those matters would be before the body precisely in the shape they now are. It is in order to move to lay upon the table; but the motion would carry all—the original resolution, substitute, amendments, and all.

Mr. EWING. My object was to bring the House to a vote on the original resolution for an adjournment sine die in July. I do not think that we can accomplish anything considerable at least by remaining here until August. There are a thousand reasons affecting the House, and affecting members individually, which seem to me to render it impossible for us to accomplish any more business during this session. It may be very desirable that we should; but in the languor which succeeds an unusual excitement there is always an indisposition to labor—a want of interest in the every-day legislation of the country. Besides, members are looking, some of them anxiously, towards home about the next election. [Laughter.] They are consulting, as it is proper they should, their constituents—as some perhaps did not do so before the passage of the Nebraska bill—as to whether they did right in passing it. [Renewed laughter.] This is of interest to them; and if it happens to be more interesting than bills for land grants, or even bills for just private claims, we cannot help it. Such is the condition of things, and such is the inevitable feeling of members.

The gentleman from Tennessee has illustrated this strikingly. He has shown, or rather reminded us, that we have not been able recently to do anything; and I do not see much prospect of our accomplishing more than we have during the remainder of this session. If we determine to close the session in July, we shall feel the necessity of passing the appropriation bills, however desirable it may be, at least to a portion of the members, to pass bills for private claims, land grants, and divers other bills. We shall have to defer them to the next session of this Congress, or, possibly, to another Congress, which will come here, it is to be hoped, under different auspices, and more favorably inclined to practical legislation.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that if we do not close this debate in some form or the other, that before the resolution is acted on we shall have to postpone the day of adjournment into September. Unless we close it, I do not think we shall get through with it before the day fixed arrives. [Laughter.] My object was, with this simple explanation, if practicable, to have closed debate by moving to lay the substitute, and the amendments to it, upon the table. As that is not practicable, I shall not further occupy the floor.

Mr. HILLYER. It is not my purpose to discuss the resolution further.

THE SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Kentucky submit the motion that the resolution and amendments do lie upon the table?

Mr. EWING. No, sir. I would simply ask, however, as I owed the floor to the courtesy of the gentleman from South Carolina, whether the gentleman from Georgia has not already spoken twice on this subject?

The SPEAKER. He has not spoken at all on the question. He has had the floor yielded to him merely for explanation.

Mr. KEITT. I have no objection to the gentleman from Georgia proceeding with his remarks.

Mr. HILLYER. I do not propose to consume the time of the House by further discussing the question. My object is simply to state, that I desire at some future day to submit the resolution I have already indicated; and for the purpose of enabling me to do it, I move to lay the resolution and the various amendments upon the table.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Upon that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered. The question was then taken; and there were—yeas 56, nays 97; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Aiken, James C. Allen, Ashe, Belcher, Bell, Boyce, Bridges, Caskey, Chastain, Clark, Cobb, Colquitt, Disney, Dunbar, Edmundson, Everhart, Fuller, Goode, Green, Henn, Hillyer, Hughes, Ingersoll, Roland Jones, Keitt, Lamb, Letcher, Lindsey, McCulloch, McMullin, Maxwell, Milson, Murray, Nichols, Parker, Bishop Perkins, John Perkins, Powell, Riddle, Thomas Ritchey, Rogers, Ruffin, Sabin, Seward, Shannon, Singleton, Skelton, Gerrit Smith, Richard H. Stanton, Hestor L. Stevens, Stratton, Straub, Andrew Stuart, Thurston, Upham, and Vail—56.

NAYS—Messrs. Abernethy, Willis Allen, Appleton, Ball, Barry, Benson, Bocock, Breckinridge, Brooks, Bugg, Campbell, Carpenter, Caruthers, Chandler, Chrisman, Churchwell, Clingman, Cook, Corwin, Cox, Crocker, Curtis, Cutting, John G. Davis, Dawson, Dick, Dowdell, Drumm, Dunham, Edmunds, Thomas D. Eliot, John M. Elliott, Ellison, English, Etheridge, Ewing, Gamble, Giddings, Goodrich, Greenwood, Hamilton, Aaron Harlan, Andrew J. Harlan, Hastings, Haven, Hendricks, Hiestor, Hill, Houston, Howe, Hunt, Johnson, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Kidwell, Knox, Latham, Lindley, May, Meacham, John G. Miller, Smith Miller, Morgan, Morrison, Norton, Andrew Oliver, Mordecai Oliver, Orr, Pennington, Phelps, Preston, Pringle, Puryear, Ready, David Ritchie, Robbins, Russell, Sage, Sapp, Shaw, Samuel A. Smith, William Smith, William R. Smith, George W. Smyth, Frederick P. Stanton, Alexander H. Stephens, John L. Taylor, Nathaniel G. Taylor, Trout, Walbridge, Walley, Warren, Israel Washburn, Tappan Wentworth, Westbrook, Daniel B. Wright, and Hendrick B. Wright—97.

So the House refused to lay the resolution upon the table.

Mr. KEITT. I desire that the House shall adjourn at the earliest day compatible with the discharge of our public duties. My experience in legislative bodies at home, which runs over a good many years, advises me, that when a reasonable time is fixed, the labors and business of the session are adapted to the time appointed. I am therefore in favor of fixing a reasonable time for adjournment, a day within which the public business can be expeditiously transacted. Now, sir, let us see what we have to do. The appropriation bills are yet untouched, and none have ever yet passed without long debate and a protracted struggle. I cannot say that I regret this, because the money power in a Government is the most dangerous and absorbing of all powers. Then a very considerable portion of the session must be consumed in the discussion of the appropriation bills. Is there no other business of importance before us?

I understand, sir, that the Democratic party came into power with the principle of free trade inscribed upon its flag. Now, sir, what has been done to carry out this principle? Nothing, literally nothing. Should it not do something? Most certainly it should, unless its creed be only a delusion, and its only object be spoils. The Democratic party came into power by an overwhelming majority; and I wish to know, and, as far as my vote goes, I mean to know, if its professions about free trade are honest or not. Sir, if principles be with the party mere juggler's balls, to play a game of popular imposture with, then I desire the legerdmain to be understood, and the dupes to be only the juggler's dupes. Sir, if the Democratic party is based upon principles, let us see this by action. I am tired of mere professions. Let me say, also, sir, that no party, bloated by heterogeneous compounds, and corpulent with crude isms, can ever last long. Life waits upon health, and antagonistic elements carry death with them.

Sir, if the Democratic party is divided upon the great question of free trade, which was born here, and has subsequently carried its flag of triumph over almost all the globe, the country should know the fact. The Treasury is full to repletion; our great staples are increasing almost incalculably, and our resources in every phase are quickened with an energy unknown by any other people or any other time. Sir, we have made discoveries in everything but the practical application of the principles of government. We have explored the arcana of physical science, laid bare its mysteries, swept over tremendous ravines, and made the lightning play postman to the nations of the earth; but in government we have pursued only the broad thoroughfare trampled by the footsteps of every nation which has gone before us, of centralization, financial aggrandizement, and the spoliation of weaker interests.

Sir, let us retrace our steps, and recur to the earlier principles of the Republic. Let us adapt the revenue of the Government to its proper wants, and secure an economical expenditure. This can only be done by an entire reformation of the present tariff. This the Democratic party is pledged to; and I mean, as far as my vote goes, to make it redeem its pledges, or distinctly refuse to do so. I do not mean, as far as I can prevent it, that it shall shirk the question by an adjournment. I prefer to fix the day of adjournment about the first of September; though I think we had better postpone the whole question for the present.

Sir, let us look this tariff question in the eye, and see who of us are for a reformation of the tariff, and who opposed to it. For thirty years my section has been borne down by an oppressive system of legislative plunder; and it is time we should fling it off. The Democratic party is pledged to this, and let it redeem the pledge. Whenever the tariff is reformed, or whenever the Democratic party in this House distinctly refuses to reform it, I am ready to adjourn. I will not vote to adjourn that it may shirk this issue. If it is to continue to manipulate the masses with professions, and, by skillful jugglery, to ensnare, seduce, and delude, it shall have no aid of mine for any of these purposes. Professions seduce men; principles rally them.

Mr. HAMILTON. If I understand the position of the question now before us, it is open to no further amendments, and it is useless to consume the time of the House in further debate. I apprehend every gentleman is prepared to vote; and without desiring to cut off the expression of opinion upon this subject by any gentleman, I demand the previous question, and I hope that the House will sustain it.

Mr. ORR demanded tellers on the second.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. OLDS and CAMPBELL were appointed.

The House was divided; and the tellers reported—yeas 75, noes not counted.

So the previous question was seconded.

The main question was then ordered to be put; being first on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. WALBRIDGE] to his own resolution to strike out the word "third" and insert "seventeenth," so as to make it read:

Resolved, (the Senate concurring,) That the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives adjourn their respective Houses in die on the seventeenth day of July next, at twelve o'clock, m.

Mr. ROBBINS. Is there not an amendment to that amendment pending, submitted by the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. ORR]?

The SPEAKER. There is an amendment to it, submitted by the gentleman from South Carolina, but it is in the nature of a substitute.

The question was taken on the amendment; and it was not agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is now on the amendment to the substitute offered by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HAVEN], which is as follows:

Resolved, (the Senate concurring,) That the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives adjourn their respective Houses on the fourth day in July next, at twelve o'clock, m., until the third Monday in October next: Provided, That no per diem compensation shall be drawn by members of the House and Senate for such recess.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will now read the proposition of the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. ORR].

The substitute was read, as follows:

Resolved, (the Senate concurring,) That the President of the Senate, and the Speaker of the House of Representatives, adjourn their respective Houses on Monday, August 14th, at twelve o'clock, m.

Mr. LETCHER. I would like to inquire of the gentleman who offered that amendment, why mileage was not inserted in it as well as per diem?

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I would ask the Chair how that got in?

The SPEAKER. It got in under the ruling of the Chair at the time that it was in order to amend the substitute proposed to the original resolution. There were various questions before the Chair made the decision.

Mr. JONES. The ruling would be undoubtedly correct where the original proposition had been disposed of; but certainly, I think, the Chair will see that the amendment to the substitute was not in order while there could be still an amendment to the original proposition.

The SPEAKER. The Chair refers the gentleman from Tennessee to cases of this sort where the same decision as that made by the Chair in this case, has been made. There was such a decision made here this moment, when an amendment was offered to the substitute. In respect to the question whether an amendment to an amendment can be held in abeyance, the Chair decided that it could be so held; and so did Mr. Cobb and others of my predecessors decide.

Mr. DRUM. I ask for the yeas and nays upon the substitute, and not upon the amendment.

The SPEAKER. It is not in order to make that demand until the amendment is disposed of. The question now is upon the amendment.

Mr. LETCHER. Will it be in order to move an amendment to that—to add "mileage" after the "per diem"?

The SPEAKER. It will not, as the previous question has been seconded.

Mr. HAVEN. I ask for the yeas and nays upon the adoption of the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was then taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 46, nays 110; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Appleton, Ball, Benson, Campbell, Carpenter, Clingman, Cook, Corwin, Crocker, Dick, Edmunds, Everhart, Giddings, Goodrich, Greenwood, Aaron Harlan, Haven, Howe, Hunt, Ingersoll, Knox, Latham, McCulloch, McDougall, Mace, Mayall, Meacham, Morgan, Norton, Parker, Pringle, David Ritchie, Russell, Sabin, Sage, Seward, William R. Smith, Alexander H. Stephens, Andrew Stuart, Nathaniel G. Taylor, Thurston, Upham, Walbridge, Walley, Warren, and Tappan Wentworth—46.

NAYS—Messrs. Abernethy, Aiken, James C. Allen, Willis Allen, Ashe, Barry, Belcher, Bell, Bocock, Boyce, Breckinridge, Bridges, Brooks, Bugg, Caruthers, Caskey, Chamberlain, Chandler, Chrisman, Churchwell, Clark, Cobb, Colquitt, Cox, Curtis, Cutting, John G. Davis, Dawson, Dick, Dowdell, Drumm, Dunbar, Dunham, Edmundson, Thomas D. Eliot, John M. Elliott, Ellison, English, Etheridge, Ewing, Fuller, Gamble, Goode, Green, Hamilton, Andrew J. Harlan, Hastings, Hendricks, Henn, Hiestor, Hill, Hillyer, Houston, Hughes, Johnson, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Roland Jones, Keitt, Kidwell, Lamb, Letcher, Lindley, Lindsey, Macdonald, McMullin, Maurice, May, John G. Miller, Smith Miller, Milson, Morrison, Nichols, OLDS, Andrew Oliver, Mordecai Oliver, Orr, Pennington, Bishop Perkins, John Perkins, Phelps, Powell, Preston, Puryear, Ready, Riddle, Thomas Ritchey, Robbins, Rogers, Ruffin, Sapp, Shannon, Shaw, Singleton, Skelton, Gerrit Smith, Samuel A. Smith, William Smith, George W. Smyth, Frederick P. Stanton, Richard H. Stanton, Hestor L. Stevens, Stratton, John L. Taylor, Trout, Vail, Israel Washburn, Westbrook, Daniel B. Wright, and Hendrick B. Wright—110.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now recurs upon the substitute of the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. ORR.]

Mr. DRUM. Upon that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I call for tellers. Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. Cox and VAIL were appointed.

The question was then taken; and the tellers reported—yeas 71, noes 69.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The question then recurred upon the adoption of the resolution as amended.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I move to lay the resolution upon the table.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. Upon that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 64, nays 82; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Appleton, Ball, Belcher, Bell, Benson, Boyce, Campbell, Caskey, Chandler, Crocker, Dick, Disney, Everhart, Ewing, Fuller, Goode, Goodrich, A. Harlan, Haven, Henn, Hillyer, Hunt, Ingersoll, Roland Jones, Keitt, Knox, Lamb, Letcher, Lindsey, McCulloch, McDougall, McMullin, Mace, Mayall, Milson, Morgan, Murray, Norton, Andrew Oliver, Mordecai Oliver, Parker, Pennington, Bishop Perkins, John Perkins, Powell, Preston, Pringle, Puryear, David Ritchie, Rogers, Sabin, Sage, Sapp, Seward, Shannon, Hester L. Stevens, Stratton, Straub, Nathaniel G. Taylor, Thurston, Upham, Vail, Walley, and Tappan Wentworth—64.

YEAS—Messrs. Abercrombie, Aiken, James C. Allen, Willis Allen, Barry, Boock, Breckinridge, Bridges, Brooks, Bugg, Carpenter, Caruthers, Chamberlain, Chrisman, Churchwell, Clark, Clingman, Cobb, Colquitt, Corwin, Cox, Cutting, John G. Davis, Dawson, Dowdell, Drum, Dunbar, Dunham, Edmundson, Thomas D. Eliot, John M. Elliott, Ellison, English, Etheridge, Gamble, Giddings, Greenwood, Hamilton, Andrew J. Harlan, Hastings, Hendricks, Hiestler, Hill, Houston, Hughes, Johnson, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Kidwell, Latham, Lindley, Macdonald, Maxwell, May, John G. Miller, Smith Miller, Morrison, Nichols, Olds, Orr, Phelps, Ready, Riddle, Robbins, Ruffin, Russell, Shaw, Singleton, Skelton, Gerrit Smith, Samuel A. Smith, William R. Smith, George W. Smyth, Frederick P. Stanton, Alexander H. Stephens, John L. Taylor, Trout, Walbridge, Warren, Israel Washburn, Daniel B. Wright, and Hendrick B. Wright—82.

So the House refused to lay the resolution upon the table.

The question again recurred upon the adoption of the resolution as amended.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 82, nays 68; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abercrombie, Aiken, James C. Allen, Willis Allen, Barry, Bell, Boock, Breckinridge, Bridges, Brooks, Bugg, Caruthers, Chamberlain, Chrisman, Churchwell, Clark, Clingman, Cobb, Colquitt, Corwin, Cox, Curtis, Cutting, John G. Davis, Dawson, Dowdell, Drum, Dunbar, Edmundson, Thomas D. Eliot, John M. Elliott, Ellison, English, Etheridge, Gamble, Greenwood, Hamilton, Andrew J. Harlan, Hastings, Hendricks, Hiestler, Hill, Houston, Johnson, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Kidwell, Latham, Lindley, Macdonald, Maxwell, May, John G. Miller, Smith Miller, Morrison, Nichols, Olds, Orr, Phelps, Ready, Robbins, Ruffin, Russell, Shaw, Singleton, Skelton, Gerrit Smith, Samuel A. Smith, William R. Smith, William R. Smith, George W. Smyth, Frederick P. Stanton, Alexander H. Stephens, Hester L. Stevens, Stratton, Straub, John L. Taylor, Trout, Walbridge, Warren, Daniel B. Wright, and Hendrick B. Wright—82.

NAYS—Messrs. Appleton, Ashe, Ball, Belcher, Benson, Boyce, Campbell, Carpenter, Caskey, Chandler, Cook, Crocker, Dick, Disney, Everhart, Ewing, Fuller, Giddings, Goodrich, Aaron Harlan, Haven, Henn, Hillyet, Howe, Hughes, Hunt, Ingersoll, Roland Jones, Keitt, Knox, Lecher, Letcher, Lindsey, McCulloch, McDougall, McMullin, Mace, Mayall, Millson, Morgan, Murray, Norton, Andrew Oliver, Parker, Pennington, Bishop Perkins, John Perkins, Powell, Preston, Pringle, Puryear, Riddle, David Ritchie, Thomas Ritchey, Rogers, Sabin, Seward, Shannon, Andrew Stuart, Nathaniel G. Taylor, Thurston, Upham, Vail Walley, Israel Washburn, Tappan Wentworth, and Westbrook—68.

So the resolution, as amended, was adopted.

Mr. ORR. I move to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted. I desire to say that the words sine die are not incorporated in the resolution, because they are not at all necessary. It requires the action of the two Houses to pass the resolution. When the House adjourns on the day fixed it will require the concurrence of the other body for our meeting afterwards, until the time fixed for the meeting of Congress by the Constitution. I therefore move that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The question was taken; and the motion was agreed to.

HOOR OF MEETING.

Mr. HOUSTON. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That from and after this day, and until otherwise ordered, the daily hour of meeting of the House of Representatives shall be eleven o'clock, a. m.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I object.

Mr. HOUSTON. I move that the rules be suspended for the purpose indicated.

The question was put; and sixty-two voted in the affirmative.

Mr. ORR. I call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. VAIL and CHURCHWELL were appointed.

The question was again put; and the tellers reported—ayes 60—

Mr. COBB. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BALL. I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Pennsylvania. Upon that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was then taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 60, nays 69; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abercrombie, Ball, Bell, Benson, Boyce, Campbell, Carpenter, Chrisman, Clingman, Cook, Corwin, Dick, Disney, Dowdell, Edmunds, Thomas D. Eliot, Everhart, Ewing, Giddings, Goodrich, Greenwood, Aaron Harlan, Andrew J. Harlan, Hastings, Haven, Henn, Hiestler, Hill, Howe, Hughes, Hunt, Ingersoll, Keitt, Knox, Letcher, Mayall, Morgan, Murray, Norton, Andrew Oliver, Parker, Powell, Pringle, Ready, David Ritchie, Sabin, Shannon, Gerrit Smith, William R. Smith, Frederick P. Stanton, Richard H. Stanton, Alexander H. Stephens, John L. Taylor, Nathaniel G. Taylor, Thurston, Upham, Walbridge, Walley, Israel Washburn, and Tappan Wentworth—50.

NAYS—Messrs. Aiken, James C. Allen, Willis Allen, Appleton, Barry, Belcher, Boock, Breckinridge, Bridges, Bugg, Caruthers, Caskey, Chamberlain, Chandler, Churchwell, Clark, Cobb, Colquitt, Cox, Crocker, Cutting, John G. Davis, Dawson, Dunbar, Dunham, Edmundson, John M. Elliott, Ellison, English, Fuller, Gamble, Goode, Hamilton, Hendricks, Hillyer, Houston, Johnson, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Latham, Lindley, Lindsey, Macdonald, McMullin, Maxwell, May, John G. Miller, Smith Miller, Morrison, Mordecai Oliver, Orr, Bishop Perkins, Phelps, Puryear, Riddle, Thomas Ritchey, Robbins, Ruffin, Russell, Singleton, Skelton, William Smith, George W. Smyth, Hester L. Stevens, Stratton, Trout, Vail, Daniel B. Wright, and Hendrick B. Wright—69.

So the House refused to adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The question now recurs upon the motion made by the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. Houston,] to suspend the rules for the purpose of introducing the resolution which has been read. Upon that motion the yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HOUSTON. As the House seems to be very thin, I would prefer that the motion should go over until Monday next.

The SPEAKER. Is it the pleasure of the House that the motion made by the gentleman from Alabama lie over?

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I would ask the gentleman from Alabama to withdraw his motion. He must be certainly convinced that his resolution cannot pass, and we can save more time by sitting late than by meeting at eleven o'clock, when we should rarely have a quorum here.

Mr. HOUSTON. The gentleman from Georgia must know very well that I am here both early and late. I presented the resolution because I believed that it ought to pass.

The question was then taken upon Mr. Houston's motion to suspend the rules; and there were—yeas 78, nays 45; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abercrombie, Aiken, James C. Allen, Willis Allen, Appleton, Barry, Bell, Boock, Breckinridge, Bridges, Bugg, Carpenter, Caskey, Chamberlain, Chandler, Chrisman, Cobb, Colquitt, Cutting, John G. Davis, Dawson, Disney, Dowdell, Drum, Dunbar, Dunham, Edmundson, John M. Elliott, Ellison, English, Fuller, Gamble, Goode, Hamilton, Hendricks, Hillyer, Houston, Ingersoll, Johnson, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Kidwell, Latham, Letcher, Lindsey, McCulloch, Macdonald, Maxwell, May, John G. Miller, Smith Miller, Morrison, Mordecai Oliver, Orr, Bishop Perkins, Phelps, Puryear, Thomas Ritchey, Robbins, Ruffin, Russell, Sabin, Shannon, Shaw, Singleton, Skelton, Gerrit Smith, Samuel A. Smith, William R. Smith, William R. Smith, George W. Smyth, Hester L. Stevens, Stratton, Andrew Stuart, Trout, Vail, Daniel B. Wright, and Hendrick B. Wright—78.

NAYS—Messrs. Ball, Benson, Boyce, Brooks, Campbell, Clingman, Crocker, Dick, Edmunds, Ewing, Giddings, Goodrich, Aaron Harlan, Andrew J. Harlan, Hastings, Haven, Henn, Hiestler, Hill, Howe, Hughes, Hunt, Keitt, Knox, McMullin, Morgan, Murray, Norton, Parker, Preston, Pringle, Ready, David Ritchie, Sage, Frederick P. Stanton, Richard H. Stanton, Alexander H. Stephens, John L. Taylor, Nathaniel G. Taylor, Thurston, Upham, Walbridge, Walley, Israel Washburn, and Tappan Wentworth—45.

So (two thirds not voting in favor thereof) the rules were not suspended.

Mr. MILLER, of Indiana. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to take from the Speaker's table, for the purpose of having it referred, Senate bill No. 373, being an act "to ascertain and adjust the title of certain lands in the State of Indiana."

Mr. KNOX. I object, and move an adjournment.

Mr. MILLER. I ask the gentleman from Illinois to withdraw the objection, and allow the bill to be read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the appropriate committee.

Mr. KNOX. I withdraw my objection.

The bill was then read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. HILLYER. It is within the experience of every member of this House, that the short sessions of Congress do not afford sufficient time for a proper discharge of its legislation. I therefore move that the rules of the House be suspended, so as to enable me to introduce the following bill:

Be it enacted, That hereafter the day appointed, by law, for the assembling of Congress, shall be the first Monday in November of each year, instead of the first Monday of December.

Mr. HAMILTON. I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. DRUM. Upon that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. HILLYER. If the House now adjourns, what will be the position of my motion?

The SPEAKER. It will come up as the first business in order on Monday next.

Mr. DRUM. I withdraw the call for the yeas and nays upon the motion to adjourn.

The question was then taken on Mr. Hamilton's motion; and it was agreed to, and thereupon the House (at twenty minutes before four o'clock) adjourned till to-morrow at twelve o'clock, m.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, June 13, 1854.

Prayer by Rev. WILLIAM H. MILBURN.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Mr. WADE presented the petition of Frederick Denio, an invalid pensioner, of Jefferson, Ohio, praying to be allowed an increase of pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Also, the petition of Oakley H. Wright, of Rensselaer, Indiana, praying to be allowed a pension and one hundred and sixty acres of land, for services rendered in the war with Algiers, and in the war of 1812; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Also, the petition of Raymond Williams, of Lake county, Indiana, an invalid of the war of 1812, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BROWN presented the petition of M. H. Beaver and sixty-eight other citizens of Mississippi, praying for a mail route from Beaver Dam and Maxville, in that State; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. FOOT presented a petition of citizens of Burlington, Vermont, praying an appropriation for the purchase of a site, and the erection of a building for a custom-house and post office at that place; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. SHIELDS presented the petition of Jane A. Brower, widow of Charles B. Brower, deceased, praying a pension for the services of her husband in the Mexican war; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Also, the petition of A. S. Bender, praying compensation for his services as superintendent of the United States lead mines of the Upper Mississippi; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Also, the petition of Adolphus Allen, praying the extension of his patent for a water-wheel; which was referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

Also, the petition of Anne Royall, widow of Captain William Royall, of the Revolutionary Army, praying that she may be allowed and paid interest on the amount due her late husband, or for some other relief; which was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Also, the petition of Adam D. Steuart and others, officers of the United States Army, praying to be compensated for extra services performed by them in Mexico, during the late war with that Republic; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. BELL presented the memorial of Jesse D. Carr, sutler to the second regiment of Tennessee volunteers, in the late war with Mexico, praying indemnity for property destroyed by the enemy; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. PEARCE presented the petition of James H. Smith and Charles Stevens, praying indemnity for the loss of schooner Drumscale and cargo, wrecked at the mouth of the Patapsco river by striking upon submerged iron piles placed there by the Government; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. BENJAMIN presented the petition of Charles Parsons, of Louisiana, praying the issue of a register to the brig Amelia, under the name of Abby Frances; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Also, a memorial of owners and occupants of lands lying within the Bastrop grant, Louisiana, praying to be protected in their rights; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. RUSK presented a petition of citizens of the United States praying Congress to take such measures as will secure the liquidation of their claims against Mexico, arising from losses and damages sustained from the confiscation of merchandise by that Republic, in violation of treaty stipulations; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Also, the memorial of Rachel Herbert, praying compensation for extra services performed by her late husband, Nathaniel Herbert, deceased, while an assistant messenger in the Post Office Department; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. TOUCEY presented four memorials of persons engaged and interested in the navigation of Long Island Sound, and the adjacent waters, praying an appropriation for the erection of a fog bell at Saybrook light-house, in Long Island Sound; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CASS presented the following memorials, praying the adoption of such measures as will secure to American citizens residing or traveling in foreign countries the enjoyment of their rights of conscience and religious freedom:

Memorial of ministers and elders of Madison Presbytery, and citizens of Rising Sun, Indiana;

Two memorials of citizens of Cincinnati, Ohio, and its vicinity;

Memorial of citizens of Louisville, Kentucky; and Memorial of members of the General Assembly of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church, in session at Memphis, Tennessee.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion by Mr. HAMLIN, it was Ordered, That the petition of G. G. Cushman and the heirs of Thomas Bartlett be withdrawn from the files of the Senate, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

On motion by Mr. COOPER, it was Ordered, That the petition of James A. Glending be withdrawn from the files of the Senate, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

CHEAP OCEAN POSTAGE.

Mr. BADGER presented a petition of citizens of Wilmington, Raleigh, and various towns in North Carolina, praying a reduction in the rates of ocean postage; also a petition of inhabitants of the town of Newbern, North Carolina; a petition of inhabitants of Guilford county, North Carolina; and a petition of the inhabitants of the town of Wilmington, North Carolina, in favor of the same object; which were referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. MASON. I am requested to present to the Senate the petition of certain inhabitants of the town of Union, Loudon county, Virginia, asking for the reduction of ocean postage. I heard the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BADGER] present a series of similar petitions a few moments ago. I have presented one or two from the interior of my own State; and it is a singular fact that petitions on this subject should come from the interior. It so happens that the gentleman who sent me this petition, states in his letter to me that it had been sent to him by Mr. Elihu Burritt, with the request that he would get signatures, and send it to the Senate.

Mr. BADGER. That I understand to be the case in regard to those I presented.

Mr. MASON. I do not wish it to be inferred, in presenting these petitions, that I impliedly give any opinion upon the propriety or expediency of the proposed reduction of ocean postage. I ask that the petitions be referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

They were so referred.

Mr. GWIN. I have joint resolutions on the same subject, of more authority than the petitions presented by the Senators from Virginia and North Carolina. They are the joint resolutions of the Legislature of California, which passed both bodies unanimously, in favor of the reduction of ocean postage. I ask that they may be referred to the same committee, and ordered to be printed. It was so ordered.

Mr. COOPER presented a petition of inhabitants of Norristown, Pennsylvania, praying a reduction of the rates of ocean postage; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. GILLETTE presented a petition of inhabitants of the town of Wolcottville, Connecticut; and a petition of the inhabitants of the town of Bristol, Connecticut, praying a reduction of the rates of ocean postage; which were referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. EVANS presented a petition of citizens of Columbia, South Carolina, praying a reduction of the rates of ocean postage; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

REPORTS FROM STANDING COMMITTEES.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred documents in relation to the claim of Betsy Whipple, widow of Stephen Whipple, a soldier in the last war with Great Britain, to a pension, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for her relief; which was read, and passed to a second reading. The report was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Abigail Saunders, praying to be allowed bounty land as the widow of Joseph Davis, a soldier in the last war with Great Britain, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. SUMNER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Peter Amey, praying a pension on account of wounds received in the naval service of the United States, during the last war with Great Britain, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for the relief of Peter Amey, (colored man;) which was read, and passed to a second reading. The report was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom were referred the following petitions, submitted adverse reports thereon; which were ordered to be printed:

Petition of William B. May and others, citizens of Massachusetts, praying the enactment of a law authorizing certain invalid pensioners of the United States, living in that State, to draw pensions from the date of the injury received in the public service;

* Petition of Jane M. Rudolph, widow of Thomas C. Rudolph, late captain in the United States revenue service, praying for a pension; and Petition of John R. Preshier, praying to be allowed back pension.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. SLIDELL asked and obtained the unanimous consent of the Senate to introduce a bill for the relief of the assignees or legal representatives of Jacques Moulon; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

NEW YORK ASSAY OFFICE.

Mr. FISH. I have been requested to present the remonstrance of the Chamber of Commerce of the city of New York, against any alteration of the existing law with regard to the assay office in that city, which may affect its present efficacy. A bill is on the table against which this remonstrance is particularly directed. I move, therefore, that the remonstrance lie on the table.

Mr. GWIN. I will take this occasion to say that there was an omission in that part of the bill against which this remonstrance is presented, which is the cause of the opposition to it. It is intended by the Committee on Finance to have that corrected when the bill comes before us again.

Mr. FISH. Then, do I understand the Senator to mean that when the bill comes up, the two sections which are excepted will be stricken out?

Mr. GWIN. I will state to the Senate that the principal objection to the bill is that it gives to the depositors in the assay office, in the city of New York, only the right to redemption in bullion—in bars. The object of the bill was to allow them to be paid in coin, or refined or assayed bars, doing away entirely with certificates, and paying them in coin at the New York assay office. That was the object of the bill.

Mr. FISH. This remonstrance will reach even the proposition which I understand the Senator now to indicate as that which the committee will propose.

The remonstrance was ordered to lie on the table.

THE NEBRASKA BILL.

Mr. WELLER. I ask leave to present joint resolutions which have been passed by the Legislature of California, upon the subject of the Nebraska bill. I may be allowed to say that it is exceedingly gratifying to the delegation from that State in Congress, to find that their action has been sustained by the representatives of the people in the Legislature. These resolutions affirm the propriety of that bill. They passed the House of Assembly with only ten votes against them, and passed the Senate with an opposition of only seven votes. This, I undertake to say, is one of the most decisive votes that has been given by the Legislature of any State since the agitation of the Nebraska question. As the subject has been disposed of by the Senate, I move that the resolutions be laid upon the table, and be ordered to be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

HOOR OF MEETING.

Mr. HOUSTON. I offer the following resolution, and hope that the Senate will unanimously consent to its consideration now:

Resolved, That the Senate will hereafter meet at eleven o'clock, a. m.

Mr. BRIGHT and others objected, and the resolution went over one day under the rule.

Mr. GWIN subsequently introduced the following resolution, and asked for its immediate consideration:

Resolved, That from and after Monday next, until otherwise ordered, the daily hour of meeting of the Senate shall be eleven o'clock, a. m.

Mr. FISH. Let it lie over.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair will suggest that the Senator from Texas has offered a resolution similar to that.

Mr. GWIN. Then I withdraw mine.

PATENT OFFICE REPORT.

Mr. BADGER. I submitted, a few days ago, the Senate will recollect, a resolution to rescind the order which we made for the printing, by our printer, of certain copies of the agricultural portion of the Patent Office report, with a resolution ordering the simple printing of the same number which was contemplated by the resolution which I propose to rescind, for the reason which I explained at the time, that the resolution might be passed by the Senate after the modification of our existing law, made by a provision agreed upon by the two Houses in the deficiency bill, so that we might get rid of the question of the printing being done by our printer. It will now be done by our printer without putting the words in the resolution. As the work ought to be now in progress, I hope the Senate will take up, and dispose of those resolutions.

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolutions; which were as follows:

Resolved, That the resolution for printing certain additional copies of the agricultural portion of the Patent Office report, agreed to by the Senate on the 29th instant, be, and the same is hereby, rescinded.

Ordered, That there be printed for the use of the Senate forty thousand additional copies of the same, with the plates accompanying it, of which five thousand shall be for the use of the Patent Office.

Mr. BADGER. It will be necessary to modify the resolution by making it read the "29th of May," as we have now got into June.

The resolutions, as modified, were agreed to.

MEETING OF CONGRESS.

Mr. DOUGLAS, in pursuance of previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill providing for the annual meeting of Congress; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I do not know that it is necessary to refer the bill to any committee. It makes the annual meeting of Congress to commence on the first Monday in October instead of the first Monday in December, so as nearly to equalize the two sessions of Congress.

Mr. GWIN. I suggest to the Senator that he let the bill lie on the table, and have it ordered to be printed.

The PRESIDENT. That order will be made, unless it be referred.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Let it go on the Calendar.

AMENDMENT TO THE RULES.

Mr. BRODHEAD. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the 30th rule for conducting the business of the Senate, be amended by inserting after the word "standing," the words "or select;"

so that the clause will read:

—"or moved by the direction of a standing or select committee of the Senate."

I will read the whole rule:

"No amendment proposing additional appropriations shall be received to any general appropriation bill, unless it be made to carry out the provisions of some existing law, or some act or resolution previously passed by the Senate during that session, or moved by direction of a standing committee of the Senate, or in pursuance of an estimate from the head of some of the Departments, and no amendment shall be received whose object is to provide for a private claim, unless it be to carry out the provisions of an existing law, or a treaty stipulation."

It seems to me the recommendation of a select committee is entitled to as much consideration as that of a standing committee. I hope, therefore, as the amendment is one which is so obviously just, the Senate will at once agree to the resolution.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent.

Mr. ADAMS. I move to amend the amendment by striking out all of the rule after the word "law."

Mr. BRODHEAD. Is the amendment to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Mississippi in order? He does not propose to amend the resolution which I have offered.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair is of opinion that it is not in order.

The resolution was agreed to by a vote, on a division, of ayes 22, noes 12.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore signed the following enrolled bills:

A bill to authorize the selection of school districts, in lieu of the sixteenth sections, within the twelve miles square reservation, State of Alabama.

A bill to authorize a register to be issued to the steamer El Paraguay by a new name.

ELIJAH BEEBE.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. The Committee on Indian Affairs have had under consideration the House bill for the relief of the widow and heirs of Elijah Beebe, and directed me to report it back and recommend its passage. As it is for a small amount, as its payment has been so long withheld, and as the evidence is so very satisfactory, I ask for its consideration at the present time.

The Senate accordingly proceeded to consider the bill, as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to direct the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to the parties mentioned, $3,016—the amount of principal adjudged to be justly due, and owing to them from the confederated tribes of Sac and Fox Indians, by the Hon. Henry Dodge, Governor of Wisconsin Territory, and ex officio superintendent of Indian affairs, by his original certificate, numbered eight, given at the "superintendency of Indian affairs for the Territory of Wisconsin, Mineral Point, July 7, 1837."

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read a third time, and passed.

BOOKS TO NEW MEMBERS.

Mr. FOOT. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution which was called up some days ago by the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. JONES,] not now present. It provides for the distribution of eight copies of the pension and bounty land laws to new members.

The motion was agreed to.

The resolution was agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the joint resolution of the 24th of February, 1854, for supplying new members of the present Congress with all such books of a public character, and in the same proportion as were furnished to members of either House during the last Congress, embrace Mayo and Moulton's edition of the Pension, Bounty Land Laws, &c., in the proportion of eight copies to each of said new members; and that the Secretary of the Senate shall so understand and execute the said resolution.

THE UNITED STATES MINT.

Mr. FISH submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be required to communicate to the Senate copies of all quarterly or other accounts of the expenditures of the Mint, which have been returned since the 3d day of March, 1853; and also, a statement of the amount received or charged to depositors at the Mint at Philadelphia, since the 3d of March, 1853, for refining, parting, wastage, or other charges, specifying the amount under each separate charge.

INDIGENT INSANE BILL VETO.

The Senate resumed the reconsideration of the bill making a grant of public lands to the several States of the Union for the benefit of indigent insane persons, which had been returned by the President of the United States, with his objections.

Mr. CASS addressed the Senate against the bill, and in support of the veto. [His speech will be found in the Appendix.]

Mr. CLAYTON. I purpose to reply to the honorable Senator from Michigan on this subject.

Mr. MASON. The Senator, I presume, does not desire to continue the debate to-day. I move to postpone the further consideration of this subject until to-morrow, with the view of going into Executive session.

The motion was agreed-to.

ADJOURNMENT SINE DIE.

A message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. FORNEY, their Clerk, announcing that they had passed a concurrent resolution, fixing the 14th of August for the adjournment, sine die, of the two Houses of Congress at the present session.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On motion by Mr. MASON, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of Executive business; and, after some time spent therein, the doors were reopened; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, June 13, 1854.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. WILLIAM H. MILBURN.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

Mr. DENT. As I am about to leave the city on account of ill health, I ask the unanimous consent of the House to allow me to report a bill.

Mr. HAMILTON. Is it for the purpose of reference?

Mr. DENT. I wish to have it referred, and placed upon the Calendar.

There being no objection, the bill was then received, read a first and second time by its title, as follows:

A bill for the relief of Mrs. Mary A. M. Jones.

Referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and ordered to be printed.

PACIFIC RAILROAD BILL.

Mr. HAVEN. On some day last week I introduced a resolution to close debate upon the Pacific railroad bill. I do not know whether it was entertained. If it was, I desire to amend it so as to close the debate to-morrow, at two o'clock.

The SPEAKER. The motion was not entertained. The understanding had by the Clerk was, that the gentleman withdrew it for the time being.

Mr. HAVEN. I then move the ordinary resolution to close debate on that bill to-morrow, at two o'clock.

The SPEAKER. The business first in order is the consideration of the question of privilege raised by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GIDDINGS.]

Mr. CLINGMAN. There is evidently no quorum in the House at present; and I think it would be better to wait till there be a quorum, to dispose of that matter.

The SPEAKER. Then, by the unanimous consent of the House, that matter goes over for a moment. The motion of the gentleman [Mr. HAVEN] will be received.

Mr. HENN. I wish to appeal to the gentleman from New York not to interfere with the morning hour by making this motion at the present time. We have fixed a day for adjournment; let us, therefore, go on regularly with the business before us, and consume the morning hour in receiving reports from committees.

Mr. HAMILTON. The morning hour has not commenced yet.

Mr. HENN. But we ought to receive reports during the morning hour.

Mr. HAVEN. One thing at a time, gentlemen, and we will get on quite as well and as expeditiously. I propose the resolution to close debate on the Pacific railroad bill to-morrow at two o'clock, p. m. And I would say, in addition, that I do not choose to interfere in the management of that bill, as gentlemen who are very competent on that subject have it in charge; but if its discussion is to be continued, then I think it right to have the debate limited in accordance with the terms of my resolution.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I ask the gentleman from New York to withdraw his proposition, as I purpose to-day, after the House has gone into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, to have a final disposition made of the bill for the present, and perhaps for this session of Congress. I do not intend that it shall occupy further time of the House this session. Perhaps that will meet the views of the gentleman from New York, and other gentlemen.

Mr. HAVEN. My only desire in relation to this matter is, to keep the discussion within a reasonable compass, and to use the ordinary diligence in the transaction of business. This is a matter which can be readily disposed of. I had no desire to interfere improperly with the business of the gentleman from California. I therefore, for the present, withdraw my resolution, with the understanding that the gentleman from California will introduce a proposition for the final disposition of the matter.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I want to offer an amendment or substitute to the Pacific railroad bill; and to enable me to do so, I now move that the rules of the House be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. HOUSTON. Will the gentleman from California allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. McDOUGALL. I withdraw my motion for that purpose.

Mr. HOUSTON. If the gentleman from California desires to have a postponement of the special order on the Pacific railroad bill made by unanimous consent, the House is the proper place to have it done, and not the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. If the gentleman has an amendment or substitute to that bill which he wishes to offer, he wants to have it printed, of course. This he can have ordered by the House, and not by the committee.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Then I am authorized by the special committee on the Pacific railroad to propose the following amendment to the bill.

Several MEMBERS. Read it.

Mr. CLINGMAN. It is not necessary to have it read. Let it be printed.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I want to state the substance of the amendment. Its purpose is to limit the northern route by the same parallel of latitude which limits the southern route; that is, by the thirty-seventh parallel.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask the unanimous consent of the House to postpone the further consideration of this bill to the second Monday in December next.

Mr. PHELPS. I understand, Mr. Speaker, that the railroad surveys which have been made are not yet ready to be reported, and that, when they are presented, they will show the fact of the practicability of a route in which those I represent are interested, commencing on the border of the State of Missouri, and extending by the way of Albuquerque to the eastern border of California. I therefore hope the bill will be postponed until the report of the surveys already made shall be in the possession of the House.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection to the motion of the gentleman from California, the postponement indicated by him will be ordered.

Mr. HOUSTON. And the amendment just offered be printed?

The SPEAKER. Yes, it is so ordered.

Mr. COBB. Now let us have the regular order of business.

Mr. CLINGMAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the special order was postponed, and to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table; which latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The first business is the consideration of the resolution offered a few days since by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GIDDINGS.]

Mr. TAYLOR, of Ohio. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to make a report from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, that it may be printed for the use of members.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I object.

Mr. COBB. Let us call the committees for reports, and we shall get to it directly.

Mr. TAYLOR. I desire to make the report merely that it may be printed. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his objection.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I cannot do it.

Mr. RUSSELL, by unanimous consent, and in pursuance of previous notice, introduced the following bill; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands:

A bill to extend the benefits of an act entitled "An act granting bounty lands to certain officers and soldiers who have been engaged in the military service of the United States," approved September 28, 1850; and of an act entitled "An act to make bounty land warrants assignable, and for other purposes," approved March 22, 1852, to those officers and soldiers who served twenty days, according to the provisions of said act.

Mr. COBB. I call for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The business first in order is the resolution offered by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GIDDINGS,] a few days since. If it is the pleasure of the House to postpone further the consideration of that proposition, then the consideration of the report made by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. STANTON] is first in order.

Mr. HAMILTON. I demand the question upon the first resolution.

The resolution was read, as follows:

"Whereas, A. O. P. Nicholson, Esq., printer of this body, and editor and proprietor of the Washington Union, in his paper of this morning, has published an article most evidently designed to excite unlawful violence upon members of this body: Therefore,

"Resolved, That the said A. O. P. Nicholson, and all other persons connected with the Washington Union, be expelled from this Hall."

The SPEAKER. The pending motion is to lay the resolution upon the table; and upon that motion the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I desire to modify the resolution by striking out the words, "and all other persons connected with the Washington Union," so that it shall refer only to A. O. P. Nicholson, the editor.

Mr. HOUSTON. The gentleman has no right to modify it.

Mr. CAMPBELL. It evidently is still within his control.

The SPEAKER. The pending motion is to lay upon the table, and the previous question has not been ordered.

Mr. HENN. I inquire of the Chair if the gentleman has the right to modify his resolution?

The SPEAKER. He has, as there has been no action upon it, further than ordering the yeas and nays.

Mr. HENN. I understand that the previous question has been ordered.

The SPEAKER. It has not been ordered.

The question was then taken on the motion to lay the resolution on the table; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 100, nays 33; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Aiken, James C. Allen, Willis Allen, Ashe, David J. Bailey, Barry, Belcher, Bocoek, Boyce, Bridges, Brooks, Bugg, Caruthers, Caskey, Churchwell, Clark, Clingman, Cobb, Colquitt, Cook, Cox, John G. Davis, Dawson, Dent, Drum, Dunbar, Dunham, Edmundson, Ellison, English, Florence, Fuller, Gamble, Goode, Greenwood, Hamilton, Hastings, Hendricks, Henn, Hill, Hillyer, Houston, Hunt, Ingersoll, Johnson, George W. Jones, Kidwell, Kurtz, Lamb, Latham, Letcher, Lindley, MacDonald, McDougall, McMullin, Macy, May, John G. Miller, Smith Miller, Milson, Murray, Nichols, Olds, Orr, Peck, Phelps, Powell, Preston, Puryear, Ready, Reese, Riddle, Thomas Ritchey, Robbins, Ruffin, Seward, Shannon, Shaw, Shower, Singleton, Samuel A. Smith, William Smith, William R. Smith, George W. Smyth, Frederick P. Stanton, Richard H. Stanton, Hester L. Stevens, David Stuart, John J. Taylor, John L. Taylor, Nathaniel G. Taylor, Trout, Vail, Vansant, Walbridge, Walker, Wells, Westbrook, Witte, and Daniel B. Wright—100.

NAYS—Messrs. Appleton, Ball, Benson, Campbell, Carpenter, Chandler, Corwin, Crocker, Dick, Edmonds, Thomas D. Eliot, Everhart, Goodrich, Aaron Harlan, Haven, Howe, Knox, Morgan, Norton, Parker, Pringle, David Ritchie, Russell, Sabin, Sage, Gerrit Smith, Tracy, Upham, Walley, Israel Washburn, Tappan Wentworth, and Yates—31.

So the resolution was laid upon the table.

TREASURER'S REPORT ON BANKS.

The question then recurred upon the following resolution, reported by Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky, from the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That one thousand five hundred extra copies of the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury, on the condition of the banks of the United States, communicated to the House of Representatives on the 1st instant, be printed for the use of the Treasury Department.

An amendment was pending to add at the end of the resolution the words—

Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to authorize any charge for second composition.

Mr. HAVEN. I do not desire to debate the resolution at all, but it strikes me that the proviso to the resolution is in conflict with the law which was passed a few days ago. The law was, that the printer of each House should have pay for composition.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is reminded by the Clerk that the pending motion is to lay the resolution upon the table.

Mr. HAVEN. I did not intend to express any opinion upon the merits of this resolution, but it seemed to me that that proviso was in violation of the section of a deficiency bill which we passed the other day, in reference to the printers of the two Houses.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky. The gentleman from New York will permit me to say that that proviso will have no effect in the present case. The work has not yet been commenced, and, therefore, no expense has yet been incurred for composition.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I will state to the gentleman from New York that that proviso was attached because the printer of the House had been ordered to do this work; and if the form had been distributed, the work was not to be republished.

Mr. STANTON. I will state that the work has not been commenced, and therefore no extra expense will be incurred for composition.

The question was taken; and the House refused to lay the resolution upon the table.

The question then recurred upon the adoption of the amendment; and being taken, it was adopted.

The question was then taken upon the resolution, as amended, and it was adopted.

RECEPTION OF REPORTS.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky. I was accidentally absent from the House on Saturday on business at one of the Departments, when the committees were called for reports; I have a report from the select committee appointed in reference to employing military officers upon civil works. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to make the report, merely for the purpose of having it printed and referred.

Mr. ORR. Will it give rise to debate?

Mr. STANTON. Certainly not. I merely wish to have it referred and printed.

There being no objection,

Mr. S. reported a bill; which was read a first and second time by its title, as follows, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and, with the report, ordered to be printed:

A bill to restore the civil superintendence at the national armories.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Ohio. I understand that the gentleman from Alabama withdraws his objection to the report which I desired to make; I therefore propose to present it now.

Mr. COBB. Certainly, I withdraw my objection. I should not have objected at all if I had known the gentleman's object.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I want to know what the gentleman's object is.

Mr. TAYLOR. Simply to have it referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. I have been anxious to make it for some time.

There being no objection,

The following bill was received, read a first and second time by its title, as follows, referred to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed:

A bill to authorize the Secretary of War to purchase of the proprietor the building now in the occupancy of the Government, situated at the corner of Seventeenth and F streets, in the city of Washington.

Mr. HENN. I now call for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. Then the Chair will consider objection as having been made to all further propositions for unanimous consent of the House.

Mr. ETHERIDGE. I wish to state to the House that I was not in my seat on last Saturday, when, I understand, some reports were presented from the Committee on Military Affairs. If I had been here, I should have presented several Senate bills and reports, which I had then in my drawer. I have no personal interest in any of these bills; but it is perhaps due to the parties who are interested in them that I should ask the consent of the House to have them referred and printed.

Mr. FLORENCE. I wish to say that I am in the same situation, and that I desire to have the same indulgence extended to me.

There being no objection,

Mr. ETHERIDGE, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back bills, with the recommendation that they do pass; which were severally read a first and second time by their titles, as follows, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, made the order of the day for to-morrow, and ordered to be printed:

A bill to provide for three months' extra pay to the third regiment of Missouri volunteers;

A bill for the relief of Charles A. Wilgus;

Senate bill (No. 229) for the relief of Thomas S. Russell; and Senate bill (No. 308) for the relief of A. G. Bennett.

Mr. FLORENCE, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported back bills of the following titles, with the recommendation that they do pass; which were severally referred to a Committee of the Whole House, made the order of the day for to-morrow, and ordered to be printed:

Senate bill (No. 144) for the relief of Purser T. P. McBlair; and Senate bill (No. 35) for the relief of M. K. Warrington and C. St. J. Chubb, executors of Captain Lewis Warrington and others.

Mr. HOUSTON. Has the morning hour commenced?

The SPEAKER. It has not.

Mr. HOUSTON. Then I ask that it now begin.

The SPEAKER. By unanimous consent, the House agreed that the several gentlemen who indicated their purpose to do so might make reports from committees, and the Chair has been acting upon that order.

Mr. HOUSTON. I make no objection to receiving the reports referred to. I yielded my assent to the proposition when made.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is now merely acting under the order of the House.

Mr. BROOKS. I move that the House proceed to the consideration of the business upon the Speaker's table.

The SPEAKER. It is not in order to do so at this time.

Mr. PRINGLE, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported adversely on the petitions of Charles A. Grignon and Joshua Vandruff; which were laid upon the table, and, with the accompanying reports, ordered to be printed.

Mr. ORR, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported back Senate bill No. 224, entitled "An act for the relief of the representatives of Joseph Watson, deceased, with the recommendation that it do pass; which was referred to a Committee of the Whole House, made the order of the day for to-morrow, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

The SPEAKER. The question before the House for consideration is a bill of the following title: "A bill granting lands equally to the several States to aid in the construction of railroads and for the support of schools." If the Chair recollects correctly, the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. HAMILTON] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. HAMILTON. The consideration of that bill was postponed for four weeks.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is right, and the time to which the bill was postponed has not yet arrived. The question then first before the House for consideration is a bill of the following title:

PAY OF DEPUTY POSTMASTERS.

A bill further to amend an act entitled "An act to reduce and modify the rates of postage in the United States, and for other purposes," passed March 3, 1851, and an act amendatory thereto, passed March 3, 1852. There is a motion pending to amend the bill.

Mr. OLDS. I presume, Mr. Speaker, there will be no objection to my reporting from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads "An act regulating the pay of deputy postmasters." It has already passed this House, gone to the Senate, and been returned with an amendment. The committee recommend a concurrence in the Senate amendment with an amendment.

There being no objection, Mr. OLDS then reported the bill.

The amendment of the Senate was read, as follows:

At page two, line twenty, strike out all after the word "provided," and insert in lieu thereof as follows:

That to any postmaster of a distributing office at which the commissions, allowances, and emoluments, since the 31st day of March, 1853, have been insufficient to defray the actual and necessary expenses, and afford the postmasters the annual compensation derived from commissions at the office before said 30th of March, the Postmaster General may, in his discretion, allow quarterly from the date aforesaid, out of the postage collected at any such office, an amount sufficient to supply such deficiency: Provided further, That to any postmaster of a separating office, at any such office, whose commissions, allowances, and emoluments may be found insufficient to provide the extra labor necessary to a prompt and efficient performance of the duties of separating and dispatching the mails passing through his office, the Postmaster General may make such quarterly allowances out of the postages collected at such office as he may deem sufficient to compensate such extra labor. This act shall take effect and be in force from and after the commencement of the next fiscal quarter after its passage.

The amendment proposed by the committee to the Senate amendment was read, as follows:

After the word "labor" insert the following:

Provided further, That the commissions and allowances authorized by this act shall be subject to the provisions of the forty-first section of the act entitled "An act to reduce into one the several acts establishing and regulating the Post Office Department;" And provided further, That the Postmaster General may, in his discretion, dispose of any quarterly returns of mails sent or received which were made up previous to the 1st day of July, 1850, preserving the accounts current, and all vouchers accompanying such accounts, and the use of such portion of the proceeds thereof as may be necessary to defray the cost of separating and disposing of the same.

Mr. OLDS. It is necessary, perhaps, for me to explain to the House that the bill we sent to the Senate provided that the Postmaster General, in making extra compensation to the postmasters of the distributing and separating offices, should have reference to the amount that they received under the act of the 3d of March, 1851. The Senate struck out that provision, and inserted one leaving it discretionary with the Postmaster General to give them such increased compensation as will compensate them for the increased labor they perform. In striking out that provision of the bill, the Senate also struck out the proviso which had reference to the forty-first section of the general act regulating the Post Office Department, and which required the postmasters to return all over a certain amount of commissions to the general revenues of the Post Office Department. Our committee propose a concurrence in the amendment of the Senate, with an amendment restoring that proviso, making the deputy postmasters still subject to the forty-first section of the act regulating the Post Office Department. They do it for this reason: that although this amendment, if it becomes a law, may not repeal that provision, yet there is a doubt in the minds of the committee whether it does or does not. This amendment removes that doubt. The Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads in the Senate thought it did not repeal the provision; but it is the opinion of the committee of the House that it does repeal it. In order to place the matter in a clear light, it is now proposed to restore the provision. Mr. RUSK, of the Post Office Committee in the Senate, has agreed that it shall be restored, inasmuch as it removes all doubt. The effect might be this: if you do not restore the proviso making these postmasters subject to the forty-first section of the general act regulating the Post Office Department, the postmaster in New York may receive $60,000 or $70,000 commission a year. Under that section, he is compelled to return all over $2,000 to the general revenues of the Post Office Department. For the sake of safety, the committee of the House recommend the restoration of this proviso.

Then there is an amendment made by the committee authorizing the Postmaster General to dispose of the quarterly returns, after they have been a certain time in his office.

You passed a law of this kind, permitting these papers to be disposed of in the manner suggested, in the year 1845. It operated only up to that time. But they have again accumulated in the Post Office Department to such an extent that they have to be thrown into the entries and the hall, until they have become a nuisance and an obstruction. It is not necessary for me to say anything more on this subject; but I will send to the Clerk a letter from the Auditor of the Post Office Department, which explains the object of this amendment better than I can do it.

The letter was read from the Clerk's desk, and is as follows:

AUDITOR'S OFFICE, (P. O. D.) May 10, 1854.

SIR: Many thousands of postmasters' quarterly returns and accounts, made since 1st of January last, are lying upon the floors of the passages in this building, for want of room for them elsewhere. A like state of things existed in 1850, when Congress, in the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1851," approved September 16, provided as follows:

"And the Postmaster General is hereby authorized, in his discretion, to dispose of, to the best advantage, any quarterly returns of mails sent or received, which were made up previous to 1845, preserving the accounts current, and all vouchers accompanying such accounts, and to use such portion of the proceeds thereof as may be necessary to defray the cost of separating and disposing of the same."

In pursuance of that provision, the transcripts of mails sent and received were separated from the accounts and vouchers, up to 1845, and sold; thus making room for all quarterly returns received from the passage of that act to the first of the present year—and the sales amounted to about $1,300. I am informed by those in this office who performed the work of separation on that occasion, that a like disposition of the transcripts returned up to 1850 would make sufficient room to file away the quarterly returns for three years from the 1st of January last, by the expiration of which period the building will doubtless be enlarged. I therefore respectfully suggest, for your consideration, the propriety and expediency of your asking, at this time, for a similar enactment to that of September 16, 1850, herein quoted.

I have the honor to be, with the greatest respect, your obedient servant,

WILLIAM F. PHILLIPS, Auditor.

Hon. JAMES CAMPBELL, Postmaster General.

Mr. OLDS. I want to add, further, Mr. Speaker, I have been inquired of by some of the members here to know how far back this bill proposes to allow the Postmaster General to go, and increase the compensation of the deputy postmasters of the country. All the deputy postmasters of the country, except those in distributing and separating offices, will begin to receive their increased compensation from the commencement of the next fiscal quarter. At distributing and separating offices the bill gives the Postmaster General power to go back to the 31st of March, 1853, and to give increased compensation to the postmasters of such offices for that time.

When this bill was up for consideration in the House before, I demonstrated to the House that the postmasters of distributing offices did not receive sufficient compensation, under the existing laws, to pay for their office rent and their clerk hire, and the incidental expense of their office, by appropriating every dollar of their commission, without receiving a single cent compensation themselves. This being the condition of things, it was thought advisable to permit the Postmaster General to go back to the 31st of March, 1853—the time when the last act reducing the compensation of postmasters went into effect.

Now, permit me to say a word to my friend from New York, [Mr. HAVEN,] who, the other day, it appeared to me, made an ungenerous attack upon me, and so much out of his ordinary course of courtesy towards the members of this House, that I could not help being somewhat nettled by it, coming, as it did, from him.

That gentleman charges me with an effort to increase the compensation of postmasters from the time you discharged the deputy postmasters of the last Administration, or, in other words, from the time this new bevy of postmasters, the "hangers-on," as he calls them, came into office. The gentleman must have known, if he has investigated the matter, that on the last day of the last session of Congress we passed a law diminishing the commissions of postmasters. That gentleman must know that deputy postmasters, under the late Whig Administration, received a larger commission than we propose to give them, even in this bill now under consideration before the House. Even if you pass this bill, which increases their compensation twenty-three and one half per cent., they will not then receive within ten or twelve per cent. as much as they did under the late Whig Administration.

So far, then, from its being true that the increased compensation is proposed to be given to deputy postmasters because they are Democratic, precisely the contrary is true. I do not propose to give to these Democratic postmasters within ten or twelve per cent. as much compensation as was given to postmasters under the late Administration.

It strikes me that the gentleman, [Mr. HAVEN,] with his usual courtesy, should withdraw any such charge against the chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads. He knows full well that during the two last years of the last Administration—a Whig Administration—I occupied the same position, as chairman of that committee, as I now do, and that I cooperated cordially with the head of the Post Office Department in carrying out all the reforms he desired to make. We gave him an increased number of clerks, and recommended an additional Assistant Postmaster General, although we knew that the recipients of those offices would all be Whigs, and not Democrats.

I say that under this state of things, those charges against me come with bad grace from my friend from New York. I might retort the charge if I thought fit to do so. But I will not do it. I explained this matter fully once before. I explained that under the law of March 3, 1851; you required the Auditor of the Post Office Department, in settling the quarterly accounts of the deputy postmasters, to go back to the year 1851, and see what their compensation had been during that year; and that, in fixing their compensation, he should be governed by what it had been prior to the taking effect of the act of March 3, 1851. That Democratic Congress, in its liberality, gave the power to a Whig Postmaster General to increase the compensations of deputy postmasters beyond what it was when the act of March 3, 1851, went into effect, by twenty per cent. Such was the liberality of a Democratic Congress. But it was found to be utterly impossible for the Auditor of the Post Office Department to have any reference to what the compensation had been prior to the taking effect of the act of March 3, 1851, and consequently each postmaster had the power to make out his own account, and the Auditor was compelled to allow it as so made out, right or wrong.

It was the recommendation of a Whig Postmaster General to change the law fixing the compensation; and, in accordance to that recommendation, the last Congress—a Democratic Congress—did change that compensation. But the estimates which were given to the Post Office Committee were fallacious—not intentionally so—and the consequence was, that, instead of fixing the compensation of postmasters as we desired to fix it—at what it had been prior to the taking effect of the act of March 3, 1851—we reduced it thirty-five per cent. below what it was under the Whig Administration.

The fact is, that instead of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads having made an increase of compensation for a swarm of hungry postmasters, occupying the places of the Whigs who had been turned out of office, we have merely restored that compensation, not to what it was under the old Administration, but within ten or twelve per cent. of what it was then. That is the whole fact of the matter; and if the gentleman from New York had looked at the subject with the acuteness with which he usually regards every subject; if he had exercised that candor and forbearance towards me which he usually exercises towards other members of this House upon every question, he would not have made so unjust an accusation against me.

Why, sir, as I said before, I did not agree with the last Whig Administration in many of the measures which they indorsed, but that did not prevent me from cooperating with them in fixing the compensation to clerks and deputy postmasters, at a reasonable and proper rate. But, sir, I say again that the action of the Post Office Committee is not what the gentleman has stated it to be. It is merely to restore a portion of thirty-five per centum, which, in consequence of erroneous estimates furnished to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, was made by the last Congress in the compensation of deputy postmasters, and therefore the charge he makes against me is not true. I am satisfied, from his usual candor and fairness in reference to all other subjects, that if he had looked at the matter a little further, he would not have so unjustly charged me with an effort to increase the commission of a hungry swarm of Democratic deputy postmasters.

But the gentleman says that letters written by servant girls and serving men, containing testimonials of their affection to their friends in the old country, through my desire to increase the commission of this hungry swarm of postmasters, must be taxed from three to five cents for the purpose of accomplishing that object—for the purpose of feeding these Democratic postmasters, who have been brought into office during the present Administration. Now, sir, if the gentleman from New York wanted to show his superior affection to these servant maids and the serving men of the country, I should have much preferred that he should have taken some other channel, some other mode of showing it, than by attacking the Administration and the chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads upon this floor.

Sir, I think I may safely say that in every matter connected with the Post Office Department, during the present Administration, and during the last Administration, I have endeavored to steer clear of everything looking like partiality to the friends or the opponents of this Administration. Why, sir, no member of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads—and it is composed of both Whigs and Democrats—has dissented from a concurrence in the reports of that committee in relation to the measures which they have recommended to the House. We have had the utmost harmony in our action during the late Administration, and during the present Administration, among both Whig and Democratic members. Such has been our desire to make the administration of this Department a national administration, and to steer clear of all political considerations, that nothing can be more unjust than the charge of the gentleman from New York; and if he exercises the candor and fairness on this occasion, which it is his custom to exercise on all occasions, he will withdraw it fully and entirely.

Mr. HAVEN. I have but a few words to say in answer to my friend from Ohio. I think I may call him so. He is right when he says that he believes that I had no intention or desire to charge him unfairly. Certainly I have not intended so to charge him. Perhaps the language which I used on the occasion referred to by him may be regarded as rather strong. I intended it should be somewhat so; but the gentleman will do me the justice to recollect that the language was used on the occasion when he was advocating a proposition then before the Committee of the Whole, to raise the compensation of a mail agent—a mere agent—from $1,600 per annum to $5,000 per annum, and that, too, over the recommendation of the Postmaster General, who, in the exuberance of his fancy, and the security of his power, dare not recommend it to be raised to over $4,000 per annum.

Let me state the whole case, so as to afford him all the strength which his position may gain by it—it may fortify him. The gentleman will recollect that I used the language referred to on the occasion, when he not only proposed that increase, but further proposed that it should go back one year, so that the agent was not only to get $5,000 per annum for the future, but $5,000 for the year which had gone by; thereby giving that single agent, that one man, $10,000 as mail agent, while the incumbent under a Whig Administration had only received $1,600 for one year, or $3,200 for two years.

Mr. OLDS. If my friend will allow me, I shall make one word of explanation.

Mr. HAVEN. Certainly, sir; to be sure I will allow you; and we will settle this matter amicably.

Mr. OLDS. The committee has now before it a proposition from the former mail agent in California under the former Administration, a Whig agent, that he shall be remunerated for his services by the receipt of the same compensation proposed to be given the Democratic mail agent. We of the committee shall treat him precisely as we have treated the Democrat. We shall give the former mail agent, who has lost in the discharge of his official duties under the Post Office Department, the same that we proposed in the deficiency bill for the Democratic agent.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Will my friend allow me a word?

Mr. HAVEN. Not now. I have only referred to this case of the mail agent incidentally, or, as they say in law, this is a kind of ancillary suggestion or proposition, pointing to the reasons why, on the occasion complained of, I had a right to feel a little indignant, and why I was betrayed into a somewhat warm expression of my feelings. The proposition to go from $1,600 per annum up to $10,000 came from the gentleman from Ohio. Let that be borne in mind, sir. Really, I did no more expect such a monstrous proposition from him than he did the remarks which fell from me, in the heat of debate, in answer to it. So far as expectations and surprise are concerned, then, he will allow me to say that he may set his off against mine, and it will leave a large balance in my favor. When I was talking on that subject at the time complained of, it was for the purpose of endeavoring to convince the Committee of the Whole that they ought not to entertain the gentleman's proposition. The committee, as well as the House, sustained the views which I entertained and advocated on that occasion, and we kept the proposition where I desired it.

Mr. OLDS. It was put on in the House by yeas and nays.

Mr. HAVEN. I was wrong, Mr. Speaker, when I said that the committee, as well as the House, sustained the views I advocated on that occasion. I remember, now, the committee voted with me to reject it, and reported against it to the House; and I thank the gentleman for the suggestion, for it reminds me of a little piece of small party machinery (I do not intend to speak offensively) when we went into the House, by which the gentleman and his friends succeeded in getting the appropriation back again into the bill the next day for their friend, the mail agent, without the responsibility of putting themselves on record by yeas and nays.

I hope my friend from Ohio will excuse me for these remarks now, as he has kindly done in reference to those on the former occasion. But the House will remember that my colleague from New York city, [Mr. WHEELER,] after the yeas and nays had been refused, by some sleight of hand trick on that mail agent item, moved a reconsideration of the vote taken on it by tellers, on which reconsideration I called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered. On taking them, the motion to reconsider failed by two or three votes, which my Democratic friends screwed up their courage to withhold, as it was not a vote square upon the naked proposition to give the man the $10,000. And it was by that kind of machinery that the amendment was inserted in the bill, and a direct vote on the record in reference to it avoided. It was on that occasion, and it was in reference to a transaction of that kind, that I was addressing the House when I made the remarks to which exception is now taken. Perhaps my remarks were a little fervid, slightly florid, more so than I desire to make them upon this occasion. I wish to know, Mr. Speaker, if I was not justified in my remarks then, under the circumstances, to the entire extent as the gentleman understood them.

I deem it best now, Mr. Speaker, to point out to my friend from Ohio the extent to which I think I was justified in what I said of postmasters and mail agents, and officers under the last and the present Administrations; and I will incidentally notice what he has now said on the same subject.

I do not propose to stop and discuss the matter here at any length. If there were abuses in the Post Office Department committed under the last Administration, which I deny, and which the gentleman has failed both to assert and to prove, I have nothing to say by way of extenuation. Sir, some of the members of the last Administration were my personal friends. Its distinguished head was, and is, an honest and a pure man. If Administrations that succeed that one shall be able to leave office with the country as prosperous, with the people as contented and happy, and with sentiments as firmly attached to the Union, with as few abuses in office, and as much general respect, it will, in my judgment, be happy for the country, and highly honorable to the incumbents. But, sir, I say if such abuses did exist, I did not wink at them, nor did they have my sanction or my vote. I am willing to leave it to the gentleman from Ohio himself to pronounce judgment upon my votes in the last or the present Congress. I have voted for the right and against the wrong, to the best of my judgment, unawed and undisturbed by those about me.

Mr. Speaker, it was a Democratic House and Senate that passed the act of the 3d of March, 1853, to which the gentleman refers. Such a House and such a Senate had that matter under their control, and the gentleman will excuse me for reminding him of the fact. He says that that House and that Senate passed, at the close of the last Congress, a law which reduced the compensation to postmasters. I do not now stop to dispute or admit his allegation to be true, but I will assume it to be so, and that he is right in his statement. Now, sir, who passed the law? Under what cry was it done? What excuse was given to the country for doing it? Did not the gentleman have the benefit upon that occasion of crying extravagance against the Administration who so poorly paid its postmasters then, and is he not a little fearful that I shall raise the same cry against this unlimited increase of their compensation now? My friend says that his committee has agreed to report a bill to give the same compensation to the mail agent in California who preceded the present one, as has been given in the deficiency bill to the present agent.

Believing it wrong, as I most certainly do, to give the great increase of compensation which has been bestowed upon the present agent, I most certainly shall vote against giving a like largess to any preceding agent, Whig or Democrat; I beg the House to notice, however, that although the old agent's services were rendered before the present lucky incumbent came into power, yet under the adroit lead and generalship of my friend from Ohio, the present agent, good partisan as he is, has already pocketed his increase of pay, whilst my poor Whig friend has nothing better to live upon than the promise, future and contingent of a Democratic Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, with my distinguished friend at its head. How strangely, Mr. Speaker, some things work; and how unfortunate that my friend from Ohio should have no means of staunching his bleeding sympathy for the old agent, except a liberal promise. All his ready means have gone to the new Democratic agent.

I again assure the gentleman from Ohio I have no desire to attack him, or speak unkindly of him, or of any other member of this House; but my friend seems desirous of having these things frankly talked down this morning, and I am glad to meet him in the spirit in which he has met me, for I believe there has always been good feeling between us.

Another thing the gentleman complains of. He says I charged the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads with having recommended an increase of compensation, to commence from the time when the Democratic party, or the present Administration, came into power. If the charge is untrue, it is my desire to retract it; but, sir, I fear it is but too true. I will try the matter by the record, and that record is the gentleman's own proviso to this bill. I will read it from the bill itself:

"Provided further, That to any postmaster of any distributing and separating office, whose commission may be reduced below the amount allowed out of his office for the year ending 30th June, 1851, the Postmaster General shall be authorized, in his discretion, to allow such additional compensation as he may deem proper, such compensation to date and to be allowed from the 30th day of March, 1853."

Mr. OLDS. So I stated.

Mr. HAVEN. Yes, so the gentleman did state. And what he stated himself, is the very thing he complains of me for stating. For that is the very proposition I made, and I could not do otherwise; for it was so in the bill, and so the gentleman had to state it. Very well, Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman had reference to the bill before the House, and if he measures by the point of compensation referred to in the act of 1851, why does he begin the increase only after the 31st of March, 1853? Why, Mr. Speaker, if this increased compensation is just, why not extend it to the Whig postmasters who were in office prior to the 31st of March, 1853? I would like the gentleman to explain why he does not make the bill to go back in its operation to 1851 instead of to 1853? For beginning on the 31st of March, 1853, it will be noticed from thenceforth, the Postmaster General is to have an unlimited discretion over the public funds of his office, and may give these distributing gentlemen any sum he pleases.

As I said before, the machinery for disposing of these poor Whig postmasters who had been quietly discharged from that date, without unlimited extra compensation from 1851 to 1853, the machinery, sir, for taking off their heads was well oiled, sharpened, and put in operation by the 31st of March, 1853, and inasmuch as heads began to fall then under its operation, my friend will excuse me if I say, for no other reason on earth, but that it was fixed as the time when this unlimited extra compensation should begin.

Now, as to the question of the consistency of the gentleman, there are a few other words which I wish to say for his benefit. My friend says that we reduced the compensation of postmasters last session. Now, I repeat, I have not the proper information to enable me to say whether their compensation was reduced or not. I know a bill was passed, and became a law on the 3d of March, 1853. I thought it did not reduce the compensation, but of that I am not quite sure. But I do know that after the close of last session, this compensation was not as high as this bill of the gentleman fixes it. The same chairman of the same committee, who, on the 3d day of March, 1853, came into this House, and persuaded the House to cut down that compensation, if that bill did cut it down, now comes to the House and asks to put it back again; nay, sir, not to put it back again, but, as I shall show to the House, to give a larger percentage—a greatly increased compensation. Yes, sir, it is much increased under this bill without reference to the increased rates of postage provided for by the other bill reported by the gentleman.

Now, Mr. Speaker, by the act of March 3, 1853, the compensation to postmasters per quarter was placed, on all sums not exceeding $100, at fifty per cent. where the mail should arrive before nine o'clock at night, and not until after five next morning; and making it sixty per cent. where the mail should arrive in the intermediate time. This compensation is now put, by this bill of my friend from Ohio, at sixty per cent. in one instance, and seventy in the other, giving in each case ten dollars more compensation on every $100 received by the postmaster. So when the compensation ranges over $100, and is less than $400 per quarter by the act of March 3, 1853, the percentage was fixed at forty; but by the bill of the gentleman from Ohio, and which, upon his recommendation and under his auspices, the House passed, it is raised from forty up to fifty per cent. On sums over $400, and between that and $2,400 per quarter, it was raised from twenty-five per cent. up to forty per cent., being fifteen dollars on each $100. On all sums over $2,400 per quarter, I believe the percentage was allowed to remain the same. Then the commissions on distribution was raised from ten to twelve and a half per cent.; and this came from the same committee which is now asking the House to give the distributing and separating postmasters, whom I have indicated, any sum which the Postmaster General is willing to see them receive, without any limit or restraint whatever.

Mr. Speaker, that is not all. I propose to go just a step further, and see what my friend from Ohio is doing; for I told the committee, on the occasion of which he complains, that what we then had under consideration was not the only difficulty nor the only wrong. I said that the gentleman from Ohio, having succeeded in increasing the percentage to postmasters on the sums they now receive, his next step was to introduce a bill for the purpose of increasing the rates of postage. And just in proportion as he increased the rates of postage, of course he would increase the compensation to postmasters, over and above what they will get under this bill so increasing their percentage. Well, sir, the gentleman told us, and satisfied the House, that in this bill under consideration, increasing compensation, the compensation which he proposed would be satisfactory this time to all the postmasters—nobody was to complain after that; even the most hungry postmaster was to be entirely gorged and satisfied: satisfied, at least, until my friend could find another opportunity to persuade the House to give them another lift.

Now, sir, the object of increasing the postage, he says, is to make up some two million of dollars deficiency in the revenues of the Post Office Department. It does not change the rate per centum of the postmasters, he tells us. Very well, sir, if it does not, then you give to the postmasters, under this new bill, increasing the rates of postage, if it is passed, a percentage again. Yes, sir, an additional compensation upon the two millions deficiency, dividing it among them according to the amount of revenue collected by each. Now, sir, I ask, is not this doing it strong? Sir, it amounts to more than it may appear to members of this House upon the first impression. For instance, take a post office which yields a revenue of $300 under the present rate of postage, on which the postmaster receives sixty per centum, if the duties are performed during daylight, and seventy per centum if in the dark—for I notice that compensation goes up, with my friend, as you get in dark places, [laughter:] under this new bill, increasing the rate of postage from three to five cents, that post office will yield a revenue of $500. So that, instead of getting sixty or seventy per centum upon $300, the postmaster will get his sixty or seventy per centum upon the increased sum of $500, which the post office yields.

Well now, although when I made those remarks upon the deficiency bill, of which the gentleman complains, for the purpose of satisfying the House that it was unjust and improper to increase the compensation of that mail agent for California, and although I then only glanced at these things incidentally, simply for the purpose of strengthening my position there, I submit to my friend himself, [Mr. Olds.] upon a brief review of them here, if they do not make out a perfect justification, at least a good, reasonable justification, of what I then said?

I do not propose to stop and enter into any argument with my friend as to whose interest it is likely to affect, if you increase the rates of postage. I am firmly and permanently opposed to an increase of it. The gentleman was rather inclined to be a little facetious upon me because upon that occasion I alluded to servant girls and servant men, as those upon whom this increased rate of postage would bear grievously and heavily, and he rather intimated that my affection and good will towards servant girls and servant men would have been better exhibited if I had gone to him, instead of taking care of them and their interest on this floor and in the face of the House. [Laughter.] I have nothing to do with them, which I am unwilling, sir, to do in the face of the House. [Laughter.] Can my friend say as much? Sir, I know he can, and I acquit him of all design to injure or oppress them.

Now, sir, what I said about servant girls and servant men on that occasion, I deemed very legitimate and proper. My friend behind me from South Carolina told me, at the time, that I had carried him with me in a part of that reference. [Renewed laughter.] But, to be serious, Mr. Speaker, I referred on that occasion to various classes on whom the change would be a great burden, and, among others, I mentioned servant men and servant girls, as deserving persons, upon whom this increase of postage would be a great burden that their little hard-earned means would scarcely enable them to support. Sir, I wanted the committee then to feel that there were other interests here besides steam, and railroad, and corporation interests, and grants of alternate sections, which that legislation might affect unfavorably, although such other interests could not be heard upon this floor, or advocated here with such zeal as the interests of these other classes. And I hope my friend [Mr. Olds.] will not seek, hereafter, to put forth any improper innuendoes against me, or "whistle me down the wind" because I choose to look to those humble interests, as well as to those of greater magnitude, whether political or pecuniary. This is the long and short of the whole matter. This bill, in my judgment, ought not to become a law. The amendment of the Senate is worse than the bill; and I am opposed to it. I desire to say now all I intend to say in reference to the suggestions which the gentleman has made, as to the course which I took upon the former occasion, already referred to.

In my judgment, the amendment of the Senate ought not to be passed by the House. It is an odious one, take whichever horn of the dilemma you choose. If it is just, it should extend back to 1851. If it is unjust, it should not be enacted at all. I say the amendment ought to be rejected by the House, and the whole matter should be put in a shape where we can get at that proviso in the bill and strike it out, or the bill ought to be defeated.

I feel that I did not discharge my duty to the country in not rising to object to this provision when the bill was first before the House. I was on the point of doing it, and I recollect feeling unpleasantly because I did not, on leaving the House on that occasion. But the fact is, Mr. Speaker, the eloquence of my friend from Ohio quite overcame, for the time being, my disposition to oppose the measure, though my better sense returned to me as soon as I got into the open air. [Laughter.]

Now, sir, I object to this amendment of the Senate; and although I do not suppose twenty men in the House, and perhaps not ten, will stand by me, yet I will object to it, if necessary, and oppose it alone. I will vote against it, and will vote against every proposition of the kind that proposes to make such a discrimination in favor of the postmasters who have been appointed since the 31st of March, 1853, and stopping there. It is an unfair, and unjust, and, I believe, a very improper species of legislation.

First, the House increases the percentage of the postmasters; next in order, to increase the revenue of the Department sufficiently to meet these increased expenses, they raise the rates of postage, which has the effect of again increasing the compensation of the postmasters. Well, sir, having brought the House up to that point—and, really, there is nothing like training a House when a great purpose is to be accomplished—then it is proposed to go back and give this increased compensation to all the deputy postmasters, from and after the 3d of March, 1853, limiting it only by the limitless discretion of whoever may happen to be Postmaster General.

Sir, I object to all these propositions, and I object specially to this third one. I care nothing whatever about politics in reference to this matter one way or the other. I care not whether the discrimination will operate in favor of one party or the other. I have never allowed myself to be controlled by political considerations in my action upon measures of general importance. But, sir, I do object to this Senate amendment for the reasons I have stated, and I hope the House will not concur in it.

Then, again, I desire to call the attention of the House to another thing. This amendment vests in the Postmaster General enlarged, unlimited discretion, which ought not to be vested in that officer, with all his multifarious duties. The Senate amendment reads thus:

At page two, line twenty, strike out all after the word "provided," and insert in lieu thereof as follows:

"That to any postmaster of a distributing office at which the commissions, allowances, and emoluments, since the 31st day of March, 1853, have been insufficient to defray the actual and necessary expenses, and afford the postmasters the annual compensation derived from commissions at the office before said 30th of March, the Postmaster General may, in his discretion, allow quarterly from the date aforesaid, out of the postages collected at any such office, an amount sufficient to supply such deficiency: Provided further, That to any postmaster of a separating office, at any such office, whose commissions, allowances, and emoluments may be found insufficient to provide the extra labor necessary to a prompt and efficient performance of the duties of separating and dispatching the mails passing through his office, the Postmaster General may make such quarterly allowances out of the postages collected at such office as he may deem sufficient to compensate such extra labor. This act shall take effect and be in force from and after the commencement of the next fiscal quarter after its passage.

Now, I want the House to look once more at this mode of regulating the compensation of these officers. First you increase and regulate it up for those now in office, then you regulate and increase the rates of postage up, so as nearly to double the compensation first fixed. Then you propose to regulate it back to 1853 in favor of a favored few; and lastly, you propose to give the Postmaster General the power of regulating it, and increasing it up to any point he chooses. Sir, it seems to me that this is as far as human ingenuity can well go. We certainly ought not to confer this discretionary power upon the Postmaster General, or upon any Executive officer. We had better keep this species of power and discretion in our own hands.

But, sir, I had no intention of going into any elaborate discussion of this measure. I did not intend to have said anything at all upon the subject of politics; and I should not, if the gentleman from Ohio had not, somehow or other, rather coaxed me on, and seduced me into it. I will not detain the House longer; but will close by again expressing the hope that this bill will not be allowed to become a law.

Mr. OLDS. I trust that the gentleman from New York gathered from the temper of my former remarks that I treasured up no ill will against him for anything he had said. What I said was said in the spirit of kindness, and I assure him now, as I have always assured him, that I have appreciated his many acts of kindness, and have awarded him a desire to further wholesome legislation for the country, not only under a Democratic but also under a Whig Administration.

But, sir, I could wish the remarks which I have made to-day would have the same influence on the gentleman, the same soothing and coaxing influence, that those of the other day had on him when the House unanimously passed the bill.

I do not want the gentleman to go away conscience-smitten in reference to any vote he may give; and I think I could convince him, if he would listen to me, that the faults he finds against this bill have no existence in fact—none whatever. His main charge is, that the bill gives discretionary power to the Postmaster General to increase the compensation of postmasters at the distributing and separating offices to those who do not now, under present commissions, receive an adequate reward for the labors which they have to perform. His objection is, that you permit the Postmaster General, in his discretion, to go back to the 31st day of March, 1853, and do not permit him to go back to the 30th day of March, 1851. Now, if the gentleman will turn to the act, of 3d March, 1851, he will find, in that very act, for which the gentleman no doubt gave his vote—the gentleman says he was not here—very well, then. In the act of 1851, I say, that the gentleman will find that we gave the then Postmaster General precisely the same power proposed to be extended to that officer of the Government by this bill. We then gave the power to the Postmaster General to increase the compensation, not of the distributing and separating officers, but of all the deputy postmasters of the country, and how? He was to give them as much commission as they received during the quarter ending 30th June, 1851. No, sir, we did not stop there; we not only gave the Postmaster General power to give such increased compensation as would make their commissions what they were for the quarter ending 30th June, 1851, but to exceed even that amount by twenty per cent. That is what we did, sir. Under that provision, in that act, all the postmasters from 1851 to 1853, received that increased compensation. Distributing and separating offices were not only included, as in this bill, but the increased compensation was provided for all the postmasters of the country. Their compensation was increased to what they received for the quarter ending 30th June, 1851; and, in the discretion of the Postmaster General was to be still further increased by twenty per cent. These officers did receive that increased compensation from 30th March, 1851 to 31st March, 1853; but under the act of 3d March, 1853, we repealed that discretionary power. Under that repeal, up to the present time, the Postmaster General has had no discretionary power, and deputy postmasters, consequently, have had no increased compensation, such as was allowed from 1851 to 1853. Does the gentleman still contend that this bill deals unjustly by such deputy postmasters as held office from 1851 to 1853? Will he still persist in such assertions, when he is told that they did receive this extra compensation from the Postmaster General? If he will turn to the accounts of the deputy postmasters, he will find that those of 1851, 1852, and 1853, received thirty-five per cent. more than those who have held the offices since the 31st day of March, 1853. It is to remedy the injustice done to deputy postmasters by the act of the 3d of March, 1853, that this bill has been introduced.

There is no injustice in this matter. If you permit the Postmaster General now to go back to the 31st March, 1851, and give increased compensation from that time, you will do injustice by twice giving increased compensation; and by giving it when it is not needed. What is there strange in the fact that the same committee, that reported the act of the 3d March, 1853, should now be disposed to increase the compensation of these postmasters, whose commissions were reduced fully thirty-five per cent. by that act below what the committee and Congress intended? I state to the House, that the intention of the committee, the intention of the Postmaster General, and the intention of the Auditor of the Post Office Department at that time, was not to reduce the compensation of deputy postmasters, but to fix and establish it. Under the act of the 3d of March, 1851, the Auditor of the Post Office Department, with all his clerical force, could not settle the quarterly accounts of the more than twenty thousand postmasters. To remedy this evil, he recommended to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads to fix a compensation. He submitted his estimates. I said that these estimates proved his to be erroneous; and under those erroneous estimates we reduced the compensation of deputy postmasters full thirty-five per cent. below what it was prior to the 31st March, 1853.

In consequence of the erroneous estimates then furnished by the Postmaster General and the Auditor of the Post Office Department, we have been compelled to report this bill. I think, then, that I am sufficiently understood upon that point. The bill explains itself. I demonstrated to this House, when this bill passed the House the other day, that the large distributing offices, after paying clerk hire, office rent &c., were minus not only their whole commissions, but had to take their own money in order to meet the expenses of the office at the end of each quarter. I might take a post office in my own district, the one at Columbus, to illustrate. The deputy postmaster at that place, after paying his office rent and his clerk hire, and the incidental expenses of his office, found himself absolutely minus forty dollars at the end of the quarter, which he had to pay out of his own pocket, without receiving from the Government a single cent of compensation. It is to meet such cases that the Senate and House agreed to give the Postmaster General power to go back and allow postmasters in distributing and separating offices such compensation, to take effect from the 3d of March, 1853, up to this time, as will be reasonable and just. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HAVEN] seems to have fallen into an error in regard to this matter, from the fact that we do not propose to give this discretionary power to the Postmaster General in all cases.

I said this morning that the provision was to allow the Postmaster General discretion to give increased compensation, over and above the commissions fixed in this bill, to distributing and separating offices only. There are perhaps two or three hundred such offices out of twenty-three thousand post offices in the United States. This act does not take effect upon all deputy postmasters, except at distributing and separating offices, till after the commencement of the next fiscal quarter after its passage. It is retrospective only upon distributing and separating offices. Of the twenty-three thousand postmasters in the country, it acts retrospectively only upon such officers as have imposed upon them an increased amount of labor and diminished compensation, and where at the end of the quarter they are obliged to pay the expenses of the office out of their own pockets.

Well, now, I do not propose by this bill before the House to restore the commission to postmasters to what it was under the late Administration within ten or twelve per cent. The gentleman from New York will therefore permit me to say that his arguments do not apply. We are in this bill fixing the compensation of postmasters, but did not entertain the idea of thereby increasing the rates of postage; we leave the increase of compensation to the discretion of the Postmaster General, as heretofore.

Mr. HAVEN. As my friend from Ohio seems to be entering on another part of the subject, he will excuse me for one moment.

Mr. OLDS. Certainly.

Mr. HAVEN. I did not notice particularly what my friend said in relation to the discretion heretofore given to the Postmaster General, but I suppose he refers to the sixth section of the act of 1851 reducing the postage. I wish now to call the attention of the House to that section. I will read it, so that the House may understand the whole of this part of the subject. It will be found in volume 9 of the United States Statutes at Large, at page 590.

That section is as follows:

"Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That to any postmaster whose commissions may be reduced below the amount allowed at his office for the year ending the 30th day of June, 1851, and whose labors may be increased, the Postmaster General shall be authorized, in his discretion, to allow such additional compensation as he may deem just and proper."

Now, notice this fact, Mr. Speaker, if the bill had stopped there, the compensation would have been left entirely to the discretion of the Postmaster General, as in the gentleman's [Mr. OLDS] bill. But it goes on and provides further, and here is where a portion of this great wrong commences. Notice now the proviso:

"Provided, That the whole amount of commissions allowed such postmaster during any fiscal year shall not exceed by more than twenty per centum the amount of commissions at such office for the year ending the 30th day of June, 1851."

Now, sir, the provision in the bill of the gentleman from Ohio takes away, leaves out all limit whatever to the discretion of the Postmaster General. It strikes out the twenty per cent. clause. If the pay under that law was sufficient when the discretion was limited to twenty per cent., why does this bill obliterate such limit? Why does it make such discretion boundless, and place the whole revenues of the Department under the control of the Postmaster General, to be paid out as he may see fit to these political favorites? Sir, I repeat it, in this bill the discretion of the Postmaster General is not limited, as it was under the sixth section of the act of 1851, to twenty per cent. Beyond that limit former Postmasters General could not go under that law. I undertook to demonstrate to the House, that if a new postage bill were passed, it would not only increase the income of postmasters to the extent of the additional percentage on the increased revenues or receipts, which I believe would greatly exceed their compensation under the old law, but that their compensation might also be increased by the Postmaster General up to twenty per cent. The matter, however, is much worse than I had supposed; for this proviso leaving out, as it does, the limit of twenty per cent., enables the Postmaster General to go without limit up to thirty, fifty, one hundred, or one hundred and fifty per cent. The whole matter is left to the unregulated discretion and political sympathies of the Postmaster General. Sir, this is bad legislation, and I enter my protest against it, from whatever party it may emanate.

Mr. OLDS. Mr. Speaker, I do not think that I am yet understood by my friend from New York, [Mr. HAVEN.] I must be very obtuse this morning, or I could succeed in making myself understood. This increased compensation has no proportion, from the fact that, out of the twenty-three thousand postmasters in the United States, it does not propose to give discretion to the Postmaster General in more than two or three hundred cases.

Mr. HAVEN. Read the section.

Mr. OLDS. The gentleman will find, by reference to the bill, that as regards these twenty-three thousand deputy postmasters, no discretion whatever is given to the Postmaster General, with the exception of those of the distributing and separating offices. But permit me here to say, for the benefit of my associates on that committee, that this was the very issue between the Postmaster General and the committee.

He wished that discretionary power should be left to him in regard to all the deputy postmasters, contending that this would save money to the Treasury. But the committee refused to give him discretionary power with regard to these twenty-three thousand deputy postmasters, restricting the discretion to those of separating and distributing offices. Now, sir, I will read again the sixth section of the act reducing the postage:

"And be it further enacted, That to any postmaster whose commissions may be reduced below the amount allowed at his office, for the year ending the 30th day of June, 1851, and whose labors may be increased."

Why, sir, the labors of all deputy postmasters have been increased by the reduction of postage, from the fact that more mail matter is transmitted, and has to be distributed and delivered, in consequence of such cheap postage. At least such is the construction given to it by the Department.

"The Postmaster General shall be authorized, in his discretion, to allow such additional compensation as he may deem just and proper."

This discretion, under a Whig Administration, applied to all the post offices. Now, we propose to restrict it to some two or three hundred out of the twenty-three thousand. If the gentleman saw no wrong in it under a Whig Administration when applied to the twenty-three thousand offices, surely he ought to be satisfied with it when we have restricted it to some two or three hundred offices.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have explained the amendment to which the gentleman objects so much, and I think he will be willing to acknowledge that I have done nothing but what is reasonable and just, and that I have done just as I would have done, whether the Administration were Whig or Democrat.

One word in relation to my promise of what I will do in reference to the California agent. The bill had been agreed upon in committee. I was not aware that it had been reported to the House; but my colleague on the committee [Mr. McDougall] informs me that the bill has been reported to the House, and is upon the Private Calendar.

So far as the action of the committee is concerned, we have not "made a promise to the ear to break it to the hope." The gentleman says he will vote against it. If he does so, he will do an act of great injustice to a worthy man. He will do it from the very best motives; but the man who suffers in consequence of the gentleman's good motives, will impute it to the fact that the gentleman does not always feel disposed to do right, and, therefore, not always disposed to do justice. I will not trouble the House longer.

Mr. SKELTON here obtained the floor, but yielded it temporarily to

Mr. HAVEN, who said: One word, Mr. Speaker, by way of explanation and reply. I do not intend, now, further to trouble the question of increasing the postage; such a measure, in my opinion, would be unwise disconnected from the question of pay to postmasters. I hope it will not be further urged here; it would not comport with the public good.

But to the question between me and the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. OLDS.] I called his attention to the sixth section of the act reducing the postages, passed in 1851. I did so for the purpose of showing that by that law, under which he tries to justify the discretion of the Postmaster General, the compensation was limited to twenty per cent.; beyond that point Congress thought it indiscreet to give him a discretion. The gentleman says, now, that the sixth section I have read, is parallel to a portion of his bill. Sir, after looking at both, I feel bound to say the gentleman has no warrant in either for his assertion. I ask him to point out any legislation in the act of 1851, which is an authority for giving this increased compensation, in any way whatever, beyond twenty per cent.

The bill of 1851 authorizes the giving of this increased compensation, to the limit of twenty per cent. to all postmasters, as the gentleman mentioned. But I call upon him to point out any authority to give it to these distributing or separating offices as a class. He made the declaration that they stood, under the law of 1851, as favorably as they stand now. Why, sir, this bill not only gives the additional percentage I have mentioned to the postmasters, but it also gives them this unlimited discretion in their favor, to be exercised by the Postmaster General. I repeat, the act of 1851 only gives the Postmaster General the right to increase the compensation twenty per cent. But the gentleman does not point out to me anything upon the subject, in reference to the distributing offices, in that act, or in reference to an unlimited discretion of the Postmaster General. If he cannot do so, then his proviso is an interpolation, and a new species of legislation that ought to be promptly met and rejected here.

Mr. HOUSTON. Now, Mr. Speaker, I think we had better go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. OLDS. One word in reply to the gentleman from New York. I will not detain the House a minute. I only wish to say in reference to this discretionary power which is given to the Postmaster General, that the same discretionary power was given to that officer by the act of March 3, 1851, to increase the compensations of postmasters at distributing offices.

Mr. HAVEN. I understand that. The gentleman refers to the sixth section of the act of 1851, and that brings me back to the charge I first made, that this Senate amendment goes further than the act of 1851. It takes off all limitation. It increases the compensation of the postmasters too much in the first place by the first sections of the bill. And then, having got that compensation up to a point as high as this House is willing to go, it allows the Postmaster General to begin there, with his irresponsible hand, and run it up just as much further as he pleases. It allows him to level up illimitably from the highest point to which this House dare go. Sir, it takes off all limitation. I do not design these remarks in any offensive sense; but I thought myself bound to point out this bad legislation to the House.

Mr. OLDS. I ask the gentleman, if he would prefer the sixth section of the act of March 3, 1851, giving discretionary power to the Postmaster General to increase the pay of all postmasters?

Mr. HAVEN. I answer, that this bill puts their compensation too high, without conferring any discretion on the Postmaster General. But if it were not too high, I should by all means prefer the proviso to the sixth section of the act of 1851, and have it applied to these distributing or separating offices, for that proviso limits the increase to twenty per cent.

Mr. SKELTON. I do not propose to inquire what has been done, or what has not been done heretofore. And whether this is a Whig or a Democratic measure, in my opinion, has nothing to do with the question under consideration. The question presented for our consideration to-day is simply this: Is this measure calculated to promote the best interests of the country? That is the question to which the House should confine itself, and not to the consideration of what has or has not been done.

Sir, what is the duty of the House in reference to a question of this kind? I regretted that I was not present when this bill was originally before the House, that I might have given to the House the opinions I entertained in reference to the matter, and I am glad that I have the opportunity of doing it now. I regard this whole business as wrong. We have already passed two bills during the present session, changing to some extent our postal system. The object of both has been the same, both have been outside the great object for which they should have been framed—the interests of the country and the wants of the Department of Government to which they relate.

Now, sir, the question which we should decide is not how much we shall pay the postmasters, or whether they will be able to make a living or not, but whether we can best promote the public interest by the proposed change in the post office laws? But what has been the history of the matter? First comes a bill before the House increasing the compensation of postmasters; then comes another bill increasing the rates of postage, and thereby still further increasing the compensation of postmasters by augmenting the amount of receipts upon which they receive a certain percentage. Now, is this necessary, in order to subserve the public interest? Is it necessary to increase the compensation of these officers in order to obtain competent men to serve? Have not all of us been persecuted, day after day and night after night, by office seekers, anxious to take these offices with the pay already granted, and yet, day by day, you go on increasing their compensation.

The Post Office Department was established for the public interest, the public accommodation, and the dissemination of knowledge through the country. It has been a principle of policy that the Department should sustain itself. If that principle is to be maintained in practice, it is necessary that we should keep the expenditures down to the lowest possible point, and why? Because it is our duty to legislate for the interest of the public, and not for that of office-holders. On the contrary, it seems to me that these bills have been introduced for the interest of the latter. I would particularly call the attention of members to the fact, that we are to legislate for the public, and not for individual office-holders.

The Post Office Department is one of great importance in this country. Free dissemination of ideas, and correspondence between the various sections of the Union, is calculated to promote harmony of feeling and concord of action. It is not only calculated to do that, but also to exercise a salutary influence upon the social condition of this great Republic.

It is important that the United States mail should be carried to as many points as possible. I have applied at various times for additional post offices in my district, and in the State I have the honor in part to represent; but I have been refused, and on the ground that the Post Office Department does not pay its expenses; that the expenditures are now so large that it cannot afford to establish any new offices, though the particular localities may require, and the public interest demand them.

Now, our present action, so far from reaching what should be our main object, would defeat it. The Postmaster General shows that his Department is largely indebted to the General Government. It does not clear one cent. Yet, while there are wanting additional facilities for the transportation of the mail in various sections, it is proposed here that we should increase the burdens of the Department, and thus defeat the great and leading object for which it was established. Why, sir, if Congress is to go on in this way increasing the compensation of postmasters, it is best that we should abolish the Department at once, and leave the transmission of the mails to private enterprise. Our correspondence can be cheaper and more rapidly transported at the present time by private expresses than through the post office. Notwithstanding this, members are constantly urging the House to increase the expenses of the Department, that office-holders may be fattened. Is this right? Is it right in principle? Is it calculated to promote the public interest? If it is calculated to promote the public interest, then we should sustain it. If, on the contrary, it is not so calculated, and I maintain that it is not, every honorable member on this floor should say at once that, by increasing the expenditures of the Post Office Department, we directly lessen the advantage designed by its organization, and do a great injury to the interests of the country.

Mr. COBB. I call for the previous question. The previous question received a second, and the main question was ordered to be put.

The question was then taken on the amendment proposed by the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads to the amendment of the Senate; and it was agreed to.

The question recurring on the amendment of the Senate, as amended, it was taken; and said amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOUSTON. I offer the usual resolution to close debate upon the civil and diplomatic bill on Thursday next, at twelve o'clock.

The question was put; and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. HOUSTON moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider do lie on the table; which latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. HOUSTON. I now move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, for the purpose of taking up that bill.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. There are two or three bills on the Speaker's table, and the day is now (two hours and five minutes) pretty far advanced. I think the House could dispose of these bills in an hour, at furthest; and I therefore move that the House do now proceed to the business on the Speaker's table.

The SPEAKER. The motion of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Houston] having been regularly made, will take precedence of the motion of the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. DAVIS. I was under the impression that a motion to go to the business on the Speaker's table took precedence of a motion to go into committee.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana is perhaps right.

The question was taken on Mr. Davis's motion; and it was disagreed to.

The question recurred on the motion submitted by Mr. Houston.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I would be very happy, Mr. Speaker, to be permitted to make a brief personal explanation. I shall not occupy two minutes in doing so.

General assent was expressed.

DEATH OF MR. SNODGRASS.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. Speaker, the explanation which I am about to make is not a matter of much interest, except to myself and to those from my State. A few days ago, in the House of Representatives, the melancholy intelligence was announced of the death of one of my own colleagues. The telegraphic dispatch which was acted upon was addressed to me, and was in the following language: "The Hon. John F. Snodgrass died at half-past two o'clock, p. m., very suddenly. His friends desire you to announce his death to the House." In consequence of my absence, my colleague [Mr. FAULKNER] announced the death of Mr. Snodgrass; and stated that he did so at the request of his colleagues—meaning, of course, at the request of his colleagues who were present. That statement, Mr. Speaker, might convey the impression that I had refused to comply with the request of the friends of the deceased. That is my reason for desiring to make this explanation, that I was absent. For though I mourn—deeply mourn—a melancholy necessity of that announcement, yet, in performing the last office of friendship to one who was so much entitled to my respect and esteem, I would discharge that duty with cheerful but melancholy alacrity.

I will add one word more, Mr. Speaker, and hope the House will bear with me. It was my fortune to spend a few hours—a few hours only—with my deceased colleague, in very interesting conversation, just before he left this city; and I observed to him how remarkably well he looked. He replied that he had not been for many years in such fine health. And yet, in a few days afterwards, the fell destroyer struck him, and he succumbed to the blow.

I make this statement, Mr. Speaker, that his friends, and those in his section of country, should not suppose that I could refuse a request such as that made to me on his account.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, presented to the House a communication from the President of the United States, transmitting a report of the Secretary of State, with accompanying documents, in compliance with the resolution of the House of Representatives of 20th December last.

Mr. WALKER. This communication from the President is in answer to a resolution of inquiry, which, the Chair will remember, was offered by me some months since, accompanying a memorial from the Chamber of Commerce of the city of New York, which I then presented. It relates to certain impositions on our commerce in the Baltic, laid by the Government of Denmark, and known as "sound dues." I move, sir, that the communication from the President be laid on the table, and printed.

It was so ordered.

COMMUNICATION FROM THE CLERK.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Clerk of the House, transmitting a letter, and accompanying explanation, in accordance with the request of the chairman of the Committee on Engraving.

The communication was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

The question was then taken on Mr. Houston's motion; and it was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. ORR in the chair.)

CIVIL AND DIPLOMATIC BILL.

The CHAIRMAN. The business first in order is the consideration of the civil and diplomatic appropriation bill, and upon that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. PHILLIPS] is entitled to the floor.

RAILROAD TO THE PACIFIC.

Mr. PHILLIPS being absent, the floor was assigned to

Mr. WALBRIDGE, who proceeded to speak upon a subject different from that before the committee, namely: the proposition for a railroad to the Pacific. He rapidly traced the inception and history of the land system, asserting that it was within the power of the General Government to aid, by donations of public domain, the construction of such a means of intercommunication. He asked what is the probable extent of the contemplated Pacific railroad, that is, from some point on or near the Mississippi to the Pacific?

Assuming the initiative in the latitude of New York, 40° 42' north, and in longitude 91° west from Greenwich, the distance, in a direct line, would not exceed one thousand seven hundred and fifty miles; or, assuming another point, say from Fond du Lac, the west end of Lake Superior, in latitude 46° 30', to Puget's Sound, where there is a convergence of the continent, the distance would be about one thousand five hundred miles. Taking a southerly latitude, say in thirty-fourth or thirty-fifth parallel in a due west direction, and the distance would not exceed one thousand six hundred miles.

He discussed the subject in a social, commercial, and military aspect.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana, next addressed the committee upon the Pacific Railroad.

[The above speeches will be found in the Appendix.]

Mr. BROOKS obtained the floor.

Mr. HAVEN. Will the gentleman from South Carolina yield me the floor for a moment? I should listen with great pleasure to the gentleman from South Carolina; but the House has now been in session nearly four hours, and the members are somewhat fatigued. I hope that the committee will agree to rise, so that the gentleman who has the floor may have an hour in the morning to address the committee. With his permission, I move that the committee rise.

The question was taken on Mr. HAVEN's motion; and it was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the Chairman reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration the Union generally, and particularly House bill No. 48, being a bill "making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1855," and had come to no conclusion thereon.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Tennessee. I move that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and thereupon (at twenty minutes to four o'clock) the House adjourned till to-morrow at twelve o'clock, m.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, June 14, 1854.

Prayer by Rev. WILLIAM H. MILBURN.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

EXPLANATION.

Mr. CLAYTON. I ask the indulgence of the Senate for the purpose of a brief personal explanation, and it is the first time, I believe, that I ever desired a similar favor.

I perceive in a morning paper, (the Union,) to which my attention has been directed since I entered the Capitol this morning, that the distinguished and much-honored statesman of South Carolina, [Mr. Calhoun,] with myself, is charged with the crime of mutability in having voted for the compromise bill of July, 1848. That bill, while it excluded in California and New Mexico the whole doctrine of what is now called squatter sovereignty, and gave no right to aliens to vote in those Territories, did confer that right on such as had declared their intention to become citizens in the then proposed Territory of Oregon. At the same time that compromise, which proposed to organize three vast territorial governments greater than were ever included in one bill before, offered peace to a distracted country on the principle of submitting the whole slavery question in the Territories to the judicial tribunals, and for the first time excluded the Wilmot proviso, and adopted for Oregon the boasted principle of non-intervention, which was afterwards copied into the compromise measures of 1850.

For this great measure of pacification both John C. Calhoun and myself voted, although known to every one who had thought our opinions worthy of consideration to be utterly opposed to the clause in that part of the bill organizing the government of Oregon, which allowed the vote of aliens in any form or under any pretext. We entertained then the same opinions which we had both expressed in the debate on the Michigan bill in 1836, that a claim allowing aliens to vote was utterly and absolutely unconstitutional—an opinion which was shared with us by many of the most distinguished gentlemen in both Houses of Congress at that day. But to obtain the great blessings which we firmly believed the country would receive from the final settlement of the slavery question on the principles of that bill—a measure which the distinguished Senator from Virginia, [Mr. HUNTER,] in the late debate on the Nebraska bill, characterized as the very best compromise ever yet proposed—we both agreed, after full consultation together, to waive our objections to the single clause in the Oregon portion of the bill, to secure the passage of that great measure of peace.

While this measure was before the committee which reported that bill, Mr. Calhoun called at my lodgings, to consider with me the course we should adopt on this very question. We both stood fully committed to the country on the constitutional principle, that any act of Congress allowing aliens to vote in any State or Territory of the United States, was pro tanto an act of naturalization and unconstitutional, because it was partial and not uniform. But we were given to understand by others, that our compromise bill would inevitably fail in the House of Representatives, if the government of Oregon were organized without the fifth section of the bill, which was so obnoxious to us. The correctness of that opinion was fully demonstrated a short time afterwards, and after the failure of our compromise in the other House by a small majority, by the passage of a separate Oregon bill, containing that very section allowing the vote of aliens, which bill originated in that same House of Representatives, and became a law on the 14th of August, 1848. But for that bill neither Mr. Calhoun nor myself ever voted. Had we voted for that, or for any provision allowing the suffrage of aliens in any separate and distinct form, we might, indeed, have subjected ourselves to the censure of those who would rejoice in an opportunity of charging us with inconsistency. During the interview to which I have referred, we resolved to make the sacrifice in Oregon, to secure the principle in California and New Mexico, which not only avoided the alien vote in those Territories, but the Wilmot proviso, and the whole principle of squatter sovereignty. We thought, that in a difficult compromise, he who won the two best in three, had but little reason to complain. We thought, too, there was but little danger of alien suffrage in a territory so remote from the usual landing places of immigrants on the Atlantic, and so inaccessible as Oregon.

Sir, it has been said that when the framers of the greatest of all compromises (the Constitution of the United States) came out of the convention of 1787, there was not one man who was not dissatisfied with some one provision of that instrument. The Missouri compromise of 1820 was voted for by men who held the sixth section of it to be absolutely unconstitutional. The tariff compromise of 1833 contained the principle of the home valuation which, in the debates of that day, was pronounced unconstitutional by nearly every southern Senator, who afterwards voted not only for the passage of that compromise, but for the home valuation amendment itself; and that, too, on a call of the yeas and nays. These were concessions made by great and patriotic statesmen, to secure the blessings of peace and the safety of this Union. And if I, whose opinions against alien suffrage have never varied—if I who reported the provision excluding aliens from voting in the first act to organize the vast Territory of Wisconsin, then comprehending the present States of Wisconsin, Iowa, and half of Michigan, which Territory was organized by my efforts and those of the Judiciary Committee, of which I was at the time the chairman—I who also reported and voted against the clause allowing alien suffrage in the State of Michigan, can be charged with inconsistency for sacrificing something of my fixed opinions to secure the peace of my country and the safety of this Union in 1848, let those who delight to censure make the most of it.

PAY OF DEPUTY POSTMASTERS.

A message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. FORNEY, their Clerk, announcing that they had concurred in the amendment of the Senate to the bill of the House "regulating the pay of deputy postmasters," with an amendment.

On motion by Mr. RUSK, the Senate proceeded to consider the amendments.

The amendment of the Senate was to strike out the following proviso:

"That, in any postmaster of any distributing or separating post office whose commissions may be reduced below the amount allowed at his office for the year ending the 30th day of June, 1851, the Postmaster General shall be authorized, in his discretion, to allow such additional compensation as he may deem proper, such compensation to date, and be allowed from, the 30th day of March, 1853: Provided further, That the commissions and allowances authorized by this act shall be subject to the provisions of the forty-first section of the act entitled 'An act to reduce into one the several acts establishing and regulating the Post Office Department'; and all acts, or parts of acts, inconsistent with the provisions of this act, be, and the same are hereby, repealed; and this act to take effect, and be in force, from and after the commencement of the next fiscal quarter after its passage."

And insert:

That to any postmaster of a distributing office, at which the commissions, allowances, and emoluments, since the 31st day of March, 1853, have been insufficient to defray the actual and necessary expenses, and afford the postmasters the annual compensation derived from commissions at the office before the said 31st of March, the Postmaster General may, in his discretion, allow quarterly from the date aforesaid, out of the postage collected at any such office, an amount sufficient to supply such deficiency: Provided further, That to any postmaster of a separating office, at any such office, whose commissions, allowances, and emoluments may be found insufficient to provide the extra labor necessary to a prompt and efficient performance of the duties of separating and dispatching the mails passing through his office, the Postmaster General may make such quarterly allowances out of the postages collected at such office, as he may deem sufficient to compensate such extra labor. This act shall take effect and be in force from and after the commencement of the next fiscal quarter after its passage.

The amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate was to insert after the word "labor," the following:

Provided further, That the commissions and allowances authorized by this act shall be subject to the provisions of the forty-first section of the act entitled "An act to reduce into one the several acts establishing and regulating the Post Office Department;" And provided further, That the Postmaster General may, in his discretion, dispose of any quarterly returns of mails sent or received which were made up previous to the 1st day of July, 1850, preserving the accounts current, and all vouchers accompanying such accounts, and the use of such portion of the proceeds thereof as may be necessary to defray the cost of separating and disposing of the same.

The amendment of the House was concurred in, so that the bill is finally passed as thus amended.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented two copies of the laws of the Territory of New Mexico, passed by the third Legislative Assembly, in the city of Santa Fe, at a session begun on the 5th day of December, 1853; which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. DAWSON presented a petition of the inhabitants of the city of Macon, in the State of Georgia, praying a reduction in the rates of ocean postage; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. BELL submitted additional evidence in support of the claim of Sarepta Cleveland, daughter of Jonathan Skinner, deceased, to indemnity for losses sustained by him in the war of the Revolution; which, together with the papers on the files of the Senate, was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Mr. JOHNSON presented the following petitions, &c., praying the establishment of additional mail routes; which were referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads:

Two petitions of citizens of Arkansas, praying the establishment of a post route from Norristown to Fort Smith, in Arkansas;

Document relating to a post route from Pine Bluff to Brownsville, Arkansas;

Petition of citizens of Arkansas and Texas, praying the establishment of a mail route from Jefferson, in the State of Texas, to Fulton, in Arkansas;

Petition of citizens of Arkansas, praying the establishment of a mail route from Danville to Waldron, in said State; and Petition of citizens of Arkansas, praying the establishment of a post route from Hurricane to Galley Rock, in said State.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa, presented the petition of Eli T. Tappan, praying the assistance of Congress in the publication of an edition of the acts of Congress, containing only those laws of a general nature which remain in force. The petitioner represents that the editions now published contain all the public acts, including those that are local, temporary, or obsolete, as well as those in force, and some editions contain also all the private acts. As all these acts are published in chronological order, it is frequently very difficult and laborious to discover what is the law actually in force; and it must remain so, even with the aid of the best indexes, so long as the laws are published in the manner described. In consequence of this, new laws are sometimes enacted which conflict with the old; and thus the difficulty of determining what is the law, is increased. The memorialist also states that those who consult the statutes of the United States usually do so to find some general law now in force; and that to all such persons such a volume would be a great saving of time, labor, and money, inasmuch as they could purchase, in a single volume, that for which they must now buy six or nine to obtain. The memorial was referred to the Committee on the Library.

Mr. HAMLIN presented the petition of the heirs-at-law of Benjamin Grover, a revolutionary soldier, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also submitted the following resolution in reference to the above petition; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Pensions be directed to inquire into the propriety of allowing a sum to the heirs of Benjamin Grover, deceased, of Maine, equal to what was justly due the widow of said Grover, as a pension at the time of her decease.

REPORTS FROM STANDING COMMITTEES.

Mr. COOPER, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, to whom was referred the petition of the heirs of Captain Joshua Chamberlain, praying compensation for services during the revolutionary war, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for their relief; which was read, and passed to a second reading. The report was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the memorial of David A. Cameron, representative and heir of James Bell, late of Lower Canada, and assignee of the other heirs of said Bell, praying payment for advances made to the American Army during the revolutionary war, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for the relief of the legal representatives of James Bell, deceased; which was read, and passed to a second reading. The report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. SHIELDS, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred a bill from the House of Representatives, making further appropriations for continuing the construction of certain roads in the Territory of Minnesota, in accordance with the estimates made by the War Department, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Territories; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a bill from the House of Representatives, for the construction of certain military roads and wells in the Territory of New Mexico, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Territories; which was agreed to.

Mr. SUMNER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred a bill from the House of Representatives, for the relief of James Walsh, reported it back without amendment.

Mr. PEARCE, from the Committee on Finance, reported a bill respecting the Executive Departments, and to distribute the settlement of claims and accounts among the accounting officers of the Treasury; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

NOTICE OF A BILL.

Mr. GWIN gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce a bill to amend the judicial system of the United States by providing for the organization of an additional circuit.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. DAWSON asked and obtained the unanimous consent of the Senate to introduce a joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of the Territory of New Mexico to adjust and pay to Juan C. Armijo, José L. Perea, and James L. Collins, the amount by them loaned to the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of New Mexico, under authority of a joint resolution of that body, approved the 17th of June, 1851; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Territories.

Mr. DAWSON. I wish to ask the chairman of the Committee on Territories to be kind enough to take that matter into consideration at his earliest convenience.

MEETING OF CONGRESS.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I offer the following resolution by way of amendment to the rules:

Resolved, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That the following shall be added to the joint rules of the two Houses:

Unless otherwise ordered by either House, the first regular session of every new Congress shall be terminated by adjournment on the first Monday of the month of May succeeding the commencement of such session; and that the President of the Senate and Speaker of the House of Representatives shall accordingly adjourn their respective Houses at the hour of twelve o'clock, meridian, of that day.

I will simply remark that this is to be in connection with the bill which I offered yesterday, to fix the first Monday in October as the day for the annual meeting of Congress.

The resolution lies over for consideration for one day under the rules.

LIEUTENANT MAURY.

Mr. GWIN, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported a joint resolution giving the consent of Congress to the acceptance by Lieutenant M. F. Maury, of the Navy, of a gold medal from his Majesty the King of Sweden; which was read a first and second time by its title, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to give the consent of Congress to Lieutenant Maury to the acceptance of a gold medal from the King of Sweden, in testimony of his high satisfaction with the zealous and unceasing efforts of that officer, as Superintendent of the National Observatory at Washington, for promoting the establishment of a universal system of meteorological observations to the advantage of navigation in general, and as an acknowledgment of the kind disposition shown by that officer to make the merchant navy of Sweden, in common with that of other nations, enjoy the benefit of the discoveries already made in this branch of science.

Mr. PEARCE. I will ask the Senator from California to consent to let this joint resolution lie over until to-morrow. I am in favor of giving the consent which he asks, but I wish to modify the form of the resolution. Let it lie over until to-morrow.

The further consideration of the joint resolution was postponed until to-morrow.

HOMESTEAD BILL.

Mr. WALKER. I have been authorized by a meeting of quite a number of the friends of the homestead bill, to give notice to the Senate that they will make an effort, and insist on it on Monday next, to take up that measure, make it the special order, and continue it from day to day until it is finally acted upon. They also have directed me to say, that they will endeavor to bring about the final action this week upon the bill which has been vetoed by the President of the United States, so they may not have that in the way next week to interfere with the consideration of the homestead bill.

Mr. GWIN. Inasmuch as I am a friend of the homestead bill, I hope the Senator from Wisconsin will call it up at an earlier day than that which he mentions. I think he might get it up the day after to-morrow as well as at any other time. The bill which has been vetoed can certainly be disposed of during to-day and to-morrow.

Mr. WALKER. I will say to the Senator from California, that if we should be so fortunate as to get rid of the bill which has been vetoed, it will certainly be the pleasure of many friends of the homestead bill to take it up earlier; but it was thought that it must depend upon the disposition of the vetoed bill which is under consideration, unless it should be unnecessarily protracted.

ADJOURNMENT SINE DIE.

The Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution from the House of Representatives:

Resolved, (the Senate concurring,) That the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representafives adjourn their respective Houses on Monday, August 14th, at twelve o'clock, m."

Mr. GWIN. I move to amend the resolution by striking out the words, "Monday, August 14th, at twelve o'clock, m.," and inserting the words:

From twelve o'clock, m., on Monday, July 17th, until Monday, the 16th of October next."

I will give the reasons why I offer this amendment. When the resolution passed the House of Representatives, the special order before that body was the Pacific railroad bill, which it was expected would lead to a long debate. Yesterday, on the motion of the friends of that measure, it was postponed until the second Monday in December next. The House then took up the civil and diplomatic appropriation bill, and passed a resolution to stop debate on it to-morrow at twelve o'clock. They have now got their business in such a state that there is no doubt the appropriation bills and other important measures can be acted upon before the time mentioned in my amendment for taking the recess. It gives us nearly five weeks until the commencement of the recess, and all the appropriation bills, and other important matters can be disposed of by the two Houses by that time. There are other questions of great importance which ought to be acted upon during this session, but they can come up after the recess. I am confident in my own mind that we can dispatch the business better by adopting the amendment which I propose. I hope it will be agreed to.

Mr. HUNTER. I think the proposition of the House would be better than the amendment. It would be better to stay here until the 14th of August, and transact the business of the session, and then meet in December next. But, sir, I have some hopes that if we should let this resolution lie for the present, we might, perhaps, get ready to adjourn earlier than the time mentioned in it; and I am sure I should be very glad if that could be the case. I am unwilling, however, now, upon the instant, to change our practice, and to agree to the recess. I have no objection to changing hereafter, by a law, the time at which we should meet at what is called the short session of Congress. I think that that session ought to be lengthened, and the other session diminished; but that ought to be done after we have had notice, and after the business of the country is matured in reference to such a state of things. It seems to me that we had better pursue the old practice in regard to this session, and get through if we can by the 14th of August, or sooner if possible. But, in order to do this, I would suggest that it would be probably better to let the resolution lie upon the table for the present, and then if we see we can get through and adjourn at an earlier day, we can take it up and amend it by fixing such a day. I suggest that that would be a better course.

Mr. GWIN. There is a proposition now before the Senate to change the time of the meeting of the short session, and I have no doubt it will pass. As to the consequences that might hereafter result from this, I am of opinion that it cannot be a precedent if that bill should be passed, as I believe it will. I do not believe there is a member of the Senate who is not in favor of changing the time of meeting at the short session of Congress. There may be a difference of opinion as to when the session should commence, whether on the first Monday in October, or the first Monday in November; but I have no doubt in my mind that one or the other will command the votes of the majority of both Houses of Congress; and I think there will be no danger in the precedent.

It is well known to members of this body, that if we want work done we ought to fix the day of adjournment. I have no doubt that there is a great change in the opinion of the House since the passage of the resolution. They have got clear of the question of the greatest importance which was before them, and which would have led to a lengthened debate. We shall soon have the appropriation bills before us. We shall probably have them by the time that we get through with the discussion of the vetoed bill and the homestead bill. My amendment gives us nearly five weeks, including the present week, before the recess. Then there are great and important questions which can be taken up in October next, and can be better discussed than in the dog days. I hope the amendment will be agreed to. I am certain that it will facilitate the public business, and it gives us a longer time than the resolution of the House. The time which it gives us is also a better time for working in.

Mr. TOOMBS. I should be very willing to get the recess asked for by the Senator from California, but I see no necessity for making it as an amendment to this resolution. If the Senator from California thinks the House would favor the proposition, after the change which has taken place, he might introduce a separate resolution.

Mr. GWIN. The Senator knows that in the House of Representatives they could only take up such a proposition on Monday, and it would require a two-third vote to do it. A simple majority could not control it. If we agree to this resolution, amended in the manner I propose, and the House disagree to it, they would ask for a committee of conference.

Mr. TOOMBS. Then they could not take this up again, except by a two-third vote. That is true in the one case as in the other.

As to the idea of the Senator from Virginia, I think it should not be entertained. If we now pass the resolution fixing a day of adjournment, and then find that we can get through with the public business before that day, the passage of this resolution will not prevent us from adjourning earlier; and my experience has been, as the Senator from California has said, that by fixing the day of adjournment we shall get through with the public business sooner. Unless the time be now fixed, everybody knows that we shall not adjourn until September or October; and, therefore, we had better take up the resolution, and pass it. If the House desires the amendment which the Senator from California suggests, they can take up a resolution containing the provision, and pass it. I am very willing to let this resolution go by the board, if the Senator from California thinks that the House will agree to such a proposition as his. If that is the case, let their resolution lie here, and let us send them another. But, while this is in our hands, I should be unwilling to let it go from us without adopting it.

Mr. RUSK. I move to amend the amendment, so that it may not be construed that the per diem should be allowed during the recess. With the amendment of the Senator from California the resolution might be possibly construed that per diem should be allowed. I am sure that with that opinion, the House of Representatives would not vote for it. I move that it be amended by adding a proviso that no per diem shall be allowed.

Mr. DAWSON. By the act of 1818, as I understand it, if the two Houses of Congress adjourn within ten days of the next regular meeting of Congress, mileage would not be allowed to the members. Now, I am sure that gentlemen in the House, living at a distance, who rely on mileage for compensation and for loss sustained in coming here, would be very unwilling to forego the mileage; and, therefore, the House would go strongly against the proposition of my friend from California as it now stands.

That proposition, then, cannot be concurred in; and, as I am very anxious to adjourn at the earliest practicable day, I think the better plan would be to concur in the resolution of the House with some amendment, let the House disagree to it, and let the two Houses meet together by way of a committee of conference, and agree upon some plan.

Mr. BADGER. I am in favor of the amendment proposed by the Senator from California, and I do not see that it involves any difficulty in the progress of the resolution through the House. If we agree to the amendment, and the House is opposed to any recess, they will of course disagree to that amendment, and then it will be in the power of the Senate to recede from it, and adopt the resolution as it came to us from the House. The only inquiry is this: Would the majority of the Senate prefer the recess, or prefer a final closing of the session at the time mentioned by the House? If the majority of the Senate prefers the recess and desires to obtain it, and the consent of the House can be obtained to it, the simplest proposition in the world is to agree to the amendment of the Senator from California. It will then go to the House as an amendment to their resolution. It will be considered by the House, as is the constant habit under such circumstances, and if they disagree so that we find a recess cannot be obtained, we shall have but to recede from our amendment, and agree to the resolution without it.

The difficulty which it is suggested, would arise if the resolution should pass, is perhaps worthy of some consideration. I understand it is the opinion of some of the accounting officers, that if this recess be taken the per diem of the Senators and members of the House will continue. I do not know how that is, but for one, I do not think it would be a very great calamity if it should. I do not look upon it as such a great evil that we should put ourselves to an extraordinary difficulty to prevent it falling upon us, and certainly it would have no injurious effect upon those among us who live at a short distance from the Capitol, and to whom the mileage is a matter of very small consideration. However, sir, I interpose no objection if my friend from Texas insists upon it, to expressly providing that there shall be no per diem, although we are not so groaning in wealth, as I have said, that it should be considered a great evil. I am perfectly indifferent about it, and am willing to agree to such an amendment.

With regard to mileage, it may be that the result which my friend from Georgia suggests might follow, to wit: that gentlemen would not be entitled to their mileage at the next regular session, either because the adjournment of this session would take place within ten days of the commencement of the next, or because the session might run on, so as to lose itself in that regular session. Surely that would not be a matter of great inconvenience, either here or in the other House, because a simple proviso or declaration in one of the appropriation bills would settle that matter, by declaring that this should be considered a distinct session, for the purpose of allowing mileage. That is an amendment which would surely commend itself to the two bodies, because every one would be in favor of it. If anybody should be opposed to it, there would be no trouble here in seeing how we would vote; and if the yeas and nays should be taken, the proposition would certainly carry. For these reasons, believing that the best plan which we can adopt is to obtain what we consider the best, without putting in jeopardy what is next best to it, I shall vote for the amendment of my friend from California.

Mr. CLAYTON. I suggest to the Senator from Texas, that by an amendment to this resolution he cannot obtain the end he aims at. This resolution is nothing but a resolution of the two Houses for a recess; it is not a legislative act. It does not require the signature of the Executive; and therefore it could not repeal an existing law. If, then, it be true that, by an existing law, compensation would run to the members of both Houses during the recess, you cannot avoid it by amending the resolution. You must then, in order to obtain your end, put a provision in one of the appropriation bills, or pass some separate act of legislation for or against the compensation, as Congress shall see proper. I, therefore, submit to my honorable friend from Texas, that he withdraw the amendment for the present, because it would have no effect if agreed to.

Mr. RUSK. I distinctly announced at the time, in offering the amendment, that I should vote against the whole proposition. I heard the discussion in the House of Representatives upon this subject, and I was satisfied that it would be useless to send such a proposition as this, if the construction be placed upon it, that during a recess members would be receiving their per diem. If that construction be placed upon it, and such would be the fact, I feel very well satisfied that it would not pass the House; or, if it did pass, that it would be put in such a shape as to bring it back here for discussion again. In regard to the question of mileage, and as to what Congress will do, the honorable Senator from North Carolina may have some means of ascertaining exactly what the Senate and the House will do; but I am not so fortunate, I cannot tell what they will do until the votes are taken.

Mr. BADGER. I only presumed it, because I supposed both Houses would do what was right.

Mr. RUSK. That is rather a violent presumption, so far as the Senate is concerned. I do not know much about the House; but in looking at the proceedings of this body, it is a violent presumption. I am not able, like the Senator from North Carolina, as I have said, to foresee exactly what will be done. As to a question of right gentlemen differ about it sometimes, but under all the circumstances I withdraw the amendment. I have no disposition to embarrass the proposition; for I shall vote against the whole of it. I am willing to vote for the House resolution to adjourn on the 14th of August. I feel very well satisfied that we cannot get through with the business before that time; and as to taking a recess and coming back here in October, the end of it will be that we shall do nothing until the short session commences.

Mr. WALKER. I think that this is not the proper time to fix a day either for adjournment, or for a recess. I think so for reasons which have already been urged, and for others. There are important measures under consideration. It is important that they should be acted upon, and it is important that they should not be embarrassed by the difficulty which might arise by fixing a day for the adjournment. Being opposed then, at present, to fixing a day, I move to postpone the further consideration of the resolution until a week from next Monday.

Mr. GWIN. I hope the Senator will allow us to have a test vote upon the amendment.

Mr. WALKER. That is what I do not want.

Mr. GWIN. If those who are opposed to the amendment are in a majority, of course it will be voted down. I hope we may dispose of it.

Mr. WALKER. I am willing to let the vote be taken upon this proposition; but I shall renew the motion to postpone, whether the amendment be rejected or adopted.

Mr. HOUSTON. I have not been so fortunate as to hear the reasons which have been rendered for the proposition of a recess; and I regret extremely—as no doubt those reasons were all sufficient—that I had not that opportunity; but I certainly can discover none for it. If we should fix an early day for the adjournment, I have no doubt it would expedite the business of Congress; and I am, therefore, decidedly in favor of the resolution as it came from the House of Representatives. If I can hear any reasons to the contrary, I will yield with a great deal of pleasure, if I think them sufficient; but at this time I am disposed to believe that the best course the Senate can adopt is to agree to the resolution as it came from the House of Representatives.

Mr. STUART called for the yeas and nays upon the amendment; and they were ordered.

Mr. PRATT. I desire to say a single word before recording my name in the affirmative on this proposition; but if that obligation had not been imposed upon me, I should have said nothing. Mr. President, the adoption of the amendment of the Senator from California, in its practical effect, will be to prolong the actual session of Congress fourteen days. By the resolution of the House, it is proposed to adjourn on the 14th of August: by the amendment it is proposed to take a recess from the 17th of July to the 16th of October, so that the difference is fourteen days, and the session is prolonged fourteen days by the amendment.

In reference to the pay, there is no earthly difficulty in having a bill introduced which, I imagine, would pass directly here, to accompany this resolution, if amended, to the House, so that when the resolution gets there, the House would be embarrassed of the difficulty which I understand my friend from Texas seems to think influenced their action—the necessity of receiving per diem compensation during the recess. I do not think there is any one here who does not believe that if we were to take a recess, and come back in October, our own minds, the public mind, the mind of every one, would be better prepared than now to go on with the important business of this session. I have no doubt of it myself. I have no doubt that it is the opinion of the country at large that it would be much better for the public interest that we should now adjourn.

For one, if the appropriation bills were through I would be perfectly willing either to adjourn tomorrow, sine die, or take a recess; but still I cannot help seeing that there are important measures partially matured, which would require a longer time than from the regular session in December, to the period of adjournment in March; and, therefore, I do say, that the people of the country have a right to expect that we should appropriate more of our time—God knows we are not paid for it—in the discharge of our duty towards them, than would be done if we were to adjourn sine die as soon as the appropriation bills are passed.

I think the true course both for ourselves and the country at large, would be to adopt the amendment, and let it go to the House. If I understand parliamentary rule—and the Senators from North Carolina and Georgia, who are familiar with it, will correct me if I am wrong—if we adopt the amendment, and it goes to the House, they have no right to amend the resolution. They cannot fix any other day; they are either to reject the whole of our proposition or agree to it. They cannot fix any other day than the 14th of August, unless they agree to our amendment. They must either accept this or reject it, and let the resolution come back to us for an adjournment on the 14th of August. We are, therefore, relieved from all the difficulty arising from the supposition that we should not have the privilege to adjourn on the 14th of August at any rate; so that it is merely a trial on our part. We passed this proposition for a recess the other day by almost a unanimous vote. We believed then, and we believe now, that it is necessary.

Mr. RUSK. If we pass the resolution to take the recess on the 16th of July, there will be a scramble for the appropriation bills, and no other business will be done. There is no doubt that the appropriation bills will consume the rest of the time, with speeches to be made on abstract questions. Our time will be thus consumed until the recess; and, when we come back in October, we shall have but little more than a month—not more than six weeks—between that time and the commencement of the next session of Congress. It is very well known that a large number of the members of this body and of the other House are lawyers. October is the time for holding the fall courts, generally almost every where, and this is an objection to the amendment.

There is another reason which shows that we should do no business if we take a recess and come back in October. The elections in most of the States take place in that month, and the members of the House will be attending to them. There are some very important measures before Congress, some of vital importance, that might arise between this and the middle of August; and the end of it will be that no business, except the passage of the appropriation bills, will be done between this time and the recess; and then, with such members as are attending to the courts, and such as are attending to their elections in the States after the recess, we should find ourselves, up to the time of beginning the next session of Congress in December, almost without a quorum, and, in my judgment, nothing will be gained by it.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 27, nays 16; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Atchison, Badger, Bayard, Bell, Bright, Brodhead, Clayton, Cooper, Dawson, Dodge of Wisconsin, Dodge of Iowa, Fessenden, Foot, Geyer, Gillette, Gwin, Hamlin, James, Johnson, Pearce, Pratt, Sebastian, Slidell, Sumner, Thompson of New Jersey, Weller, and Williams—27.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Chase, Evans, Fish, Houston, Hunter, Mason, Norris, Rusk, Seward, Shields, Stuart, Thompson of Kentucky, Toombs, Wade, and Walker—16.

Mr. WALKER. I move to postpone the further consideration of the resolution until Monday week.

Mr. BADGER. I hope at any rate we shall ascertain the sense of the Senate on the question. The sooner we ascertain the certainty of the case, and learn the decision of the House upon it, it will be better for those who oppose as well as for those who are in favor of the resolution as amended.

Mr. WALKER. It is just that very certainty that I do not want to incur, and for one, I hope that there will be more of the Senate, who will sympathize with my view than seem to do so by the vote which has been taken. If we vote on the resolution and it be adopted, we shall have fixed the day, when we shall take the recess. That, I do not wish to do; and as I remarked before, I hope there are more of the Senate who sympathize in that view of the subject than seem to do. I am opposed at present to fixing the time either to adjourn, or to take a recess, and therefore I make the motion.

Mr. HUNTER. If the Senate determine to take a recess we ought to decide at once, in order that we may prepare for the work before us. I am against this proposition, but I hope the Senator from Wisconsin will withdraw his motion.

Mr. WALKER. My object does not seem to be understood. I think that if we take up the resolution next Monday week, it will do as well as now, and in the mean time we shall know to what extent we have gone in transacting the business which, for one, I wish to reach. My object is not to defeat the resolution. I will join with its friends in taking it up at the time mentioned. My object is simply to postpone it until that day, so that we may see what can be done in the mean time.

Mr. JOHNSON. I see no objection to voting. If there is a majority of the Senate in favor of the proposition of the Senator from Wisconsin, it will be carried; if there is not, it will be lost.

Mr. CHASE called for the yeas and nays on the motion; and they were ordered, and being taken, resulted—yeas 13, nays 30; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bright, Chase, Gillette, Houston, James, Norris, Rusk, Seward, Shields, Stuart, Sumner, Wade, and Walker—13.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Atchison, Badger, Bayard, Bell, Brodhead, Clayton, Cooper, Dawson, Dodge of Wisconsin, Dodge of Iowa, Evans, Fessenden, Fish, Foot, Geyer, Gwin, Hamlin, Hunter, Johnson, Mason, Pearce, Pratt, Sebastian, Slidell, Thompson of Kentucky, Thompson of New Jersey, Toombs, Weller, and Williams—30.

So the motion was lost.

The question recurring on the adoption of the resolution as amended,

Mr. WALKER called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

Mr. STUART. I move that the resolution lie upon the table; and upon that motion I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. PRATT. I do not know anything about it, but I submit to the Chair whether, after the yeas and nays are called for and ordered on one proposition, they can be ordered on another, while that first proposition is pending.

The PRESIDENT. Certainly, that can be done even after the yeas and nays are ordered.

Mr. JOHNSON. What is the difference between taking a vote on passing the measure and killing it, and ordering it to lie on the table?

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 15, nays 26; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bright, Chase, Gillette, Houston, Hunter, James, Mason, Norris, Rusk, Seward, Shields, Stuart, Sumner, Wade, and Walker—15.

NAYS—Messrs. Atchison, Badger, Bayard, Bell, Clayton, Cooper, Dawson, Dodge of Wisconsin, Dodge of Iowa, Evans, Fessenden, Fish, Foot, Geyer, Gwin, Hamlin, Johnson, Pearce, Pratt, Sebastian, Slidell, Thompson of Kentucky, Thompson of New Jersey, Toombs, Weller, and Williams—26.

So the motion was not agreed to.

The question being taken upon the adoption of the resolution, as amended, resulted—yeas 25, nays 16; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Atchison, Badger, Bell, Brodhead, Clayton, Cooper, Dawson, Dodge of Wisconsin, Dodge of Iowa, Evans, Fessenden, Fish, Foot, Geyer, Gwin, Hamlin, Johnson, Pearce, Pratt, Sebastian, Slidell, Thompson of New Jersey, Toombs, Weller, and Williams—25.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Bright, Chase, Gillette, Houston, Hunter, Mason, Norris, Rusk, Seward, Shields, Stuart, Sumner, Thompson of Kentucky, Wade, and Walker—16.

So the resolution was agreed to.

HOURLY MEETING.

Mr. HOUSTON. I move to take up the resolution which I submitted yesterday, proposing an earlier hour for the meeting of the Senate—eleven o'clock, a. m.

Mr. SHIELDS. That will lead to discussion; and I think it would be better to take up the order of the day, on which the honorable Senator from Delaware [Mr. CLAYTON] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. MASON. I understand from the honorable Senator from Delaware, that the hour being late, and his health not being very strong, he would prefer, if such be the pleasure of the Senate, not to go on to-day with the remarks which he proposes to make on the subject referred to by the Senator from Illinois. Hence, if the Senate desire to take up any other business, it will be convenient to him that it should be done.

Mr. SHIELDS. I was not aware of that.

Mr. HOUSTON called for the yeas and nays on his motion; and they were ordered, and taken with the following result:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Chase, Clayton, Dawson, Dodge of Wisconsin, Dodge of Iowa, Evans, Fessenden, Gillette, Gwin, Hamlin, Houston, Hunter, James, Pratt, Rusk, Seward, Shields, Stuart, Sumner, Wade, Walker, and Williams—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Atchison, Badger, Bayard, Bell, Benjamin, Bright, Brodhead, Cooper, Fish, Foot, Johnson, Mason, Norris, Pearce, Sebastian, Slidell, Thompson of Kentucky, Thomson of New Jersey, and Toombs—19.

So the motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of the resolution, which is as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate will hereafter meet at eleven o'clock, a. m.

Mr. CHASE called for the yeas and nays on the resolution; and they were ordered.

Mr. BADGER. I wish merely to say, in explanation of the vote I shall give on this resolution, that I am ready to vote for appointing eleven o'clock as the hour of meeting when we arrive at that period of the session when it has been usual for the Senate to adopt that course. The Senate has not been in the habit heretofore at the long session of meeting at eleven o'clock, at least sooner than the month of July. Two years ago the resolution to meet at that hour was adopted on the 6th of August. We are all aware that the committees have now very considerable business before them, and it must be an inconvenience, either to the committees or to the Senate, now to advance the hour to eleven o'clock in the morning.

Mr. HOUSTON. In consequence of the adoption this morning of the resolution for a recess, I think an additional exertion is necessary on the part of the Senate to get on with the public business. The House of Representatives may adopt the amendment made this morning by the Senate to their resolution, and thus an early day will be fixed for us to adjourn. For that reason, I think, it is necessary that we should occupy as much time as practicable in forwarding business. At any rate, we ought to do as much as we can, until we know whether the House will concur in the action of the Senate or not. Hence, I think it is very proper that we should meet a little earlier than we have heretofore done.

Mr. PRATT. I shall vote with the honorable Senator from Texas for the resolution which he has proposed. In so doing, I am probably actuated, in some degree, by the same motive which I am sure actuates him in reality. Like him, I have been occasionally absent during the session, [laughter,] and I feel the obligation imposed on me, as I have no doubt he does on himself, to work myself, and get my friends in the Senate to work, by forcing them to meet an hour earlier, in order to get along with public business. [Renewed laughter.] I am sure that is the feeling with him; I shall go with him, because I have been absent from the Senate for one or two days of the session.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. President, I feel the force of the Senator's remarks, and perhaps I owe the Senate some excuse for my absence, to which he has alluded. I know very well that I was absent a good while; and as it will not be disrespectful, I may as well assign an apology on this occasion. I had been here for months. There was not any matter of great importance discussed, except one "great principle," that I did not understand. I knew, therefore, that it was a consumption of my time to remain here.

There was another reason. I did not consider it disrespectful to absent myself, but I did it in self-defense. I was afraid I should get a surfeit if I remained here, and I therefore thought it better to withdraw myself for a while. I knew there was sufficient ability, patriotism, and intelligence among the Senators here to manage the affairs of the nation very well, and I considered myself rather in the nature of a supernumerary, and not as essential to the conduct of the business of the body.

These were my only reasons. I intended no disrespect, I assure gentlemen. I left them with regret; I returned to renew my association with them with great pleasure; and, in order that I may increase that pleasure, I wish to see them for a longer time each day in the Senate Chamber. [Laughter.]

Mr. PEARCE. Mr. President, I am afraid the Senator from Texas is disposed to expiate his own sins by imposing penance upon others. [Laughter.] I do not see any reason for meeting at eleven o'clock. We very rarely sit beyond four o'clock. I doubt whether we shall continue in deliberation here more than four hours if we met at eleven, and if we should continue in session more than four hours a day, I doubt whether the public interest would be benefited by it. We shall become exceedingly weary during the hot weather of a sitting of four hours. We have not as yet reached that period of the session when the committees are without business. Indeed, one of the committees of the Senate will be pressed with business from this time until the close of the session. We are yet to get the important appropriation bills from the House of Representatives, and they will require very close and attentive examination from the Committee on Finance, the members of which must be either absent from the sittings of the Senate, or must neglect the peculiar business of that committee.

But besides that, sir, I do not perceive that we shall accomplish anything which will expedite the public business by adopting the resolution of the Senator from Texas. I believe the Senate is now largely ahead of the House. I do not see, therefore, unless we should get behind the House in the transaction of the public business, that it is necessary to spur us up. I hope the Senator will be convinced with this patriotic display of his intentions, and let the Senate rest in peace a little while longer.

Mr. CLAYTON. One or two of the considerations mentioned by my friend from Maryland [Mr. PEARCE] will determine my vote. I find, by inquiry, that not only the Committee on Finance, to whose business he has alluded, but that many of the other important committees of the Senate, have a great deal of their business still before them not reported upon. They require an hour or two hours before the meeting of the Senate, to go on with the public business. By meeting at eleven o'clock we shall make no speed; we shall cut off the action of the committees, and actually obstruct the business of Congress. Desirous as I am to act with all reasonable dispatch upon the business of the country, I do not see that the resolution now before us will advance the public interests. My impression is that we had better continue to meet at twelve o'clock, and give the committees ample time to digest the measures upon which we shall be called to act.

Mr. HOUSTON. If the committees really have business before them—as I have no doubt they have, for it is so represented—I would suggest that their members can retire after business commences here, as the number of those thus called off would not be very large, we should probably have as near a quorum as we usually have. Senators on some of the committees could retire, or could postpone coming to the Senate for one hour, and allow the body to go on with the ordinary transaction of business. My resolution will add an additional hour to our deliberations here. Four o'clock I believe is the usual hour of adjournment, and my proposition is only to make an advance of one hour in the time of meeting in the morning. The sun now rises at four or five o'clock in the morning, and thus gentlemen will have six or seven hours from the rising of the sun until the time which I propose for the meeting of the Senate, which will afford ample time for all necessary preparation.

The question being taken by yeas and nays on the adoption of the resolution, resulted—yeas 20, nays 26; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Chase, Dawson, Dodge of Wisconsin, Dodge of Iowa, Douglas, Fessenden, Gillette, Hamlin, Houston, Hunter, James, Mason, Pratt, Rusk, Seward, Shields, Stuart, Walker, and Williams—20.

NAYS—Messrs. Atchison, Badger, Bayard, Bell, Benjamin, Bright, Brodhead, Brown, Clay, Clayton, Cooper, Evans, Fish, Fitzpatrick, Foot, Geyer, Johnson, Norris, Pearce, Sebastian, Slidell, Thompson of Kentucky, Thomson of New Jersey, Toombs, Toucey, and Wade—26.

So the resolution was rejected.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On motion by Mr. MASON, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of Executive business; and, after some time spent therein, the doors were reopened, and

The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, June 14, 1854.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. WILLIAM H. MILBURN.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Clerk of the House, transmitting estimates of additional appropriations for the expenses of the House of Representatives, made necessary by existing orders of the House and its committees, for the fiscal year ending the 30th June, 1855; which,

On motion by Mr. ROBBINS, were referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

The SPEAKER. The business first in order is the consideration of the bill reported by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. OLDS,] from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, to increase the rates of postage, upon which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CHANDLER] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. CHANDLER. Having some suspicion as to the time when this bill would again come up, I availed myself of an opportunity of expressing my views upon this subject when another bill was under consideration in Committee of the Whole, and I do not, therefore, desire to occupy the floor now.

Mr. ORR. The debate upon the civil and diplomatic bill is to be terminated, by a resolution adopted yesterday, to-morrow at twelve o'clock. There are several gentlemen who desire to speak, and I therefore move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. HENN. I hope the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. ORR] will not urge that motion, but allow committees to make reports during the morning hour. There are several bills besides the civil and diplomatic bill upon which gentlemen can make their speeches. Let us proceed to the regular order of business, and consume the morning hour in making reports.

Mr. ORR. We ought to go into Committee of the Whole for this reason, that those gentlemen who have prepared their speeches, and desire to make them, will not have an opportunity to do so for ten days, unless we go into committee now, as it will take that length of time to dispose of the civil and diplomatic bill.

The question was then taken upon Mr. Orr's motion; and it was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. Orr in the chair.)

The CHAIRMAN. When the committee last rose they had under consideration the civil and diplomatic bill, upon which the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. Brooks] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BROOKS, after briefly stating the general outlines of the bill for the establishment of railroad and telegraphic communication between the Atlantic and Pacific oceans, proceeded to speak of the constitutional power to grant lands for that purpose, contending that the clause in the Constitution, in his opinion, contemplates that the lands shall be disposed of so as to inure to the benefit of all the States, and not to one, or a part of them only, the territory being the common property of all the States; and, therefore, he was opposed to the granting of lands in the manner proposed in that bill.

Mr. SINGLETON addressed the committee on our relations with Spain. He contended that Spain had no cause of complaint against us; for, in our intercourse with her, we had violated none of the principles of international law; we had faithfully fulfilled all our stipulations with her, and had always endeavored to cultivate and sustain amicable relations with that Power. On the other hand, Spain had committed a series of aggressions against us, which demanded the prompt action of our Government. He called the attention of the committee to various outrages committed by Spain on our citizens, and contended that the execution of Crittenden and his companions was in violation of treaty stipulations between the two Governments. In his opinion the Government of the United States should demand of Spain full reparation for all the injuries she has committed upon us; we should demand assurance that in the future Spain should use all reasonable efforts to prevent a recurrence of the wrongs she had perpetrated upon us, and insist upon it, as a sine qua non, that that Power should establish a tribunal, either upon the Island of Cuba or at a point near this Government, with full power to settle all difficulties which might arise between the two Governments. If Spain should refuse to accede to these propositions, so just and liberal in their character, he was for blockading every port of Cuba, and for taking possession of it, and occupying it, so long as our arms could hold it.

33D CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

NEW SERIES.....No. 88.

Mr. LATHAM, after referring to the course of debate, said that there are too many teachers, who slightly vary in the doctrines they would inculcate, therefore it was difficult to determine who are the orthodox teachers and who are not. He sketched the prosperous condition of the country, and then said he saw no reason why we should assert what we intend to do hereafter. If the world has not sagacity enough to see the tendency of our policy, it is not becoming in us to proclaim what we will do in our forthcoming strength. The misfortune is, that we have too many great men, whose prurient ambition stops at nothing, and whose longing after immortality is never satisfied till they see their names in print. He proceeded to speak in relation to the resolution heretofore offered with regard to the rights of neutrals. He saw no necessity for such a declaration, as those rights are perfectly well understood. We have ever acted up to our professions, and the world has given us credit for it. He had no doubt that our country will always stand up for her rights, and maintain them at all hazards. All we ask is a strict observance of our rights as neutrals.

As to another set of resolutions with regard to Cuba, he admitted that our relations with Spain are delicate. We have no idea of any other government holding Cuba but Spain. Cuba is a plantation badly worked for the proprietor. In course of time it must come under the hammer, and we can pay a sufficient amount to remove the mortgage. At the same time we have no idea that any other nation than ours shall bid for it. In case of the death of the owner, we shall enter as administrator of the estate. He did not mean to be understood as advocating a speedy ejection of the present owner. All peaceable means should first be resorted to; and we should not make use of force until we are compelled to do so; and when we do strike, let us not strike in vain.

Mr. CHANDLER. I have listened with great pleasure, as I always do, to the remarks that have fallen from the honorable gentleman from California, [Mr. LATHAM,] upon the other side of the House. If I could not approve every sentiment that sprung from his lips, I approve the spirit by which those sentiments were engendered. I was delighted to hear him speak of the early history of our country, and the Herculean vigor which has attended her onward course. I was gratified with the remarks of the honorable gentleman, when comparing our country to ancient Rome—with the vigor of her arms, and the energies with which she met the enemies of her Republic, and reduced them to the allegiance of her laws, morals, and customs.

While the gentleman was thus speaking of Roman vigor, intellect, and virtue, I also recollected something of Roman economy at the same time. I remember that while the consuls and military power of Rome were carrying abroad her eagles to alarm and conquer the world, the tribunes and people at home were contributing to the comfort, convenience, and healthfulness of the Roman people; and while the blood of foreign nations was poured out beneath the sword of her foreign leaders, from every square, every street, and every temple in ancient Rome, there gushed forth the pure, healthful, native element of water that taught them cleanliness; for the virtue of cleanliness, I am told, is next to godliness.

When the deficiency bill was before this House a few weeks since, there was a motion made for an appropriation to continue, not to commence, the construction of the water-works. I beg members who are kind enough to listen to me, to hear me not for any eloquence I may have, but simply to hear me for my cause, and to be silent that they may hear. [Laughter.] When the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had under consideration, a few weeks since, a proposition to make an appropriation for the continuation of the aqueduct, a strong argument was made upon this subject by the honorable gentleman whom I am glad to see in his seat, an argument which I desired to answer at that time; but being honored with a seat which you now occupy, I was deprived of that pleasure. Not believing that this question would so soon come up, or, in other words, not dreaming that the debate upon the report of the Committee of Ways and Means, the civil and diplomatic bill would so soon close, I neglected that preparation which is always useful to a man who would speak instructively to the House, and which is always respectful to such a body as is assembled here.

I do not desire to call the attention of the House back to the measure which was then under consideration. I desire, in the first place, to remark, that my object is to offer an amendment to the bill now under consideration, if the proposition is not already there, making an appropriation of $500,000 to continue the aqueduct, already commenced, for the supply of the District of Columbia with pure and wholesome water.

Somebody, the honorable gentleman on my left, I think, [Mr. SKELTON,] I recollect, and some others, asked why Congress should do this, why the people of the city should not wash themselves; why they should not do their own work, and in their own way? Mr. Chairman, following the advice of the Father of his Country, the nation selected a site for a city, and invited to it none of the appliances of commerce, none of the conveniences of trade, none of the elements of manufactures, but intended it for a place where the representatives of the people should quietly assemble, beyond the noise and din of trade, beyond the influences of the larger commercial marts of the country, and enjoy the peace and repose necessary to that reflection on which laws are made, and not, sir, I trust, without the comforts and conveniences which every man in this country is entitled to.

Sir, that is one reason why Congress has always been called upon, or, rather, why it has always volunteered, to vote money for the improvement of this capital. The population of this city is composed, in a great degree, of clerks. It is generally a community of persons who are depending, day by day, for their daily support on the pittance allowed to them by Congress; and Congress has been always careful not to extend its liberality to such an excess as that those people should become independent of it, nor does it give them sufficient to raise them to that independence which we, who live in other parts of the country, hope to attain and preserve. That, I repeat, is one reason why Congress has always done the work necessary for this city—because it is their own city; and that is why, to prevent dust from flying into the eyes of congressmen, the avenue, which had been macadamized, was pebble-paved; and, to protect congressmen from the inconvenience of walking in the dark, we have lighted the avenues. I might say something about other reasons; but I fear that I should tread on some one's corns, [laughter,] and thus I shall say nothing about them.

But, Mr. Chairman, there is another reason why water should be supplied to this city. I say nothing of the great demands which we members of Congress have for that element of health, comfort, and strength, for drinking.

But the amount of property owned by the United States in public buildings here has great demands upon us for protection from fire; and, if for no other reason, we should carry out this plan of supplying the capital with water, this single reason is sufficient to enable us and to authorize us to make the appropriation which I shall ask you to make. I hope, sir, this Capitol is not destined to be burned again. I hope not; but I say to you, there is not a shanty within a hundred miles of this city which is such a complete tinder-box as is this Capitol. You may look around and see these massive pillars; you may look around and see these marble cornices; and you may look on the floor and see it laid in brick and mortar, and say that fire cannot reach them.

But, sir, there is a dome over the center building of this Capitol which invites fire. There is a nest of dry materials there, covered over with tarred paper, that seems almost to threaten conflagration without the use of the torch—a spontaneous combustion. When, two years since, the library of this House was destroyed for want of water—when $200,000 were lost there for the want of a little water—then, sir, it was nothing but the accidental placing of a military force upon the spiral stairs of the House that kept the fire from reaching that dome. The whole roof, a gentleman on my right tells me, is of the same character. There is nothing in this House but the posts and the persons, but what is subject to conflagration. [Laughter.]

These are some of the reasons why we should make this appropriation. There is one thing which concerns our health very much; for I am making an argument ad hominem, and I am applying my remarks to myself, and to those who are here, the Representatives of the people. There is not a street in this city, not a narrow street running between the avenue, but is in a state so filthy as to engender miasma and disease. I know something of this matter. I understand it well. I was long engaged with the sanitary condition of a large city during the prevalence of an epidemic, and I know what it is that medical men consider as the leading cause of disease, and what is necessary to apply to remove those causes.

But I say there are narrow streets where the impurities are so great that nothing less than a large body of water, frequently turned into them, would suffice to clear them out. Let us, therefore, supply water for their cleanliness, and to promote their health. Salus populi suprema est lex. That is, it should be the first law of the land to keep the people healthy; and, most of all, should the Representatives of the people be in a healthy and sound condition of mind and body. Perhaps, sir, it would be as well for me here to give a short statement of what has been undertaken and done in the attempt to supply this city with water under the direction of Congress.

Its history is as follows:

Congress appropriated $5,000 to enable the President to make the necessary surveys, projects, and estimates for determining the best manner of affording to the cities of Washington and Georgetown an unfailing and abundant supply of good and wholesome water.

A survey, under a small appropriation made by a previous Congress, assisted by an appropriation by the city, had been made in 1850 of Rock Creek, by Colonel G. W. Hughes. The means at his disposal did not enable him to make a survey of the Great Falls of the Potomac. His report and estimate were submitted to Congress, and the result was the appropriation of $5,000 in 1852, before mentioned, for further surveys. Captain Meigs was directed by the orders of President Fillmore, on the 3d November, 1852, to make this examination. His report was transmitted by Mr. Fillmore to the Senate on the 21st February, 1853, and was printed in Ex. Doc. No. 48, 32d Cong. 2d Sess., (Senate,) and has been laid on the table of every member of Congress. In it three plans are examined and discussed. One is to obtain the water from Rock Creek by a larger reservoir and aqueduct than that proposed by Colonel Hughes. One to take it from the Little Falls of the Potomac, elevating it by water power, to reservoirs a short distance above Georgetown. The other is to take it by its natural flow, without any machinery, from the Great Falls of the Potomac, fifteen miles from Washington, and to bring it by a circular brick aqueduct, constructed precisely like the sewers of a city, to a large reservoir on the high ground near Georgetown, and thence by iron pipes through Bridge street, Georgetown, and Pennsylvania avenue, Washington, to the President's House, Capitol, Navy-Yard, and principal public buildings of Washington. The advantages and disadvantages of these three plans are set forth fully in the report, and the last is recommended for adoption.

The debate in the Senate, 28th February, 1853, shows that this matter was perfectly understood, and Congress appropriated $100,000 to begin the work, upon such plan as the President might adopt; provided, that if the water was to be drawn from any source within the limits of Maryland, the consent of that State should first be obtained. Maryland granted that consent, and the President, Mr. Pierce, with full information before him as to the various plans, with the careful and elaborate estimates of Captain Meigs, with the projects of Mr. Salomon, with the report and estimate of Colonel Hughes, on Rock Creek, felt it to be his duty, in execution of the trust imposed upon him by Congress, to adopt the aqueduct from the Great Falls of the Potomac, and to direct its commencement. Land has been purchased for the construction of some miles of it; the consent of Virginia to the purchase of land for the abutment of the dam, with cession of jurisdiction, has been obtained; the land in Virginia has been purchased, and is now the property of the United States.

All the land needed for the aqueduct between the Great Falls and the District line has been appraised and condemned under the law passed for that purpose by Maryland. The same would have been done ere this in the District, but the engineers are waiting the passage of a law by Congress to authorize this appraisal in the District. Such land as was needed for the parts of the work commenced has been paid for, and is the property of the United States.

The commencement of the work at the Falls, the deep cut by which its passes under the canal and leaves, within the first hundred yards, the shore of the river, has been made, and the brick arch which covers it is partly completed. Of the first tunnel, two hundred and one feet are done; of the second, one hundred and ninety-two feet; of the third, sixty feet. The rock excavation between the first and second tunnels is completed; between the second and third a considerable portion is finished; and one hundred and twenty feet in length of the brick aqueduct is completed. It is nine feet in diameter, circular in shape, and will supply sixty-seven million five hundred and ninety-six thousand four hundred gallons daily. A year's study of the plans, and a year's experience in its construction, have enabled the engineers so to improve the location at first made as to give a better work, entirely safe—as it leaves the river immediately, and entering a tunnel, passes many feet below the rocky summit of the hill, and out of reach of the highest floods of the river.

Captain Meigs, in his report, pages thirty and thirty-three, says that he had but three months to make his surveys and plans, but that the work, as then located, could be built for the estimate, and that further surveys would enable him to improve the location, and to reduce the cost. These surveys have been carefully made during the year which has since passed, and the result is a change in the first one and eight-tenths miles of the original located line, which reduces it to one and three eighths miles, lengthening the dam, getting rid of much heavy and costly masonry, of the iron pipes prepared for crossing the canal, and of a portion of conduit, at first located on the bank of the river, where it was liable to be overflowed in freshets. This is replaced by a deep cut on the back side of the canal, which is much cheaper in execution than the other, and is entirely out of reach of freshets, and by increased length of the first tunnel. This portion of the work was originally estimated at $334,000, including the dam. The work, now partly constructed, is estimated, from the prices ascertained by experience gained in its partial construction, at $252,000, making a saving in the original estimate of $82,000 in the first two miles. Such a reduction cannot be expected in the rest of the work; for this at the Falls is the most difficult and expensive part of the whole; and elsewhere the work is plain, and will not be so much changed in location.

But enough has been seen to satisfy the engineers that the work can be built for the sum estimated. Offers have been already made to contract for the whole of it at the sum stated by the engineer, of $2,300,000. A contract has been made for all the bricks for the work.

In the debate on this subject, when the deficiency bill was under consideration, some attacks were made upon the estimates. The honorable gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. STANTON] had heard practical gentlemen say Captain Meigs's plan would cost $7,000,000; but he did not seem to believe practical gentlemen, for he put it himself at $5,000,000. Practical gentlemen often make mistakes when they guess at results; and no man could pretend to give the cost of a great work like this, embracing so many and so different items, without a very tedious and laborious calculation, founded upon accurate measures and surveys. These Captain Meigs has made, and he says the cost will be $2,300,000 for a nine-foot aqueduct, capable of furnishing forever all the water needed for comfort, or beauty, or use, to this Government, and exceeded in the quantity of its supply by only one aqueduct in the world. That one is in Rome, and was built as long ago as the Christian era, and has been delivering ninety-six millions of gallons daily for one thousand eight hundred years, except when interrupted by enemies in war.

If gentlemen have looked out of the windows of this Hall, they must have seen in the quiet, and order, and industry prevailing in the new wing there erecting, since he has been placed in charge of it, evidence enough to satisfy them that Captain Meigs is not only a theoretical, but a practical man, and one who knows how to execute as well as devise.

The cost of excavating rock, $7 50 per yard, was asserted, as though this result must be beyond the estimate. The only place where the rock excavation has cost this much is in the tunnels. Captain Meigs, knowing that he would find a very hard rock in these tunnels, and might find water, and rock liable to fall and break down the arch, sought for the most costly work as a standard by which to estimate. One of the tunnels on the Boston Cochituate aqueduct afforded this standard. There they had to contend against a very hard rock, and great influx of water, requiring expensive pumping. After breaking two or three sets of contractors, the final cost of this tunnel was fourteen or fifteen dollars per cubic yard. This price Captain Meigs took for his estimate, being determined to be safe. No water is met with, and the tunnels are being made at an average price of seven dollars per cubic yard, less than half the estimate. The rock proves to be firm enough and tight enough to stand without arching; and the cost of the brick arch, estimated at two feet in thickness, is therefore saved also.

In debate, this price of seven dollars per yard was applied to all the excavation, earth or rock, of the whole line; and the cost, at this rate, estimated at $5,000,000; while the facts show that this price would suffice to build a tunnel through rock the whole distance, instead of excavating an open trench, putting into it a thin brick arch, and covering it over with earth, as is being done.

The price of the brick work was attacked also; and it was stated by Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky, from information furnished him by a practical bricklayer who had worked on the line, that the bricklaying cost $7 89 per thousand for laying alone, and the bricks cost ten dollars. Hence he calculates an enormous cost for the work.

The facts are, that a contract has been made to deliver all the bricks along the line itself at $8 75 per thousand, and that the real value of the bricklaying is about four dollars per thousand. A very few men have hitherto been employed upon it; and the very workman who gave Mr. STANTON his information, that a certain eleven days' work averaged only about five hundred bricks, told him that some other days' work had laid one thousand two hundred bricks. The fair average will be, with men accustomed to this somewhat peculiar work, one thousand bricks per day; and, at four dollars per thousand, this will yield a profit to the contractors; the price of wages stated by Mr. S. was twenty-five cents a day higher to masons, and twelve and a half cents higher to laborers, than were actually paid. Offers at four dollars per thousand have been already made to the engineer.

The determination of the cost of a work of this kind is a matter of calculation entirely; and the quantities of work to be done can be arrived at with great exactness and certainty. Prices are liable to fluctuations within certain limits. On looking at the detailed estimates in Captain Meigs's report, it will be evident that the quantities are carefully calculated. This is done from measurement, and will, doubtless, prove correct. When we find that, in his desire to make a liberal estimate, so as to be secure of building his work within it, he has allowed no less than twenty per cent, one fifth of the whole, for contingencies, we have certainly reason to believe that no fluctuation of wages can carry the cost, if built according to the original designer's intention, above the cost estimated.

The honorable gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. STANTON] spoke of immense and heavy solid masonry, or concrete, to protect it from the weather! No such thing is necessary; the aqueduct is a sewer under ground, built in a trench excavated through clay, gravel, or rock. It is a hollow pipe filled with water, and covered with earth. We all know that water is lighter than earth, and that bricks are lighter than stone, and therefore, that the aqueduct full of water will be lighter than the earth or rock which originally occupied its place. As the solid earth sustained its original load, there is no reason, as in the walls of a lofty building, to fear any compression or settlement from the inferior weight put upon it, and therefore no need of masonry foundations to protect it from settlement, still less to protect it from the weather. From this it will be protected by a covering of three feet of earth, which will keep off frost. It is not supposed that rain could much hurt the bricks.

No doubt a contract could be made to build the whole work within the original estimate. But a great contractor would do nothing himself; he would sub-let it in small portions, reserving to himself a sufficient profit—while the engineers prefer to let the work directly to those smaller contractors, and to apply what would be the great contractor's profits in getting better work done, so as to build a permanent and substantial work, that will not require repairs. Any one who has seen the abundance of the supply of the city of Rome, and who knows the fact that this supply has been given for eighteen hundred years by aqueducts constructed by the ancients, will look upon the cost of this aqueduct, less than fifteen miles in length, as trifling when viewed in connection with the great benefits it will confer upon the Government and the people for so many centuries.

The estimate provides for pipes to the navy-yard, arsenal, and all the public buildings in Washington. It is supposed that the Government will allow the city to tap these pipes, and thus obtain water for the use of the citizens—the city laying down all the distribution pipes, except to public buildings, at their own expense. It is entirely within the power of Congress to allow this or to refuse it; to turn the care and charge of the whole work over to the city, or, as is most advisable, in my opinion, to retain the control of the aqueduct and mains constructed by itself, and to leave the distribution pipes only to the city.

The gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. STANTON,] in discussing this question in the debate on the deficiency bill, used Captain Meigs's quantities of water in reservoirs &c., and the estimate of Colonel Hughes—while Colonel Hughes estimated for smaller reservoirs, and smaller conduit, and for no pipes to the public buildings. Adding the cost of these to his estimate, we get $800,000 for his small supply instead $500,000; but Rock Creek is not sufficient, as is shown in Captain Meigs's report; and the matter has already been settled by the President, to whom it was committed by Congress.

A remark was made by the honorable gentleman upon my right [Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky,] that there might be errors in the cost of the calculation of this aqueduct. The estimate was $2,300,000. One gentleman said that it would cost $10,000,000, another $7,500,000, and one gentleman was so economical in his guess as to reduce it to $5,000,000—though I believe he was laughed at for it.

Sir, calculations upon works of this kind are upon a formula almost as reliable as those of the multiplication table; and men habitually engaged in such works, men educated to those calculations, where the work is plain and simple, and rocks of an unknown character do not interfere, will give you a calculation for miles within a few hundred dollars; and the accuracy or inaccuracy of the calculation generally will depend upon the rise and fall of materials, and in the price of labor. The calculations were made for the whole work from the Upper Falls through this city, and it amounted to $2,300,000. The only part of it in reference to which the engineer felt doubtful, was the calculation as to that part where he was to take the water by a tunnel through the rocks. In that calculation he did fail; and in the one and a half miles which is finished, out of $334,000 of the estimate he has saved $82,000. So there was some inaccuracy in that. From the moment that he entered upon the excavation of the trench, without rocks, that moment he has plain sailing; and the calculations are upon so plain and simple a formula, that every engineer, who has been at all familiar with such work, can make the calculations.

The cost of the Philadelphia water-works, the honorable gentleman on my right states to have been three millions and a few hundred thousand dollars, from 1799 until this time. That is true. They have cost that amount; but in it must be included the erection of those water-works, the laying down of thirteen miles of wooden pipes, and the substituting them with iron pipes, and all the expenses which have been required to meet the growing wants of the people of that city. A part of this time the works were in operation at a cost of about eighty-four dollars a day for wood to carry on their steam machinery, until subsequently the application of the power of falling water was made. And, sir, these works have been in operation for these fifty-four years, at a cost for erecting and carrying them on amounting to something like what the honorable gentleman has stated. He urged that fact as he urges everything, because it was true; but it seems to me it is a fact which should go very strongly to sustain the calculations which have been made in reference to this work.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky. Before the gentleman passes the point he is now speaking to, I desire to say a word. I did not understand the plan to which I referred the other day in reference to Rock Creek, as contemplating the taking of the water from any point near the mouth of that stream, which would make it necessary to elevate it by mechanical force. On the contrary, the engineer who devised the plan, contemplated building a dam in the interior of the country, some six miles above the factories of which the gentleman speaks, by which twenty-one million gallons of water could be furnished per day. He proposed not only to take the water from the stream above where these impurities occur, but he proposed to take it so high up as to require no mechanical process for its elevation. The estimate of Captain Meigs was, that the entire cost would be about $1,000,000. But, sir, Colonel Hughes, an equally eminent engineer, who had also surveyed the same route, and had devised a similar plan, stated that the entire cost would not exceed $500,000.

My objections to the plan of taking the water from the Big Falls of the Potomac was on account of the extravagance, the magnitude of the work, and the great cost which would be involved by its construction. Captain Meigs himself acknowledges in his report that he had not given that attention to these surveys which the works themselves demanded. He spent only some two or three months in surveying the three works, while a whole year would have been required to have properly examined, surveyed, and estimated for any one of them. He therefore himself acknowledges that his calculations cannot be relied on, and this corroborates what I stated the other day.

Mr. CHANDLER. The gentleman tells the truth now, as he has always done. Let me add, the whole truth. [Laughter.] Captain Meigs did make his survey in too short a time; but, in order to avoid error, he placed the work at the highest price. He has since revised his surveys, altered his plans; and the tunnels now laid are in accordance with his revised surveys.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky. I will here interrupt the gentleman to say that I have not seen Captain Meigs's revised surveys.

Mr. CHANDLER. I have. Captain Meigs, finding it to be too costly to continue to supply water from the Little Falls, he made a survey of the Upper Falls. He found that, by extending a small dam (by small I mean not very high) across the river, obtaining the right to do so, as we have, from the State of Virginia, he could raise the water to a sufficient elevation to run it into this city at the level of the roof of this building in any quantity desired.

This, then, is the plan. By the law which has been passed, it was the plan of the President of the United States. The present President of the United States has approved of it, and appointed a person to superintend its execution. My remarks, therefore, I regard not as not made to fix a plan, not to say that there shall be water-works, but to sustain the plan formed to carry on the works agreed on. It is proper I should add, since I am speaking of the purchase up there, that as advantages are often taken of the Government when it requires possession of certain lands, the director of this business has purchased the land on the other side, as well as on this side of the river. He has possessed himself of the large quarries of stone necessary for the work, and at the lowest rates. Thus it will be seen that the whole matter is in train of being completed. A large portion of the tunneling has already been done.

Mr. Chairman, I am not selfish in this argument. My feeling cannot be for myself. Before this aqueduct can be completed I shall be, perhaps, far below the foundations of any aqueduct. And you, sir, [Mr. ORR,] may be transferred from the chair you now occupy to that in the other end of the Capitol. You may then thank me, if you remember it, for the trouble that I have taken in producing those comforts which will illustrate your dignity.

Mr. Chairman, it is proposed that this aqueduct shall be large enough to supply the wants, not merely of those who daily use water, but to meet the accidents of any time. It is not enough that we shall get one gallon or two of water day by day. It is not enough that we shall be supplied with baths, and all the other conveniences which have now become necessities of refined life. We want in store millions of gallons of water against any act of the incendiary—any act by which the archives of our Union shall be endangered. As legislators, it is thus we should especially act. We should look that we not only legislate well, but that the records of our acts, as well as those of the Executive, and all the things which go to sustain our national honor in history, be saved from the incendiary. These things belong to the legislation which I urge upon you.

With regard to the estimated cost, I desire gentlemen distinctly to understand that there are, as I learn, parties now ready to undertake this work at the estimate made by the Engineer Corps, and to give ample and full security for the complete and faithful performance of it. If gentlemen, therefore, think we ought to have water, and if they think there are parties who will do the work at a less amount, let them say, while we keep our eyes upon the work, and have supervision of it, that we will at least free ourselves from the obligation of paying out more than $2,300,000.

Should we retain the supervision of the work, it will be far better for the present to let out portions to small contractors, and thus to save to the nation the large profits which would accrue to the contractor for the whole; for no man who contracts for the whole of this work would ever think of executing it himself, but would be sub-letting it to others; and the profits which he would derive from this course would accrue as so much saving to the Government, if we let it out ourselves in portions. The honorable gentleman on my right [Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky] speaks of the powers of the corporation on fixing the plans. The first plan, I suppose, is, that the Government of the United States should bring the water through the main street. The articulating by pipes; the underlaying of all the streets by iron pipes; and the conveying water to the houses should be—if they want it—the work of the twin cities; and it would be one of the most profitable jobs they ever undertook. The gross income of the water-works of Georgetown and Washington would be not less than $60,000 per annum, estimating the difference between the cost of water here and elsewhere on the difference that there is between the cost of gas here and elsewhere, and taking into consideration the amount of water that might be wanted for factory purposes.

It will be, therefore, for this Congress to consider whether it shall keep the distribution of the water in its own hands, and appropriate to itself the profits of such distribution, or whether, having brought the water into the city, we shall leave the two city corporations to distribute it at their expense and to their profit, Congress retaining in its own hands the general supervision of the whole work, and doing all the repairs that may be from time to time necessary. That will be a question, however, for us to consider hereafter. Whether this is the proper time to speak of it, I do not know. But no one need have any fear that the income from the distribution of water through the city would not double the interest of the cost of it. And this is aside from all the comforts and conveniences and decencies and proprieties of life which are so dependent upon an abundant supply of water.

I do not wish to interfere with the business of corporations here. No taxes by them should enter into this matter. Nothing of that kind. What, tax a community of clerks, with here and there a rich man among them! The great mass of them are poor. The great mass of them are dependent upon your votes from year to year. They are men of great respectability and worth; men of entire usefulness, but men who, from the very fact of their lack of wealth, are placed in the situations which they now occupy. Why, then, should we levy a tax upon them? We should not do it at all. Let us make the water-works. Let us supply our own buildings, our public buildings, and insure safety to them against fire, which is consuming buildings all around every night, and which has once been over us. Other cities are providing against it.

I have placed before this committee the fact that a competent engineer has largely estimated the cost, and has gone beyond what will really be the outlay, and has given his estimate of it. I think we all shall confess that the public property in this city requires some means of safety of this kind. All of us must confess that there is a necessity for a greater purification of the streets than can be done now, or than has heretofore been done. There are not means in the city of purifying them, and of carrying off the dirt which accumulates in the rear of the houses. It is the fashion in large cities to spread out large avenues, to build large brick and free-stone houses, line their walks with trees, and spread out plans of taste; but go to the rear of these buildings, and decency lifts up its nose with horror. The yellow fever, and all those malignant diseases—yes, and the cholera, as a friend near me remarks—are found lurking there in the heaps of dirt, and in the murky tide which is poured into them from the rear of the dwelling houses. It hence becomes us, Representatives, as protectors of this city, and most cheerfully as the protectors of our own healths, to consider carefully and fully this matter.

I ask gentlemen to take these calculations contained in this report in reference to these surveys to their chambers, and carefully compare them, and then determine what course they ought to pursue. Let them not say that the city should take care of itself. Let them not say that Washington is a great city, and therefore should supply itself with water, the same that New York, Philadelphia, and Boston do. Sir, one poor man, one poor laborer, one clerk, depending upon your bounty, carried out from his family and friends a victim to the nauseous vapors which spring up in the alleys of the cities, or a victim to the water he has drank, peopled with newts and toads, and "such small deer," is of sufficient importance to induce you to furnish the city with a suitable supply of pure water. Sir, the water of the city is growing more and more impure every year, in consequence of the surface of the ground becoming more and more covered with buildings, and exposing less and less surface to the purification of the rains of heaven. I ask gentlemen to consider all these things; I ask them to consider their own health and comfort and convenience; I ask them to consider not only the comfort and convenience, but the lives of the wives and children of their servants here in their employ, and of those servants themselves.

But, sir, the benefits of this appropriation do not stop there. They go to beautify and adorn the metropolis of this great Republic. They go to preserve the archives of the Government from fire. They give dignity and character to the city.

Mr. COBB. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania to yield me a few minutes of his time.

Mr. CHANDLER. I will yield the floor to the gentleman for the remainder of my time.

Mr. COBB. Mr. Chairman, it is not my purpose at this time to make anything like a speech. I had intended to have submitted my views upon some matters which I supposed would come before the House; but, from the course of the House for the last several months, I am satisfied those matters will not come before us. It has been my practice, ever since I have had the honor of a seat upon this floor, not to consume the time of the House unnecessarily; I have always felt it to be my duty to confine myself to the business of the House. But, sir, duty to myself and to those whom I represent, will be a sufficient apology for departing from that fixed rule upon this one occasion. I do not propose to occupy an hour, nor do I propose to say anything upon the question now before the committee. Nor do I propose to say very much upon the Cuba question. But when the time comes for action I am satisfied myself, and my constituents are satisfied with me, that we should act—act promptly, and act efficiently. But, sir, permit me to say, that when that action shall come, I shall endeavor to adhere upon this, as upon every question which may come before us, to the strictest regard to propriety, and to act in such a manner as to leave no sting behind.

In reference to the question of the acquisition of the Island of Cuba, I acknowledge that I am a Cuba man. I am dead opposed to any nation but our own acquiring it; but let Cuba fall as a ripe apple into our lap; let her come when she is ready; and the day when she will be ready is not far distant. We can and are to acquire the island; and, I am satisfied, in a fair and strictly honorable way. So believing, I this day enter my solemn protest against this Government or individuals seizing upon it by lawless expedition.

I shall speak of the repeal of the neutrality laws when that subject is before us. I shall be ready then to speak and vote on the subject. At present I pass it by.

The tariff is a question in which my people feel a deep interest. They hope that the present Congress will act on it. When it is introduced, I shall also be ready to speak and vote on it.

I am opposed to the repeal of the duties on railroad iron. Let the question be presented when it will, I shall be opposed to it, as I have always been. I shall meet it as I have done before, here and at home. However, I am in favor of a modification of the duty on railroad iron. I am in favor of the extension of the time for the payment of that duty. My opinion in this respect I demonstrated at an early day of this session, when I introduced a bill providing for the extension of the time for the payment of the duty on railroad iron to a certain period, if the parties paid six per centum per annum thereon, with the privilege also of payment in transportation of the United States mails, &c. That bill was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means. I am now in favor of that bill, and I am sorry that six months have elapsed of our session without my cherished bantling appearing before this body.

The committee are no doubt prepared to make apology for their conduct to my constituents and the country. Their apology no doubt will be satisfactory to the country; but nothing is so satisfactory to me and my constituents as early and complete action on the matter embraced in that measure. The entire country is interested in it. I cannot conceive how the representatives of iron manufacturers can, in justice and equity, oppose the principle involved. I have said to Pennsylvanians, that so far as the question was concerned, they would do well to compromise on the plan I have suggested. If they refuse to do so, I am not certain, Mr. Chairman, that I may not, with you and others, vote for the entire repeal of the duty on railroad iron. All know that we may be driven to extremes.

The next matter I shall notice is that of grants of public land for railroad purposes—a matter of public and private discussion. You are aware, Mr. Chairman, of the interest I have felt in these grants. We have labored hard together for two years on the Committee on Public Lands; and you, I am sure, are satisfied of my opinions on the subject. When Alabama was not interested—when I could in no degree be influenced by any desire of the State which I have the honor in part to represent, I arrived at the conclusion, and I believe it is a just one, that a proper appropriation of the public lands for railroad purposes would be fair, legitimate, and highly constitutional.

I am strengthened in that opinion principally by the various arguments that have emanated from distinguished persons, and especially from our Chief Magistrate. It is a question in which I feel a deep interest. I had expected, at the proper time, to have given my views upon this subject; but that time has passed, and I will not avail myself of the opportunity to speak upon this question before it legitimately comes before the House for discussion. I will wait in patience, trusting not so much to the liberality as to the desire and exertion of the House to discharge the duties assigned to them in connection with the business of the country. The day may come, though it may be far distant, when the House may again hear from the Committee on Public Lands. That committee has been charged by gentlemen upon this floor, who are fond of making such allegations, with having delayed the business of the House for several long months by making their reports, when the record does not sustain such a declaration.

The Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, I believe, was the next committee called after we were through making our reports. I would ask how far have you advanced with the public business since that time, and where do you now stand? Have you passed from the committee that immediately followed us? This fact alone proves that the charge made against us, of obstructing the public business of the country, is without a solitary particle of foundation. I pass from this subject now, but when the proper time arrives, I trust I will be able to give reasons satisfactory to myself, if to no other person, that grants of land should be made to the several States for the purpose of aiding in the construction of railroads. The object I had in addressing the committee at this time I have not yet accomplished. The remarks I have made, so far, are merely incidental. [Laughter.] I have the honor of being a member of the committee of thirteen that was appointed to investigate the subject of a railroad to the Pacific, and report a bill. The consideration of the bill reported by that committee has been postponed till the next session. If I was, however, to allow the subject to pass without notice on my part, it might be taken for granted that I approved of the bill in all its features. I have sundry amendments which I have prepared, and which I intend to offer when the bill comes up, in order to perfect it in such a manner as will enable me to vote for it.

As the bill stands now, I am satisfied that I could not vote for it, as there are many provisions in it to which I have objections. True, it may be amended in such a manner as that I could support it. But as it is, I say there are a sufficient number of provisions in it to which I object, as, unless amended, would prevent me from voting for this bill.

These views, Mr. Chairman, I thought it proper for me to state, inasmuch as, although the question is postponed for the present, there might be some trouble made for me at home, as well as elsewhere, if my views on the subject were not understood. For I have got demagogues in my district, [laughter;] and there are political aspirants there, who watch me in all directions, and who have watched me from the commencement of my political career.

Mr. EWING, (in his seat.) Oh, that does you good. [Laughter.]

Mr. COBB. My honorable friend from Kentucky states that that close watching does me good. I have no doubt that he is right, because latent faculties may be so obscure in a man that they would not be developed unless he were pressed to extricate himself from some small difficulties. Without that his worth or merit might never be known. [Renewed laughter.]

Well, sir, it is not my purpose at this time to enumerate the various objections that I have to this bill. At whatever time I may conceive it proper for me to do so, I will give my views on the subject, and make known the various objections which I have to it. At least, I may be put down as not opposed to the principle of connecting the two great oceans by railroad. I want to declare here, as I have declared at home; I want to take the responsibility to-day, as I shall always be willing to do whenever I conceive it to be proper, [laughter;] of stating that I am in favor of the general principle of the bill. I state here that I am in favor of the construction of the Pacific railroad, if it can be constructed on the principles of the Constitution, and if it be a practicable undertaking. As the grant of land for the purpose of aiding in its construction seems to be one of the important features of this bill, I want to state dis-tingly, so that I may not be misunderstood, that I am in favor of granting alternate sections of the public lands for that purpose, on the same principle, and in the same manner, as we have made similar donations for other railroads to the respective States. As to the amount of compensation to be paid by the Government for the transportation of our troops, and munitions of war, and mails, on this road after it is in operation, I consider that the amount now fixed is too large, and therefore I object to it. At the proper time, I think I can clearly demonstrate that the sum fixed in this bill is too high. I am prepared, however, to vote for such a remuneration to be paid by the Government for these advantages, as I believe to be right and proper.

Mr. Chairman, I shall not now argue the constitutionality of this question. It will be sufficient for me to argue its constitutionality when I appear before my constituents, if they should happen to have any scruples in relation to it. I mean to state my views before them fully and fairly when asked to do so, though, to tell the truth, I will not have much time to talk to them about anything but their votes. [Laughter.] It was my pleasure, after my election to a seat in this House, to associate with my fellow-citizens in the different counties of the district, and I then told them that I believed this Pacific railroad bill was a question which would be before Congress this session; that I was prepossessed in its favor, and that I thought I saw no constitutional objection to it. I argued with them in this wise: that if the Constitution did not deprive the Government of the United States of the right of making military roads through the various territories; if the Constitution did not deprive the Government of the right to fell a tree, dig a trench, build a bank, make a way, prepare a road, level it, and put it in order for the travel of wagons, and for the transportation of troops, I could not conceive that there was any particular difference in laying a few pounds of iron on the road to facilitate such traffic and transportation.

Those are my views now. I cannot see the unconstitutionality. I shall, of course, hold myself open to conviction upon the subject. [Laughter.] I shall consult my constituents; for they may have some new lights upon the subject since I left them. When I left them, many of them had not any constitutional scruples upon the subject. I shall endeavor to convince those who have constitutional scruples about the matter that they are wrong, and that I, and those who think with me, are right. If I should not be successful after doing that, I should either have to resign or carry out the will of my constituents. [Great laughter.] But, in my opinion, my own views are clearly constitutional.

There are various minor provisions in the bill which I shall not allude to. When it comes up for consideration, should I believe then that anything I can say will aid its passage, after it is properly amended, I shall contribute my humble mite to that object. If it should never see daylight again; if I should not be here to meet it at the next Congress, I trust it will have friends enough to carry it through.

Allow me to say a word in reference to my confidence in the passage of this great enterprise when I first arrived in Washington city at the commencement of this session. For the first two months of this session I believed that a proper bill to construct a railroad to the Pacific could have been passed in this House. But, to use the language of one of my constituents, there has come over this House such a masterly inactivity that they are not disposed to consider any important question. Our numbers have dwindled down since the agitation upon the Nebraska question has passed away, and the balance seem little disposed to do anything at all. But I will give my views upon the question; and if I find that they are worth anything at all—

Mr. HAMILTON, (interrupting.) Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him a moment? Mr. COBB. I do not want the gentleman to interrupt me; but if he desires to propound a question politely and properly, I have no objection. [Laughter.]

Mr. HAMILTON. I desire simply to make a remark or two. I also am a member of that select committee of thirteen to which this matter of the Pacific railroad was referred, and I am placed in the same position as my honorable friend from the State of Alabama. He is apprehensive that, if this Congress adjourns without acting upon the matter, he might be placed in a false position, and that it might be supposed that he was in favor of the Pacific project now before this House. I am, as I said; a member of that committee, and I am gratified to know that that honorable gentleman is becoming right upon this subject, and that he is improving. By the time when we shall come here at the next session he will unite with us—a hopeless minority upon that committee; for I think there were but two—the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. KIDWELL] and myself—who did not agree with the majority, and who were hostile to the principles of the bill. I desired, as well as the gentleman from Alabama, to place myself right upon the subject, and I did not think it improper to mention it here and upon this occasion.

Mr. COBB. Such an explanation was not in the least necessary; for I believe the House and the country are perfectly satisfied, without any explanation, that the gentleman is hostile to every project which results in much good to the country. They are perfectly satisfied as to that. [Laughter.]

I am about closing, and will occupy but a few minutes more of the time of my friend, [Mr. CHANDLER.]

Mr. FLORENCE, (interrupting.) My colleague [Mr. CHANDLER] intimated that he would give me a few moments of his time, and I desire to improve the opportunity.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman's colleague has expired; but the Chair recognizes the gentleman.

Mr. FLORENCE. I rise to a personal explanation. I think it very proper that I should make it at this time, and I am much obliged to the Chair for giving me the opportunity to do so.

During my absence from the city, there has been a good deal of concern—and strange enough too—about the course that I would pursue in reference to the appropriations for the District of Columbia.

Well, now, sir, while I do not care much what correspondents or editors of newspapers say of me—and they have said a good many things about me long ago, some of which I did not care to notice, and some of which I have replied to in my humble way, through the same medium—I say, while I do not care about the attacks of these persons, yet as this is a review of my official position here, while I acknowledge no responsibility upon the face of God's earth except to my constituents, and to what little sense of right, and convictions of right, I may have in my own conscience—

Mr. HOUSTON. How about the "Know-Nothings?"

Mr. FLORENCE. No matter about them. I say, while I acknowledge no responsibility to anybody else, yet this seems to me a fitting and a proper occasion, to say that I shall continue to vote for appropriations for the District of Columbia when they meet the convictions of my judgment.

A MEMBER. How if they do not?

Mr. FLORENCE. Then I will not vote for them. But, sir, especially in relation to the introduction of water into the city of Washington do I feel a deep interest. I have been a water-drinker for the last fifteen years, [a laugh,] and therefore, it concerns me a good deal that we should have pure water introduced into the city; and I shall cheerfully vote for an appropriation for that purpose, both for this reason, and for the reasons elaborately and eloquently urged by my colleague, [Mr. CHANDLER,] who has but a few minutes ago taken his seat.

I desire to state in general terms that, in my course with reference to all appropriations for the benefit of the District, nothing will influence my vote except a sense of right; and as this appropriation for the introduction of water does especially commend itself to my sense of right, I shall take pleasure in voting for it.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky, obtained the floor.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Make your speech to-morrow.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I desire to ask the Chair a question. Does not the debate close upon the bill under consideration to-morrow at twelve o'clock?

The CHAIRMAN. That is the order of the House.

Mr. JONES. Then if the committee rises now, the gentleman will not be able to make his speech to-morrow.

Mr. STEPHENS. I would suggest that the committee take a recess till seven o'clock.

Mr. STANTON. I would prefer to go on now. I wish to make an explanation in relation to the remarks of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CHANDLER.] I do not expect to occupy the time of the committee for more than fifteen minutes.

Mr. JAMES C. ALLEN. I ask the gentleman from Kentucky to yield me a part of his time.

Mr. STANTON. I would prefer to say what I have to say now.

Mr. EWING. I ask the gentleman to allow me the floor for a single moment, simply to ask the Chair a question. I have come into the Hall since this debate commenced, and I am told that an appropriation bill is under consideration to which an amendment will be offered making an appropriation for bringing water into this city. I desire to know whether this is the proper time to discuss that question, because I wish to say a very few words upon the subject at some time?

The CHAIRMAN. It is in order to discuss the subject to which the gentleman alludes.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Ohio. I will suggest that when we come to offer amendments to the bill under consideration, and this appropriation comes up, it will then be in the power of every gentleman to express his opinions in reference to it. I myself shall have something to say.

The CHAIRMAN. It can be done under the five-minute debate.

Mr. TAYLOR. Yes, sir, and I will say that, in my opinion, the five-minute debate is the most sensible debate we have in Congress.

Mr. JAMES C. ALLEN. It was my purpose to have addressed the committee on the subject of the Pacific railroad; but as it is growing late, and I do not desire to detain the committee, I shall, with their permission, publish my remarks.

[Cries of "Agreed!"]

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I had not the slightest expectation of participating in this debate when I came to the House; but the remarks of my honorable friend from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CHANDLER,] which seem to have been deliberately prepared as a reply to what I deemed it my duty to say upon a former occasion, make it necessary that I should occupy the attention of the committee for a short time.

I recollect very well when the appropriation which authorized the commencement of this stupendous project for supplying Washington and Georgetown with water was first introduced into this House. It came in the shape of an amendment by the Senate to the civil and diplomatic appropriation bill, and was promptly rejected by this body. It appropriated $100,000, "to be expended under the direction of the President of the United States, for the purpose of bringing water into the city of Washington, upon such plans, and from such places, as he might approve." This, sir, was the proposition made in the last hours of the session, and by this House repudiated. The Senate adhered to its amendment, and upon the recommendation of a committee of conference it was agreed to, not because it was approved, but for the reason that, if again rejected, the fate of the whole appropriation bill might be endangered. I will venture to assert, that upon the naked proposition to appropriate $100,000, with the understanding that it was but the commencement of an expenditure which would be counted by millions, not twenty votes could have been obtained in this House. Sir, no one who assented to the appropriation ever dreamed for a moment that the work would be projected upon so grand and magnificent a scale. What Democrat in this House could have faced his constituents, after giving his sanction to an appropriation involving the expenditure of several millions of the people's money for such a purpose?

It has been said, that by the appropriation of $100,000 to commence the work, we approved the plan, and therefore cannot now repudiate it. I deny that we did any such thing. The plans were not before us. The report of the lieutenant of engineers, who made the surveys and devised the several projects from which the President subsequently selected, was only communicated to the Senate a few days before the adjournment, and was not printed until after the members had left for their homes. The very amendment of the Senate making the appropriation authorized the President to select the plan, not restricting him to the schemes of the lieutenant of engineers, but giving him discretion to select any reasonable plan. Other surveys had been made by eminent civil as well as military engineers, and were before Congress. This body indorsed no plan, approved no plan; but left the whole matter to the President, in full faith that he would not transcend a reasonable limit in the exercise of that discretion with which he was invested. If he has been misled by plausible, but deceptive estimates; if he has been deceived by hasty surveys and well executed drawings, surely this Congress is under no obligation to ratify and affirm what he has done.

It will be remembered, Mr. Chairman, that the opposition which I made to this measure a few weeks ago, and which seems to have attracted attention, not only here, but elsewhere, was based upon the extravagance of the scheme, and the wretched policy of executing it under the management of an officer of the United States Army. I did not object to the project simply because it provided water for the District, but for the reasons I have given, and these alone. I avow now, sir, that I am willing to vote any reasonable sum of money for any efficient means of supplying the public buildings and public grounds of the District with an ample quantity of water. I will go so far as to say, that I regard the necessity of having an abundant supply of water so great, that I will not oppose even the plan of Captain Meigs, if I can be assured the work can be executed at a cost not to exceed his estimates. But I regard that as utterly impossible. My convictions upon that point cannot be shaken. While the work remains under the management of the War Department, while a military engineer is in charge of it, there is not the slightest hope that it can be completed for the sum estimated. While I have no faith in the accuracy of the estimates, I have infinitely less in the economical management of work by officers of the Army.

Mr. CHANDLER. My friend will allow me a single remark. I see what is the drift of his remarks. He knows how much I sympathize with him in his views. These parties are ready to fulfill the contract for the price.

Mr. STANTON. I was just reaching that point; and I am happy to assure my honorable friend, that if, when he offers his amendment, he will provide that the work shall be given to responsible contractors, who will bind themselves to complete it in all respects as designed by the engineer, and give bond, with ample security, for its faithful performance, at an entire cost not exceeding the estimate of $2,300,000; and will also provide that the work shall be done under the direction of the President, or Secretary of the Interior, and supervised by a competent civil engineer, I will most cheerfully vote for the appropriation. With these provisions, the amendment of my friend will receive my cordial support. He knows well that I am not hostile to the interests of the District; and I assure him that he is not more friendly to the object of providing a copious supply of water for the two cities than I. At the same time, he must allow me to say, that while I know he has full confidence in his own belief in the practicability of having the work executed for the sum named, I do not believe that any responsible man, capable of doing it, will give bond, and undertake its execution. At any rate, the experiment can be tried, and if the friends of the measure have confidence in the estimates, let them support the proposition which I have indicated. They shall have my cooperation.

The honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CHANDLER] admits that my statement as to the cost of excavating the tunnel ($7 50 per cubic yard) was correct; but he avoids the effect of it, by stating that the engineer's estimates were twice that sum. The data upon which the estimates are made, as exhibited in the report, are so meager and vague, that it is impossible to obtain from them any correct idea of the cost of any specific part of the work. How much is to be charged to the actual labor of excavating a cubic yard, and how much to the necessary expenses of making preparations, providing tools, removing debris, superintendence, &c., cannot be determined from the estimates. But, admitting the estimate was fifteen dollars per yard, and the actual cost seven dollars and fifty cents, it only shows that he missed the true sum one hundred per cent. This may be considered near enough for the guess of a military officer; and if all his estimates are as wide of the mark as this, my worst fears as to the ultimate cost of the work may be realized. The expose I made on a former occasion, of the actual cost of laying a few thousand bricks in the conduit, as calculated by the workman who actually laid them, shows that if the engineer went above the actual cost of excavating, in his estimates, he fell far below it in estimating for the brick work. The excavation of the tunnels is but an inconsiderable portion of the work, compared to the brick masonry.

The honorable gentleman attests the accuracy of my statement in regard to the total cost of supplying Philadelphia with water for a period of fifty-four years. I set it down at $3,200,000, and this he frankly admits to be correct. Now, sir, I appeal to the intelligence and good sense of the members of this committee to say, if the city of Philadelphia, with its immense, active population, has been supplied with water for all purposes for fifty-four years, at a total cost not exceeding that sum, the cities of the District, with scarcely one sixth of the inhabitants, ought not to be supplied at an infinitely less sum? So different are the ideas of the engineers of the army from those of the practical business population of Philadelphia, that what it has cost them to construct and reconstruct water-works, and keep them in operation for more than half a century, is deemed hardly sufficient to begin with in this District!

Something has been said in reference to the location of the dam at the Great Falls; and the impression is created that the engineer has obtained the right to build it without trespassing upon the rights of individuals. If I am not misinformed, the controversy has not been settled; and if the work is authorized to proceed, there will be embarrassment, if not a stoppage of the work, by the interposition of the courts. The engineer rejected all overtures for a compromise and settlement of these difficulties with the riparian proprietors at the Falls, and he has no power under the act of Virginia, or the law of Congress, to condemn property in Virginia, or trespass upon their water rights, reserved especially as they are by acts of both the Maryland and Virginia Legislatures. The law of Congress in reference to the water-works did not authorize the purchase of a foot of land in Virginia; and yet, the engineer, with a latitude I do not understand, has purchased, in the name of the Government, some ten acres of land above the Falls, and above the land owned by the contesting parties, on the Virginia shore, and proposes to construct a diagonal dam across the river to that point, not only thus increasing the expenses, but withdrawing from the proprietors of water rights at the Falls daily sixty-seven millions of gallons of the water, which, under the laws of Virginia and Maryland, too, they have a right to use undiminished. The Government has not yet asked or obtained from Virginia the right thus to use the property of her citizens, even by condemning and paying for it; and the engineer, if he persists in his purpose, will commit a high-handed wrong upon these citizens. The water in the Potomac, above tide-water, may be used by the public for purposes of navigation; but obstructions which affect either the navigation or the rights of riparian proprietors cannot, even by the power of this Federal Government, be placed in the river. The engineer says, in his report, that a portion of the water conveyed to the District by his aqueduct, and drawn from the dam above these proprietors, will be used for manufacturing purposes. Is it possible that this Congress will justify the wrong which this would do to the proprietors of the water-rights at the Falls? Of what value would be water-power there for manufacturing purposes, if the Government should give its revenues to bring it sixteen miles nearer to the point of business, where it could be obtained for nothing? In my judgment, these gentlemen have substantial rights, which are likely to be seriously interfered with; and it certainly is prudent and wise, before we make any appropriation to continue the work, to see that the existing controversy is settled, or at least know that the work at its initial point can proceed without embarrassment to the Government, or trespass upon the rights of citizens. I am assured, sir, by the highly respectable gentleman to whom I have referred, that the whole difficulty could be arranged, to the mutual interest of both the Government and them, if a proper spirit were manifested by the engineer. I have read the correspondence between them and the engineer, commenced by the latter, and am constrained to say; that if published, would show a haughtiness of bearing and an arrogance of tone upon the part of the engineer, which leaves but little room to hope that through him any amicable arrangement could be made.

I did not expect, Mr. Chairman, to be drawn into this debate, and should have kept silent, but for the speech of my honorable friend, who has opened up a subject with which I am somewhat familiar, and to which I have given some attention. As I am on the floor, I will avail myself of the occasion to refer to the practice which has prevailed in the policy of our Government for many years, of assigning military officers to the construction of civil works and other duties of a purely civil character, and the enormous abuses which have grown up under the system. If time would allow, I think I could lay before this House such an array of facts as would induce every gentleman to unite with me in the effort which I am making, and shall continue to make while I have the honor of a seat on this floor, to destroy the system in its full extent—to break up the practice wherever it exists, and confine the operations of the War Department and the officers of the Army to those duties which, under the Constitution, rightfully and appropriately belong to them.

My distinguished and eloquent friend from South Carolina, [Mr. KERR], in a fervent and eloquent manner, announced to this House a few days ago that the Democratic party had come into power pledged to certain measures of reform which had not yet been accomplished, and appealed to the members not to adjourn until some adequate effort had been made to effect them. I concurred with him most heartily in both his declarations and his purpose. But, sir, a modification of the tariff, by which the burdens of taxation upon the people may be relieved, though important and much to be desired, is not the only measure of reform to which the Democracy, now in control of this Government, are solemnly pledged. A strict observance of all laws in the practice of Government officials, a just economy in all expenditures, proper respect for the rights of the citizen, and a complete subordination of the military to the civil power, are as much doctrines to which the Democratic party are pledged, as any others which form cardinal points in their political creed. If, then, abuses in these respects have crept into the practice of Government, no matter by what agency, it is as much the duty of the Democratic party to arrest them, as it is to adopt measures of reform in regard to the tariff, or any other subject of governmental policy.

That there do exist many abuses in the particulars to which I have alluded there can be no doubt. In the administration of affairs entrusted to military officers, there is not that regard paid to the rigid requirements of the laws that there is under civilians; nor is there the same economy in the expenditure of the public money, or the same regard to the rights of citizens. These truths, sir, I shall make clear in the course of my remarks; for they are no idle declarations. I speak from the record. The great abuse, however, of which I complain, and to which I wish to direct the attention of the people, is the extent to which the officers of the Army have been allowed to engross civil positions under the Government. My Democracy teaches me that the military power should be kept in strict subordination to the civil; but from the practice of the Government during the last twenty years, the military has become almost the controlling power of the Government. I disclaim any intention to attack the present Administration, or to hold it responsible for more than continuing a system which was in full operation before it came into power. While I do not intend by any means to charge those now in power with any agency in originating the practice of assigning military officers to civil duties, I may be allowed to say, that it would well become a Democratic President to set his face against and arrest it. I hope the present Executive will respect public sentiment on this subject, and refuse longer to sanction the practice.

The official testimony published by the House, which was taken before the select committee appointed to consider this subject, will show the number of military officers employed in the management of mechanics and others, in the construction of works of a purely civil character, and having no relation whatever to the military defenses of the country. Largely more than two thirds of the two Engineer Corps are so employed; while infantry, and other officers of the line, are away from their regiments, engaged in writing books, and performing mere clerical duties under other departments of the Government. I need not complain of the injustice which this does to other officers, who are not allowed to occupy such pleasant positions, but are kept upon the frontier, exposed to the hardships of the camp, and required to perform the duties which have been abandoned by others for more agreeable employment. Can any man tell why Army officers should be employed in the various bureaus of the War Department in preference to civilians? Is there no work for them to do elsewhere, and is this the purpose for which the Government educates them at West Point?

A young man who enlists in your Army, no matter how gallant and brave he may be, or what his genius and ability for military command, cannot, by the policy of this Government, rise from the ranks to a military commission. The thing is impossible for him, or any one else who has not passed through West Point, and received his patent from a military board. Those who go through that gate—those alone who can obtain, by the partiality of friends, the right to take that road—can, under the policy of this free, republican Government, reach a commission in the Army. Sometimes, under special acts of Congress, regiments are raised and commissions authorized, and then civilians obtain the appointments. But this is done only in certain emergencies, and form only a rare exception to the regular policy. The West Point men are thus allowed to hold a monopoly of the Army commissions, and the rest of the people are shut out and prohibited from reaching them. Is it right that they should also engross the civil places under the Government? Are your accomplished architects, engineers, armorers, and literary men in civil life to be kept from posts of honor and distinction under the Government that this monopoly in the hands of military men may be still further extended? Is the ambition of the young architect and mechanic of genius to be deadened and suppressed, at the very threshold of his efforts to qualify himself for honorable service under his Government, by the knowledge of the fact that its policy is to encourage the engrossing spirit of the corps it has educated and cherished, by thrusting them into the places which he might occupy with more advantage to the country? I trust this Congress will regard with a more liberal spirit what is due to this class of citizens, and open to them these avenues to distinction and honorable service.

The management of civil affairs by military officers is attended with evils which are not understood or appreciated by the public, because no one cares to examine the subject. I have given it much attention of late, and will, in the course of my remarks, refer specifically to some of them. Military officers are not trained to habits of economy. The very nature of their relations to Government, their education, and their military duties, deprive them of experience in financial matters. They are not brought in contact with the business world; they naturally know but little of the frugal and prudent expedients of business men. They know that the Government to which they are attached has great resources and great wealth, and they fear no embarrassments to its revenues. If extravagance and waste are the consequences of their management of the disbursements of the public money, it is more to be ascribed to these causes than to any other. That extravagance and waste in the public money is the consequence of its disbursement by military officers I am fully prepared to prove. The whole history of their connection with the public works of the country clearly shows it.

The engineer officers of the Army, no matter what civil service they may be called upon to perform, which requires the disbursement of public money, give no bond and no security for its faithful application, as civilians do. Here is the engineer upon this Capitol, disbursing as much as $1,000,000 per year without bond. I allude to him, sir, not for the purpose of implying even a breath of imputation against his integrity; for I would not, if I could, say one word to his discredit in that respect. He is said to be a gentleman of exalted moral worth; and however much I may oppose his views, and object to the position he occupies, I so regard him. But, no matter how honorable and high-minded and scrupulously careful he may be with the public money, I cannot see any good reason why he should be exempt from obligations which are always exacted from other citizens in like employment. We are told by the Secretary of War that there is no law requiring engineer officers to give bond when they are employed in disbursing the public money. No law, sir? Then one should be instantly passed. If you, sir, or any other civilians of high character, are not to be entrusted with the public money without involving your friends as a guarantee for your fidelity, in the name of all that is just why should not an Army officer? What entitles him to such a distinction above you and other citizens? Are Army officers a better order of men? Have they more integrity than other men? Certainly this cannot be claimed for them. If they cannot give bond as other persons in the employment of Government do, then they should not be allowed to handle the public money. There should be no such odious distinction made between Army officers and citizens. All officers may not be like Captain Meigs. There have been, and may be again, men in the Army who are not as faithful as he.

The law authorizing the extension of the Capitol, provided that the money should be expended under the direction of the President, "by such architect as he may appoint to execute the same." Subsequently, a proviso was attached to one of the appropriation bills, in these words:

"Provided, That so much of former appropriations for the extension of the Capitol as remains unexpended, and the appropriation now made, or which hereafter may be made for that object, shall be disbursed under such regulations as the President of the United States may prescribe; the accounts for such disbursement to be audited and paid at the Treasury, in the same manner as the accounts of other civil officers charged with the disbursement of the public money. And said disbursing agent shall report to the President his disbursements and proceedings, in time to be presented to Congress, at the commencement of each annual session, and at any other time when required."

These are the only laws which give power to the President over the Capitol extension. It will be seen that Congress required that the work should be executed by an architect, and at the same time directed that the money should be expended by him, under the direction of the President. Afterwards, it was thought proper to separate the disbursement of the money from the execution of the work, and a disbursing agent, who was, by the terms of the law, evidently intended to be a civilian, and not a military officer, was authorized to be appointed. The object clearly was to provide some check between the officer who designed and executed the work, who made the contracts, purchased material, employed the hands, and had the general supervision of the structure, and the Government. This was right and proper. But, instead of a mere disbursing agent, or paymaster, or cashier, as the law required, a member of the United States Corps of Engineers, who gives no bond, is not only made disbursing agent, but architect and superintendent, having complete control over every other officer, and every part of the work. He makes contracts with whom he pleases; he purchases materials when and where he chooses; he employs mechanics and laborers, and pays for all them by his own check or order. I cannot see the authority for all this. I look in vain for the law of Congress which authorizes it; and if I say that Captain Meigs occupies his position against the express enactments of this body, I give utterance only to what any candid man will believe who examines the subject.

Captain Meigs may be accomplished in his profession; he may know how to lay out the grounds for encampments and fortifications, to construct fortifications and military roads. These are the duties in which he has had experience, and for which the Government educated him. I will not deny him the merit of being a proficient in these duties; but that he was qualified for the intricate and elaborate architectural details of such a work as the Capitol, is beyond all reason. But few men in the world are equal to such a work. Without the aid of the distinguished architect, Mr. Walter, or some one equally competent, he could no more have gone on with the work than he could model and cast such a statue as that of General Jackson. But how has he managed? I propose to say a few words on this subject. Although in 1852 we passed a law requiring all contracts for work or materials necessary for the Capitol, and other public buildings in this District to be advertised sixty days, and let to responsible bidders, we find him, under that latitude usually taken by military officers, rejecting all offers to furnish them here in this city, and sending to Baltimore, Philadelphia, and New York, to purchase them in open market. Several millions of bricks have been obtained in these cities, and transported to the Capitol, at a cost of a few cents less than eleven dollars per thousand. You may see them now in immense large piles standing in the streets and around this building. The Secretary of War has furnished the committee with the exact cost of them; and it amounts to ten dollars and ninety-one cents per thousand; when any quantity required could have been made here, of infinitely better quality, at seven or eight dollars. He also discloses the fact, that a larger portion of the bricks so purchased, are so small that it will take thirteen hundred of them to make the bulk of one thousand of those made in this city; a difference in size of thirty per cent, which increases the cost to that extent.

Mr. KEITT, (interrupting.) Will the gentleman from Kentucky permit me to ask him a question or two?

Mr. STANTON. Certainly.

Mr. KEITT, (to Mr. STANTON.) Was there not a contract made with certain individuals in Washington to furnish all the bricks necessary for the work? Did these contractors not fail to fulfill their contract? Was not the superintendent compelled to purchase these bricks in Philadelphia and New York, or else let all the employees out of work? Has not a bond been given by the contractor? And are not the parties to that bond responsible to the Government for the difference between the cost of the brick thus procured and the price originally agreed upon?

Mr. STANTON. I answer my honorable friend, emphatically no. To the extent to which his questions go, the facts implied are not true. Here is the plain history of the whole matter. Mr. Wendell, of this city, was the lowest bidder under an advertisement made before Captain Meigs obtained control of the work, and was awarded the contract for furnishing a portion of the bricks required for the Capitol, at the price of $5 88 per thousand. In good faith he commenced the work, although the season was somewhat advanced, and furnished more than a million at that price. He would have gone on and furnished every brick required, and, as he alleges made money by the contract, if he had been allowed to do so. But, sir, for economy, he established a yard at Bladensburg, where wood and the means of living were cheaper than in this city, and furnished some of the bricks from that place, which were received and entered into the building. They are said to have been good bricks, and well made; but the place at which they were made was made a pretext afterwards for rejecting them. I cannot undertake to say what was the real motive for rejecting them, for I do not know. It, however, caused great loss and sacrifice to the contractor, and he was compelled to surrender his contract. Subsequently, however, when it was important to commence the work on the aqueduct, a portion of the very bricks thus rejected for the thick strong walls of the Capitol were purchased at a higher price for that work. My authority for this statement is Mr. Wendell himself, who told me they were sold to Captain Meigs and conveyed to the aqueduct. He assured me, that when summoned before the select committee, he would confirm his statement by his oath. I presume, sir, that neither the President nor Secretary of War are familiar with these details.

But why go elsewhere to buy bricks when they could have been made here of better quality, in great abundance, and at a cheaper rate? At the time Wendell took his contract there were fourteen bidders, many of them among the most experienced and responsible brick-makers in the country. Not one single one of them asked as high as eight dollars. The statement of these bids, furnished by the Secretary of War, is in the committee room. Eleven of them are below seven dollars and fifty cents per thousand. About the same time a contract was made to lay the bricks at two dollars and forty-nine cents per thousand; but the contractor, before he had made a single effort to comply with his engagement, was released, and the work done by the day. The Secretary of War informs the committee that the laying of the bricks under this mode of management, costs, on each wing, an average price of five dollars and eight cents per thousand! There were twenty-one bids for the laying of the bricks, and of these but two were above five dollars. Now, here is good management for you under military rule with a vengeance! Every thousand bricks which go into that building costs this Government sixteen dollars per thousand, exclusive of lime, sand, and cement, which, at similar rates, could hardly make the total cost less than nineteen or twenty dollars. This is the boasted economy which military supervision brings to the country.

Mr. PERKINS, of Louisiana, (interrupting.) I have been very much interested in the gentleman's remarks, but have been at a loss to know how much importance to attach to the statements, other than his impression as to their truth. I should like to know if the facts which he has stated here are such as have been given in evidence before the committee of which he is the chairman?

Mr. STANTON. I want the honorable gentleman to understand them as facts, because they are facts, derived from official sources. With the exception of what I gave upon the authority of Mr. Wendell, all the other statements I have made in reference to bricks, and the work done in laying them, is derived from statements communicated to the select committee by the Secretary of War, in answer to interrogatories propounded to him at my instance, and which, in due time, will, I hope, be published.

Mr. PERKINS. Is Mr. Wendell's statement in evidence?

Mr. STANTON. It is not. The fact that he furnished a large number of bricks, over a million, in compliance with his contract, is stated by the Secretary. The other facts relating to the rejection of the bricks from Bladensburg, and their subsequent purchase and use for the aqueduct, rest upon the communication made to me by Mr. Wendell himself, and to which he avows himself ready to testify under oath. This is the authority I have for the statement; and I freely give it, that I may rest under no imputation of making statements which cannot be sustained.

The accomplished architect of the Capitol, who is well and intimately known to my honorable friend from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CHANDLER,] is not only a man of great experience and skill in his profession, but one whose genius and good taste, and high moral worth, make him an honor to his country. The design of the Capitol, in all its beautiful proportions and elaborate details, is his, and no one can take from him the honor of its conception. I know that when he made the original plans and estimates, he made them upon the most economical and prudent scale. His purpose was not to make the work, in any respect, more costly than was necessary. He was a civilian, and had an eye to the cost, as well as to the appearance and dignity of the edifice. The military engineer neither liked his plans nor his economy; and when he assumed control, he commenced a complete revolution in all things. Contracts were not only broken up, as I have before shown you, but the exterior and interior details all modified, changed, and revolutionized. The exterior marble blocks were regarded as too small, and the whole surface of the building nearly doubled in thickness. This brings with it, of course, increased expense. The plan of the interior was broken up, and massive foundation constructed, at considerable additional outlay of money, to sustain the new structure. The Halls of legislation are remodeled, the rooms in the basement darkened, and nearly the whole building deranged.

There are to be one hundred handsome columns in the porticos to the new wings. These columns were designed by the architect to be made in sections of about five feet in length. Such was the plan of the ancients in their splendid edifices, and by many they are thought to be more substantial than columns formed of a single shaft. The engineer, however, had grander ideas than the ancients, and thought differently. He requires them to be quarried in a single piece. They must, therefore, be brought here in blocks about twenty-six feet long, and five or six feet square. The marble for them, in its rough state, would have cost about $650 per each column, as originally designed by the architect; but, under the engineer's new idea, they will cost $1,400 each! The value of marble increases rapidly with the increase of the size of the blocks, because of the great labor and difficulty of securing it in large masses. The columns are to be brought to this city from Massachusetts, and cannot be transported in ordinary vessels. The means must be created, and vessels adapted to the purpose built by the contractors. Yes, vessels absolutely constructed for the sole purpose must be obtained to transport these immense blocks of marble from Massachusetts to the city of Washington. Here, then, is an additional expenditure of over $700 on each of a hundred columns made necessary by the magnificent ideas of the engineer. But this is not all. The working of these large blocks must also cost more, and for reasons which every gentleman can easily understand. They are more difficult to handle, and will be attended with great danger and expense in elevating them to their positions.

When the last appropriation was made for continuing the work on the Capitol, I offered an amendment to it, proposing to apply $20,000 of the sum to employ Hiram Powers an eminent American artist, to execute a piece of statuary for the adornment of the wings of the Capitol. The House refused to sanction it. The honorable gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. CLINGMAN] changed the amendment, and offered it again; but it met with no better fate. The same amendment, or a similar one, was twice offered in the Senate, and twice voted down; so here were the two Houses of Congress, twice refusing to divert any portion of the money intended for building the wings of the Capitol to the procurement of statuary. And will it be believed that, after these emphatic expressions of both Houses of Congress against such an application of the appropriation, $20,000 of it have been sent to Italy by the engineer to procure, not the statuary, but the mere designs and plaster models. The Secretary of War says to the committee:

"Mr. Thomas Crawford, a distinguished American artist, now in Rome, has been commissioned, at a cost of $20,000, to prepare designs and plaster models for fourteen statues, and their accessories, to fill the tympanum of one of the eastern porticos, and to decorate one of the eastern doors. These it is intended to have sculptured in this city, and of American marble."

I need not comment upon this act, further than to say that, no matter under whose direction it was done, it shows but little respect for the will of Congress.

In regard to the alterations of the original plan of the building, there is no less disregard of that body shown. The law authorized the President "to adopt a plan" for the extension. Mr. Fillmore was then President, and under that law he acted. The plan was adopted, and the work had been prosecuted to a considerable extent under it. The law was, therefore, fully executed. It left no power to any subsequent President to adopt another plan, or materially to alter the original one; if so, there would have been no limit to the power, and the President would have the right to construct any description of building he chose, and to incur any expense he might think proper. Such was never the intention of Congress. But we are not left to conjecture as to who deserves the credit for these modifications of the plan, and upon whom will rest the responsibility for the blunders committed. The Secretary of War informs us in his report, at the beginning of this session, that these changes in the plan were proposed by Captain Meigs! They were adopted at his suggestion, with the indorsement of a board of scientific gentlemen.

Let us, Mr. Chairman, look, for a moment, at the most material change made in the plans. And it is a subject, gentlemen of the committee, to which you have given no attention. The original design located the Hall of the House of Representatives across the west end of the wing. It was exposed on the north, west, and south sides, to the light and air, and there were fifty windows by which ventilation could be obtained. You can see from where I now stand the design. It was such as no one could oppose any reasonable objection to. I venture to say that time will test the truth of what I say, that so long as the building stands it will be a source of regret to all who occupy it, that this arrangement of the Hall was not continued. The present plan, as you will see, locates the Hall in the center of the building, and surrounds it with corridors and committee rooms. It is modeled after the Halls of the English Parliament Houses, and will prove as great an abortion. How is a room, thus pent up, in the center of a massive and complicated building, to be ventilated? I will read from the report of the engineer. I will let him speak for himself:

"As the warm air must ascend to the top of the room, I propose to let it do so in a large trunk outside of the apartment, pass into a space above the ceiling, and thence by numerous holes find its way, as through a sieve, into the room."

There it is. Light is not only to be brought in from the ceiling, but air obtained through auger holes, and pumped down upon us through "a maze of hot water-pipes" in winter, and "melted ice" in summer! This is the means of ingress. In what way does he expect to find egress for the vitiated and impure air? Hear him:

"The exit should be through numerous holes in the floor, perhaps through the carpet, or the risers of the platform on which are the members' chairs."

This is a specimen of military engineering, which will scarcely commend itself to you for the wisdom it displays. Does it not reverse all the principles of nature? Natural ventilation is by the ascending movement. The lighter air, instead of passing downward, ascends, while that which is denser passes up to supply its place. The air breathed through our lungs, and the emanations from the surface of the body, are at a temperature of about 90°, while that necessary for the comfort of members in the room should never exceed 65°. Can it be expected that this impure air will not ascend, and be forced down by the descending body of air pumped in from the ceiling to be re-inspired by the members? But the plan is not original with Captain Meigs.

The British Parliament Houses are built upon the same plan, and this identical scheme of ventilation was thoroughly tried, and thoroughly exploded, before the engineer submitted it to the scientific board which indorsed it. The truth is, the Houses of Parliament have never yet been successfully ventilated, and never will be, unless the whole structure is torn down and rebuilt. It was in proof, before a committee of Parliament in 1852, that $1,500,000 had been expended in fruitless efforts to ventilate the Hall by mechanical contrivances. The witnesses who were summoned before that committee were among the most eminent practical and scientific men in Europe. It was shown that so great were the currents and eddies produced by the mechanical contrivances, that the members would sometimes sit with their feet in a temperature of 68½°, the centre of their bodies at 71°, while their heads would be in an atmosphere ranging at 73°. Thus their feet would be freezing while their heads were scorching. Mr. S. W. Daukes, an eminent architect, in testifying upon oath in regard to the very plan of ventilation proposed by Captain Meigs, thus speaks of the pumping down process:

"I think the system is opposed to the natural principles of ventilation, forcing the air contrary to its natural movement, and requiring the constant application of powerful machinery to obtain results that may be obtained by allowing the air to take its natural course."

Another distinguished gentleman, H. G. Price, who had devoted many years to the warming and ventilating of large buildings, gave testimony before the committee, and thus speaks of the same mode of ventilation:

"First of all, it necessitates artificial power, it will not act except under compulsion, then it brings the vitiated and breathed air, that ought to be carried away and not breathed over again, down to the lungs to be re-inspired. It also tends to subvert another natural law by keeping the head in the hottest medium and the feet in the coldest, and the ventilation is arrested altogether if the motive power is not kept in constant operation; whereas, in the greater portion of the year, nature will accomplish it, if allowed to do so."

Other equally eminent gentlemen denounced the plan as "a noxious fallacy," and the committee, before whom the testimony was given, commends to the attention of Parliament the testimony of Messrs. Daukes and Price, and thus speak of the plan of ventilation:

"The plan of forcing air into a building by mechanical power, to produce what is called plenum or plus ventilation, combined with the extracting power of a shaft, with furnace or steam jet, to effect what is termed vacuum ventilation, with ascending and descending current, for the supply of fresh, and the abstraction of vitiated air, is, in the opinion of your committee, a complicated system, and one which they are not prepared to approve."

The report and proceedings of the parliamentary committee, are to be found in the library of Congress, and which I respectfully commend to the attention of the members of this committee who wish to be further informed in relation to the cast-off plan of British ventilation, which the military engineer "in charge of the Capitol extension, the Washington aqueduct, and Fort Montgomery," has adopted for the American Capitol. The whole design in relation to the Hall is a ridiculous folly, and will be grievously felt by those who succeed us. Better had the whole work be taken down than permit such folly to be perpetuated.

But, sir, Captain Meigs is not the only military officer employed in civil service upon whose conduct in the management of the affairs intrusted to him I desire to comment, in illustration of the evils of the policy of appointing them to stations they ought not to occupy. The affairs of the national armories have been under examination before the select committee, and the testimony taken has been printed for the use of this House. Money appropriated for improvements at these establishments is spent with a most lavish and unsparing hand, and with but little regard to the objects for which appropriations are asked; and such is the mode of keeping their accounts, and making their returns to the Ordnance Department, that it is difficult, if not impossible, to determine from anything on record here the cost of any specific object of improvement upon which money has been expended. The present Congress is asked for money for certain enumerated objects of improvement at Harper's Ferry, said by the commandant to be absolutely necessary. He submits estimates for each item, with brief reasons for the appropriation. Congress relies upon these estimates, and grants the appropriations. It will be seen by the following extract from the testimony of a Mr. Kitzmiller, the clerk of the Harper's Ferry armory, how the military commandant manages at that establishment:

"Question. Did the military superintendents at Harper's Ferry, in the management of the armory and the expenditure of appropriations, observe rigidly the regulations laid down by the Ordnance Department?"

"Answer. There was, of course, a departure when they diverted funds from one appropriation to another."

"Question. What improvements were made last year and year before, for which appropriations are asked the present year; and upon what authority were these improvements commenced?"

"Answer. The cistern, for which an appropriation of $1,000 is asked, the repairs to bell shops and boring mills, for which $1,800 is asked, and the tilt hammer, for which $1,300 is asked, under the head of appropriations for repairs, improvements, and new machinery, for the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1855, have been already built, and paid for out of the appropriation for repairs, &c., for this year. In 1846 there was an appropriation made of $16,500 for building a new rolling mill and forge, which was drawn at the time and used for other purposes, with that latitude, heretofore explained, and not for the purpose for which it was made. The rolling mill and forge was not built until 1853, and the cost of them was taken from the appropriation for repairs, &c., for the present year. In 1848-'9, an appropriation for the purchase of lands and houses was made; but as they could not be bought at the time, that appropriation was expended for other purposes. The property was, however, bought, and paid for out of the present year."

"If the appropriations had been applied for the purposes for which they were intended, there would be no money wanting now. I state these facts to explain the embarrassment of the funds of the appropriation for repairs, &c., at the present time."

It will be thus seen that for objects already accomplished, paid for, and actually in use, Congress is asked to appropriate money. The money is not needed for these purposes, and the estimates do not disclose the real motives for which it is needed. The clerk, however, tells us, in another part of his testimony, that if the money is appropriated, they will use it to supply the place of money appropriated for other improvements, which have never yet been commenced, but the fund for which has been applied to other purposes. This system of misapplying the appropriations and misleading Congress, commenced in 1845, and the clerk exonerates the late superintendent, Colonel Huger, from all responsibility under it. But the abuse is one of some magnitude, and serves well to show the disregard of law and economy by military men in civil places.

I tell gentlemen around me that these are but a small sample of the evils which grow out of the practice of assigning them to civil duties. These evils are a mine in which it would be well for the country if members of Congress would burrow a little more. They will find greater latitude taken by these men in the discharge of their duties than is allowed by any other Government in the world, having any pretensions to be governed by the restraints of law.

Sir, the recent falling of the Little Falls bridge is another example of the bad management of military officers in charge of civil works. How the bridge fell, and what caused it, is well known. But I wish to refer to the money expended. We were asked to appropriate $50,000 for that work. We gave $30,000, and $5,700 was borrowed from the corporation of Georgetown, all of which is expended; $12,000 was paid to the contractor for the iron work of the bridge, every cent of which is lost; and what is left for the other $23,000? Nothing but two stonepiers, containing, according to the statement of the engineer, two thousand perches of masonry, including a little patching on the Virginia abutment! Now, according to my calculations, this masonry, which ought not to have cost more than five or six dollars per perch, has cost the Government more than eleven, without taking into consideration the $12,000 lost by the falling of the bridge. The engineer, however, estimates the cost at eight dollars per perch, but does not embrace any of the expenses for tools, scaffolding, and other objects connected with the work. These engineers have their own way of arriving at the cost of work. It is like the practice which prevails at the armories, by which they are enabled to show wonderful economy in the cost of the arms fabricated. It is something like this: they count the labor and materials, and such other items as they choose to make an element in the calculation, but take no account of the immense sums expended for handsome residences, (one of which is said to have cost not less than $50,000,) beautifully improved grounds, and other objects not less extravagant, and for which the Government appropriates money every year. Oh, no! These do not enter into the cost of manufacture. "They are supposed to be worth their cost." And so it is with the engineers. Money expended in buying oxen, procuring facilities for executing the work, superintendence, mileage, &c., are not taken into the estimate of cost, although the Government pays it.

While these engineers are thus employed upon works for which they have little or no qualification, to the extent of two thirds of their whole corps, Congress is appealed to, to increase their numbers—and for what purpose? If those employed in civil service are needed in the duties belonging rightfully to their profession, why not dismiss them from civil employment, and restore them to their military occupations? The Senate has passed a bill, which is in this House, providing for sixty-two new cadets, to be appointed by the Senators from each State, and intended for the Engineer Corps. It cannot be possible that, under the existing state of things, this body will give its sanction to such a measure. The members of the committee, if they will take the trouble to examine the testimony before the select committee, will see names of the officers engaged upon civil works, and the respective positions which they occupy.

It is said these officers get no extra pay while in civil service—that the positions are not agreeable to them, and they would rather be employed in military service. Sir, it may be that all do not receive additional pay; but some of them do; and I cannot be convinced that they prefer other stations. They cling with too much tenacity to their comfortable places. They fight to retain them with too much ferocity for me to believe any such thing. It would be an easy matter for them to be relieved, if the positions were a burden, by inducing their friends in Congress to vote with me to forbid by law their employment in civil service hereafter, while they remain in the Army.

Captain Beauregard, an engineer officer, is in charge of the construction of the New Orleans custom-house. A law of Congress provided, that if a military officer should be appointed to that service, he was to have $3,000 salary, less his regular pay, which was $600. His allowances for fuel, quarters, servants, horses, forage, subsistence, &c., which, I have no doubt, amount to three or four times his regular pay, are not deducted. I venture to say, that Captain Beauregard, instead of receiving $3,000, less $600, receives in all nearer $5,000. No wonder, sir, these officers are sensitive about their positions. But this is not all. The engineer who is in charge of the Capitol has also under his superintendence the construction of the aqueduct, and a little fort somewhere in the northern part of New York. I cannot tell why this fort is hung on to him, or him to the fort, unless it enables him to travel occasionally at the rate of ten cents per mile, or affords him some other allowance. He certainly has his hands full here, and can give but little attention to the fort.

I have investigated the facts in relation to the allowances to Colonel Ripley, in command at the Springfield armory; and his pay for transportation from place to place amounts to a good round sum. His pay proper, for a period of about twelve years at the armory, amounts to $8,786, while the total sum he received in the shape of allowances of various kinds, exclusive of this, is not less than $25,000. While his subsistence allowance was only $3,565 60 for this period, his longevity rations—one additional ration for every five years' service—are set down at $5,418 60. Such, sir, is the way in which these allowances are eked out.

Now, sir, Captain Beauregard, of New Orleans, has not only the custom-house there to superintend, but he has several works of river and harbor improvements under his charge, and several military works. If allowed transportation while circulating between these points, his pay may be increased greatly beyond what I have estimated.

Mr. PERKINS, of Louisiana. Will the gentleman from Kentucky allow me to say a word or two here?

Mr. STANTON. Most certainly.

Mr. PERKINS. The officer of whom the gentleman from Kentucky speaks is known to me by character as a gentleman. He is known to me also as a very efficient—as one of the most efficient—agents the Government has ever had in the position which he occupies. And I should ask the gentleman from Kentucky—although he may not intend these remarks of his to be statements of facts—to forbear making suggestions in regard to him from which, in the minds of others, inferences may be deduced which he would not wish to aver as facts, and yet which will be received as such.

Now, sir, my reason for interrupting the gentleman in the first instance, was the absence of the gentleman [Mr. CRAIG] who is at the head of the Committee on Public Buildings, and who is particularly informed upon the subject—and perhaps, as the gentleman has said, he is the only one, except himself, who is thoroughly informed upon the subject. I know that gentleman, and I have often had conversations with him upon the subject, and his views are directly opposed to those which the gentleman has uttered. He holds the position of chairman of the committee, which the gentleman held last session. His sources of information are the same with those of the gentleman from Kentucky, and I ask the gentleman to forbear statements, which may not be intended as facts, but mere opinions, but which will have all the weight, before the country, as if they were statements made by the chairman of the committee, and also of the special committee, which has had these things under examination. It is known, also, that witnesses summoned before the committee have been examined under oath. I interrupted the gentleman before, because I could not discriminate between what he stated upon his own authority and that which he intended to state as the result of that investigation. I beg the gentleman's pardon, and that of the committee, for interrupting him; but the allusion which he made to Captain Beauregard gave me the occasion, which I was happy to embrace.

Mr. HOUSTON. I did not understand very fully the allusion of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. STANTON] to the superintendent at New Orleans, and I think it doubtful whether the committee understood it differently from myself. The law upon the subject, which, I suppose, is the law which governs the case, I will read:

"For continuing the construction of the custom-house at New Orleans, Louisiana, $150,000, subject to the limitations and restrictions imposed on the appropriation made for the same object at the last session of Congress: Provided, That in case the superintendency of the building be confided to an officer detailed from the Corps of Topographical Engineers, the acting architect be dispensed with, and the said superintendent allowed a compensation not exceeding eight dollars a day."

I did not understand the gentleman as stating it in that way. I understood him to state that he was to have an amount not exceeding $3,000, deducting his compensation as officer.

Mr. STANTON. Is there not another law?

Mr. HOUSTON. The law of the second session of last Congress is:

"For continuing the construction of the custom-house at New Orleans, Louisiana, $324,000, subject to the limitations and restrictions imposed on the appropriations made for the same object, at the second session of the last Congress, as respecting the plan upon which the building is to be erected."

Mr. STANTON. Is there nothing said there about the salary of the officer?

Mr. HOUSTON. There is not.

Mr. STANTON. I may be mistaken; but if I am, I was led into the error by the statement made by the Secretary of War, or by some one of his officers, in which it is stated that his salary is $3,000, less the $600.

Mr. HOUSTON. I do not say that the gentleman is mistaken, but that is my impression.

Mr. STANTON. Eight dollars a day is about $3,000 per annum.

Mr. HOUSTON. True, but here is no deduction. The statement of the gentleman from Kentucky went to show that the Government, or the Administration—whichever it was—was deducting a compensation clearly below the point intended by Congress. If the compensation of the officer was to be deducted from $3,000, I suppose it would include the entire compensation, his rations, servant hire, horses, and everything; whereas, I understand the gentleman to say that the compensation deducted from $3,000 is only his pay proper as an officer in the Army.

Mr. STANTON. I may be mistaken as to the allowance made by law to this officer; and if so, I will most cheerfully correct it. I have the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury, in which he refers to it, and by which I find that he receives the full amount of pay allowed by the act, eight dollars per day, and his Army pay and allowances in addition. In reply to the honorable gentleman from Louisiana, [Mr. PERKINS,] I have to say, that I have not the slightest disposition to do Captain Beauregard injustice. If he had heard my remarks, he would recollect that I professed only to have investigated critically the allowances made to Colonel Ripley, and not those made to Captain Beauregard. I have no idea that any of these officers are in receipt of one cent more than they are legally entitled to under our miserable system of laws.

Mr. PERKINS. It was because I did hear that remark, that I desired the gentleman to forbear remarks which would be taken as statements of facts, and not mere suggestions.

Mr. STANTON. Certainly not. I have stated as facts nothing but what are facts, and there are enough actual existing abuses under the system against which I am speaking to answer my purpose, without traveling beyond what I know, or are proved, to be facts. But I have spoken much longer than I had intended, and, indeed, have not much more to say. Popular sentiment is aroused upon this subject, and the time has come for Congress to interfere and break up the objectionable system. I am well convinced that the practice of placing military men over the citizen mechanics is odious not only to them, but to a large majority of other citizens. But few mechanics who are employed under military officers are satisfied with the practice. If all do not complain, it is only because complaint is regarded as insubordination, to be met with punishment by dismissal. Military men claim the right to act in such cases without question, and there is no appeal from their decision. To remonstrate would be discontent, in military language, while in American workshops it would only be the exercise of a civil right.

Hardships of great enormity are put upon the workmen at the armories, which would not go unredressed in civil life. It is in proof before the committee, that at Harper's Ferry the commandant was in the habit of depriving the workmen of a portion of their hard-earned wages, in the most arbitrary and cruel manner. The wages of piece workmen were regulated by fixed tariffs of prices, and the men earned much or little, as their industry and capacity would enable them. But, at the end of the month, when their work was done, inspected, and approved, if the workmen had, by superior skill and industry, earned more than the military commandant considered a fair average month's wages, he would, without reason or justice, deduct a portion from the amount. This is proved clearly by several respectable witnesses, and cannot be denied. If these men complained, their complaints met with haughty disregard, or were looked upon as insubordination. What redress had the poor workmen? Complaints were idle, and only subjected the one who made them to some greater act of tyranny, if such a thing could be perpetrated. In civil life, the party so treated by his employer could call to his aid the strong arm of the law, and by that means recover what was honestly earned by him. But not so at the armories. He must submit quietly to the injustice, or lose his place.

I do not mean to say that all the officers who have had command of the armories have shown such arbitrary bearing and conduct. By no means. There are some exceptions; but for a greater part of the time these establishments have been under the control of the military officers, the officers in command have been arbitrary and tyrannical towards the men under them. The consequence of all this is, that the dissatisfaction has extended itself outside of the armories, and citizens from all quarters of the Union are memorializing Congress to restore the civil superintendency.

It is idle to say that civilians of proper qualifications cannot be had to fill these offices. I have no patience with those who assert that Army officers are better qualified for these places than other men. The history of the country, the experience of the Government, our own reason, teaches us that is not so. Then why not yield to what is manifestly the interest of the Government and the desire of the people, and forbid their employment in such service for the future?²⁸

Mr. KEITT. Mr. Chairman, I ask the indulgence of the committee while I make an explanation. I am on the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to which the question of the Capitol extension has been committed; and also on the special committee raised for the purpose of examining into the superintendency of the national armories, the extension of the Capitol, the employment of military officers for the construction of custom-houses, and other cognate matters. I believe that the question of the extension of the Capitol has been thoroughly investigated by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds; but the continuous session of the special committee for the last three months, to which I have given attendance, has precluded me from joining in the investigations of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds on the Capitol extension question.

*NOTE.—The following card appeared in the National Intelligencer of Thursday morning:

WASHINGTON, June 14, 1854.

TO THE EDITORS: Will you allow me enough of your space to notice an assertion made by Mr. STANTON, in his speech to day, that I had rejected bricks offered by Mr. Wendell for the Capitol extension, under his contract, as unfit for that building, and afterwards bought from him the very same bricks to use in the aqueduct?

Whenever Mr. STANTON's informant swears to that statement, I shall produce Mr. Tait, the sworn inspector of the Government, who inspected and rejected Mr. Wendell's Bladensburg bricks, and who also inspected the bricks bought for the aqueduct, and he will swear to the contrary. Respectfully,
M. C. MEIGS,
Captain of Engineers.

In answer to the above, I will merely call attention to the subjoined letter of Mr. Wendell himself, which fully sustains me in the remarks made, to which Captain Meigs, in his card, takes exception:

WASHINGTON, June 15, 1854.

SIR: My attention has been called to a card of Captain M. C. Meigs, Superintendent of the Capitol extension, published in the National Intelligencer of this date, which would seem to make it imperative on me to put in writing the facts which were verbally communicated to you by me some short time since.

I asserted that Captain Meigs received from me bricks burnt at the Bladensburg yard; that afterwards, bricks from the same kiln were rejected at the Capitol, and subsequently to their rejection, were purchased by Captain Meigs at a higher price than I would have been paid, under my contract, and shipped from the yard for the aqueduct.

I repeat these assertions, and stand ready, at any moment, to substantiate them by testimony which cannot be doubted in this community.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

C. WENDELL.

Hon. R. H. STANTON, House of Representatives.

I desire now to say that the special committee has taken into consideration only the question of the superintendency of the national armories. My friend from Kentucky, [Mr. STANTON,] the chairman, has made a majority report. In a day or two I propose submitting a minority report upon that portion of the subject committed to us.

As to the disaffection alluded to by the gentleman, my recollection of the testimony is this: One or two of the witnesses who had been superintendents under the civil system, but had been dismissed, did speak feelingly and enthusiastically of disaffection; but when we brought it down to the cause, it was ascertained to be this: the disaffection was because the military superintendent refused to have the armory converted into a cabbage mart and pig sty. Yes, sir, as far as I remember, the disaffection grew out of the fact that the country people were not allowed to sell milk, butter, and various other commodities, to the men during the hours of work and in the armories.

I do not propose, however, to discuss the question. I shall submit a minority report within a short time, one almost entirely of facts and figures. I intend that it shall be a collation and digest of the laws, reports of various superintendents, and expenses under each, in the manufacture of arms, and the number and efficiency of the arms manufactured. Then the House will decide between the two systems.

As to the other matters, I desire to say that no testimony has been before our committee. It is true that answers were given to questions propounded to the Secretary of War; but beyond their application to armories I have not examined them; and I am not prepared to say that I could come to the same conclusions that my friend from Kentucky has come to. I am here, sir, the partisan of no man, and the blind advocate of no Administration. I desire to hold the scales evenly and justly; wherever the Administration is right I propose to sustain it; wherever it is wrong I shall oppose it.

In this matter, as in all others, whenever any man has been called to discharge a high public trust, I will regard him prima facie as having done his duty, and hence, without some reasonable testimony, without facts properly authenticated, I will not conclude that the President of the United States has violated the law, and that the Secretary of War has trampled down the enactments of this body. I mean to say, also, these military men are not anxious to be employed as they are. Major Huger, not unknown to fame for his military exploits in Mexico, who was the military superintendent at Harper's Ferry, told me that he, as well as other officers, would be glad to get rid of the duties connected with the superintendency of the national armories, because they had no additional compensation allowed them, and had onerous duties to perform. I am informed, also, by the highest authority, that the Secretary of War will not furnish the Secretary of the Treasury, or Secretary of the Navy, with as many military officers as they desire. These public men, these men with civil trusts confided to them, have, in the discharge of their duties, made application to the Secretary of War for an additional number of officers, which he has been compelled to refuse. I desire to say, also, in this connection, that I cannot concur in this idea of expelling military men from connection with the national armories. The Government, like an individual, should have the right to seek everywhere for the best talent, and for the best ability to carry out its purposes. Your armories fabricate the arms which are to be put into the hands of your own soldiers, when they go to defend the honor of their country upon the battle-field. Committed to them are the flag of the country and the lives of its citizens. I only ask that the Government shall have the right to do what an individual has the right to do—to seek the best scientific ability which it can find, in order to carry out its great purposes. I do not mean to discuss this question at this time. When the question of military superintendency comes up, I shall be prepared to present my views more fully upon this subject. I am unbiased—I desire to discharge a public duty, and I will not prejudice a great question; nor will I, where the blood of the people, and the honor of our flag are involved, turn the subject over to the struggles of partisan warfare, or the biddings of future political gamblers. When the public interests are at stake, I shall ask no question about the complexion of the Administration.

Mr. HAVEN. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the Chairman reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration the Union generally, and particularly House bill No. 48, being a bill "making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1855," and had come to no conclusion thereon.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. DICKINS, their Secretary, informing the House that they had passed, without amendment, a bill of the House of the following title:

An act (No. 51) for the relief of the widow and heirs of Elijah Beebe.

Also, that they had agreed to the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate to the bill of the House (No. 311) regulating the pay of deputy postmasters; and

That they had agreed to the resolution of the House providing for the adjournment of the two Houses, with an amendment.

Mr. FLORENCE. I move that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and thereupon (at twenty-five minutes past four o'clock, p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow at twelve o'clock, m.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, June 15, 1854.

Prayer by Rev. WILLIAM H. MILBURN.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

CREDENTIALS.

Mr. SUMNER presented the credentials of Hon. JULIUS ROCKWELL, appointed by the Executive of Massachusetts a Senator from that State until the next meeting of the Legislature, in the place of Hon. EDWARD EVERETT, resigned.

The credentials were read, and the oath prescribed by law having been administered to Mr. ROCKWELL, he took his seat in the Senate.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Mr. WALKER presented a memorial of residents of Calumet county, Wisconsin, and owners of land in the Stockbridge reservation, praying to be protected in their titles to said land; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. SEWARD presented a petition of inhabitants of Oneida, in the State of New York, praying a reduction in the rates of ocean postage; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. DAWSON presented the petition of P. C. Miles, a soldier in the war of 1812, praying to be allowed an increase of pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. PEARCE presented the petition of the heirs of Colonel John D. Thompson, late of Cecil county, Maryland, deceased, praying to be allowed the commutation pay and bounty land to which the said Colonel Thompson was entitled as an officer in the war of the Revolution; which was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Mr. WELLER presented joint resolutions of the Legislature of the State of California, in relation to an appropriation for the removal of the wreck of the ship Aberdeen, in San Francisco harbor; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Also, the memorial of J. Rutherford Worster, of the city of San Francisco, California, and other citizens of that State, praying Congress to make an appropriation for the removal of the wreck of the ship Aberdeen, in the harbor of San Francisco; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. SHIELDS presented a letter of J. C. Frémont, addressed to the editors of the National Intelligencer, communicating some general results of a recent winter expedition across the Rocky Mountains for the survey of a railroad to the Pacific; which was referred to the select committee on the subject of a railroad to the Pacific, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS FROM A STANDING COMMITTEE.

Mr. SUMNER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Samuel Crapin, praying to be allowed arrears of pension, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a petition of citizens of Scituate, Massachusetts, praying that a pension may be granted to Josiah Mann, in consideration of his services as a seaman in the Navy during the late war with Great Britain, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was ordered to be printed.

NEW POST ROUTES.

Mr. SLIDELL submitted the following resolution for considerations which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a post route from Stony Point to William Allen's, in Livingston parish, Louisiana, from thence by way of Duncan Blue and Edward Stamp's, to Springfield, in said parish of Livingston; and also a post route from Baton Rouge, by way of Robert Huston's, in Livingston parish, Coe's post office, the French settlement and Bayou Barbary post office, to Springfield.

REBECCA J. BIRDSALL.

Mr. RUSK. The Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, to whom was referred the memorial of Rebecca J. Birdsall, have instructed me to report a joint resolution for her relief. I ask for its consideration now as it is but a small matter which will involve no debate.

The joint resolution was read a first and second time by unanimous consent, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to direct the Postmaster General to cause to be paid to Mrs. Birdsall, widow of Ira Birdsall, deceased, late mail agent for the United States, the balance of pay for the current year's service, to which her late husband would have been entitled if he had lived.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read a third time, and passed.

TEXAS DEBT.

Mr. PEARCE. Mr. President, I have been instructed by the Committee on Finance, to whom were referred several memorials on the subject, and also a bill to provide for the payment of certain creditors of the late Republic of Texas, to report that bill back to the Senate with an amendment, which I send to the Chair. I beg leave to say that the amendment which the committee recommends, in fact as a substitute for the bill referred to them, is not such a one as commands my entire approbation, but it was the only bill which the committee were enabled to agree upon, and it, at all events, furnishes the groundwork for such a bill as may be satisfactory to the Senate, and as may do justice to all the parties concerned.

WILLIAM DUER.

Mr. SLIDELL. I am instructed by the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the petition of William Duer, to submit a report upon the case, accompanied by a bill for his relief. I ask that the bill be now put upon its passage. I think there can be no objection to it.

The bill was read a first and second time by unanimous consent, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It is designed to direct the Secretary of State to audit, settle, and adjust an account of the expenses incurred by William Duer, while consul of the United States at the port of Valparaiso, in Chili, during the year 1852, in the support and defense of William N. Stuart, an American citizen, arrested and arraigned before the courts of Chili upon a charge of murder, and for the transportation of Stuart to the United States after his release, together with an equitable advance upon the amount thus ascertained for the use of the money during the interval.

Mr. WELLER. I move to amend the bill by inserting the words "necessary actual," before the words "expenses," so as to provide for the payment of the "necessary actual expenses incurred."

Mr. SLIDELL. I have no objection to the amendment suggested by the Senator from California.

The amendment was agreed to; the bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in. The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read a third time, and passed. The report of the committee was ordered to be printed.

CHIPPEWA INDIANS.

On the motion of Mr. SEBASTIAN, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill from the House to provide for the extinguishment of the title of the Chippewa Indians to the lands owned and claimed by them in the Territory of Minnesota and State of Wisconsin, and for their domestication and civilization.

It proposes to authorize the President to cause negotiations to be entered into with the Chippewa Indians, for the extinguishment of their title to all the lands owned and claimed by them in the Territory of Minnesota and State of Wisconsin. The treaties are to contain the following provisions, and such others as may be requisite and proper to carry them into effect:

First. Granting to each head of a family in fee-simple a reservation of eighty acres of land, to be selected in the territory ceded, so soon as surveys shall be completed, by those entitled, which reservation shall be patented by the President of the United States, and the patent shall expressly declare that the lands shall not be alienated or leased by the reserves, or their heirs and legal representatives, until otherwise ordered by Congress, and no change of location shall be made without the assent of the President of the United States.

Second. The annuities to which the Indians are entitled under existing treaties, with the consent of the Indians, together with such as may be allowed them for the cession or cessions under the provisions of the act, shall be equally distributed and paid them at their villages or settlements within the limits of the ceded territory; but the President shall be invested with power to cause the annuities to be commuted, from time to time, for such articles of goods, provisions, stock, cattle, implements of agriculture, the clearing and fencing of land, and the erection of buildings and other improvements, as in his discretion will conduce most to promote their comfort, civilization, and permanent welfare.

Third. All the benefits and privileges granted to the Indians shall be extended to and enjoyed by the mixed bloods belonging to or connected with the tribe, and who shall permanently reside on the ceded lands.

Fourth. The laws of the United States and the Territory of Minnesota shall be extended over the Chippewa territory whenever it may be ceded, and the same shall cease to be "Indian country," except that the lands reserved to the Indians, or other property owned by them, shall be exempt from taxation and execution, and that the act passed June 30, 1834, "to regulate trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes," &c., be inoperative over the ceded territory, except the twentieth section, which prohibits the introduction and sale of spirituous liquors to Indians.

Fifth. The President shall have power to prescribe and enforce such rules and regulations, not inconsistent with the provisions of the bill, as he may deem necessary for the effectual execution of the purposes of the act, which rules and regulations shall be annually reported to Congress.

For the purpose of defraying the expenses of the negotiations, the sum of $10,000 is proposed to be appropriated.

Mr. PEARCE. I should be glad to know from the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, the extent of territory which is proposed to be negotiated for, or what is the extent of lands held by these Indians. I should also like to know how much will be required to be reserved to them by the treaty which is thus authorized, and further what is the amount acquired by our last negotiations. I think we acquired some lands from them a year or two since.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. I did not hear distinctly the questions of the honorable Senator, but I am unable to state exactly the amount of lands which is now claimed by the Chippewa Indians in the State of Wisconsin and in the Territory of Minnesota. The amount claimed is very large, embracing mineral country around Lake Superior. The object of the bill is to open to settlement the country, which is very valuable for its varied mineral resources. The proposition does not design to remove the Indians at all. The idea is to obtain the whole of our national domain there, and it is very large. Perhaps the Senators from Wisconsin can give more definite information as to the amount of land owned by the Indians, and which the bill proposes to procure to be ceded.

The terms of the bill require the President to secure a reservation of about eighty acres to each head of a family upon the ceded territory; so that there will not be a necessity for the removal of any portion of the tribe, nor will any expenses be entailed on the Government in consequence of the treaty. It secures to them all that is necessary for the permanent residence and accommodation of the Indian population, and throws the balance of the country open to settlement.

I believe I have now answered the questions of the Senator as far as I am able to understand him. I suppose the amount owned by the Indians is probably seven millions of acres, and in consequence of its being secured by treaty, the whole of it is excluded from settlement. It is very desirable that it should be opened, for it contains a great many copper mines around the lake.

Mr. PEARCE. I have not heard the bill read distinctly, but it seems to me there is something unusual in it. I do not recollect that we have been in the habit of passing bills, in which we provide that the Executive shall open negotiations, and also stipulate the terms of those negotiations. It rather seems to me that a legislative act of that sort is somewhat an interference with the treaty-making power. It also seems to me that if we were to pass this bill, and the Executive were to make a treaty in conformity with its provisions, making the stipulations which it contemplates, the Senate would not be bound to ratify it; and if not, it is irregular, and rather an encroachment upon the Executive authority to indicate the terms upon which treaties shall be made. I should be glad to be informed whether that view is incorrect.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. The Senator from Maryland is mistaken in supposing that this is without precedent. On the contrary we have taken the initiative in treating with the Indians always by an act of Congress. We have always had legislation directing the President to open negotiations. Many of the treaties which have been negotiated lately, and ratified by the Senate, with the tribes of Nebraska and Kansas, were authorized by an act of Congress two years since; and all negotiations are entered into generally under a law of Congress, not conferring upon the President the power, but directing him to open the negotiation, and providing the means for carrying it on.

As to the provision in the bill which prescribes certain features which shall go into, and form a part of the treaty, I would refer the Senator to a precedent which forms a very distinguished feature in the past Indian policy of this Government. It was the old act of 1830, passed during General Jackson's administration, by which the President was empowered to negotiate, upon certain stipulated terms, treaties with the Indians, which were to embrace particular features. And treaties were, to a great extent, negotiated between 1830 and 1836, in strict pursuance of the terms of that law. Everything relating to the Indian policy, and the powers of the Executive, and the Senate, and of Congress, in reference to these matters, was very fully discussed at that time. So far, then, as the precedent goes, that, sir, is full as to the propriety and power of Congress to take the initiative to the extent which we have proposed here.

Independent of the general power or constitutional propriety, there is a great necessity for the adoption of a law prescribing something like uniformity in Indian treaties, which are to be negotiated hereafter. If there has been heretofore, in our system of Indian policy, any evil unmixed, almost, with any good, it is the great diversity which has crept into the Indian treaties which have been negotiated. This bill proposes to rectify, to a certain extent, that difficulty, by prescribing certain fundamental conditions which shall form a part of every treaty to be negotiated hereafter. They are few and simple, and they do not take from the Executive the power to introduce any other provision which he may, in his discretion, deem proper to adopt. It only prescribes in this case, that the Indians shall not be removed from the territory, but shall be planted upon individual proprietary reservations which shall be inalienable; and it reserves to them those rights which are secured by former treaties.

With the solitary exception of that particular provision, I believe there is nothing substantial required by this bill to be incorporated in the treaties, which is not in other bills. It is because we desire some uniform policy for the government of our Executive in making our treaties, that it was thought proper to make it obligatory upon the President as the law of the land which he, as the Executive, is no more at liberty to disregard than is any other officer of the Government.

Mr. PEARCE. If the precedent to which the Senator from Arkansas has referred be as he supposes, it is, of course, in point; but I do not think that anything is due to its authority notwithstanding. It does seem to me to be altogether out of the competency of Congress to prescribe the terms of a treaty, and that is precisely what this bill undertakes to do. It says the President "is hereby authorized to cause negotiations to be entered into with the Chippewa Indians," "which treaty shall contain the following provisions," &c. It seems to me to be an attempt, by legislation, to control and mould a treaty, and to take, in substance and form, an authority which belongs solely to the Executive.

I know it is very common to insert in appropriation bills a clause appropriating money to enable the President to carry on negotiations, which are to result in Indian treaties. To that I make no manner of objection, but this seems to me to be a departure from the general principle, in spite of the one precedent to which the Senator has referred, and therefore a violation of the constitutional authority of the Executive to make treaties, for the bill provides the terms upon which we propose the treaty shall be made. As well might Congress pass upon and ratify the treaties themselves, as direct in advance the provisions which shall form a part of those treaties, and give to them their character.

This, therefore, as my friend from North Carolina [Mr. BADGER] suggests to me, is introducing the House of Representatives in a new character, to wit, the character of a part of the treaty-making power. They may alter and amend this bill, they may strike out any provision which is put in and insert another, and so the treaty to be made is to be made by the House of Representatives, which is no part of the treaty-making power. Practically this may be in itself of no great importance, but it is important that we should adhere to the forms and spirit of the Constitution, and we should not undertake to do, by a legislative act, that which properly belongs, and belongs solely to the Executive authority. I think, therefore, I shall not be able to give my assent to the bill.

Mr. WELLER. I hope this bill will be allowed to lie over until to-morrow. Some serious questions are presented in it, as it now stands. I regard it as a direct encroachment upon the Executive power. It will be, as the Senator has already said, the introduction of the House of Representatives into the treaty-making power. Under our form of government that power is vested exclusively in the Executive and in the Senate. I do not see how the President could approve of this act, because it is a direct encroachment on the part of the legislative branch of the Government upon the power vested, under the Constitution, exclusively in the Executive. I hope, therefore, the bill may be postponed, at all events until to-morrow; and I make the motion for the postponement of its further consideration until to-morrow.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. I have no objection to it. The motion was agreed to.

RED RIVER RAFT.

Mr. JOHNSON. In the last river and harbor bill which was passed, there was a provision made for the removal of the Red river raft. At a subsequent time, and during the same Congress, on the 7th January, 1853, it was thought that the appropriation could be so used as to secure the removal of the whole of the raft for that sum, and that it could be kept removed for a number of years, and application was made to Congress, which passed a joint resolution, which, as it is very short, I will read.

"A resolution explanatory of the act appropriating money for the removal of the raft of Red river.
Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That so much of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the improvement of certain harbors and rivers," approved August thirtieth, eighteen hundred and fifty-two, as relates to Red river, be so construed as to authorize the Secretary of War to award the contract for the removal of obstructions to the navigation of said river occasioned by the raft, to the person or persons who, for the amount of the appropriation, will agree to remove said obstructions, and keep said navigation free from the same for the longest period of time; said contract to be awarded after reasonable public notice."

Thus the contract was to be given to the lowest bidder who would keep the navigation clear for the longest period of time. That resolution was approved January 7, 1853. The contract was offered in that way; but, as it subsequently turned out, no one would bid for any contract to clear out the whole of that raft for the amount appropriated. The consequence is, that nothing has been done with the appropriation. No step has been taken towards the removal of the raft, or the improvement of the navigation at that point, in accordance with the provision in the river and harbor bill. I have a letter from the Secretary of War, in which he says:

"I would recommend that the terms of the existing appropriation for the removal of the raft should be so changed as to enable this Department to use the fund in the manner most conducive to the object for which it was granted."

I ask leave to introduce the following joint resolution.

A resolution relative to the raft of Red river:

Resolved, &c., That the joint resolution, entitled "A joint resolution explanatory of the act appropriating money for the removal of the raft of Red river," approved January 7, 1853, be, and is hereby, repealed; and that the Secretary of the Department of War be authorized to expend the appropriation in reference to the Red river raft in such a way and for such purpose as he may approve, having in view the improvement of the navigation of Red river in and around the said raft.

I ask the Senate, Mr. President, to consent to put the resolution upon its passage at this time.

Mr. SLIDELL. I will state for the information of my friend from Arkansas, as he may be ignorant of the fact, that in the House of Representatives a resolution of a somewhat similar character, in relation to improvements in Albemarle Sound, in which there was a similar restriction, now places the appropriation at the discretion of the Secretary of War. To that resolution which is now pending in the House, an amendment somewhat similar to this has been made by the Committee on Commerce, has been reported to the House, and is now pending. I do not by any means object to the consideration of this resolution, but I mention this to the Senator from Arkansas, lest he should not have perceived it.

Mr. JOHNSON. I was aware of that. This appropriation has been tied up now for some two years or upward, and the time is not very distant when it must revert to the Treasury unless something is done in regard to it. What may be the effect of such action by the House of Representatives as is indicated by the Senator, I do not know. I was aware of the effort being made there; but I will ask that this resolution, which is recommended by the Secretary of War, and which is so necessary to any disposition whatever of an appropriation that is already in existence, be put upon its passage.

Unanimous consent was given for the introduction of the resolution, and it was read twice by its title, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

No amendment being proposed, it was reported to the Senate.

Mr. WALKER. The effect of this resolution will evidently be to leave the amount which is to be expended for the improvement of Red river unlimited. The idea entertained at the time the appropriation was made, was that it would complete the work. It was subsequently thought that it was more than enough to remove the raft, and that it would go far to superinduce the contractors to keep the raft out of the river, and the navigation clear.

We are now informed by the Senator from Arkansas, that it has been ascertained that the mere removal will not be undertaken for the amount appropriated. The resolution which has been introduced proposes to disembarass the appropriation, and put it entirely in the discretion of the Secretary of War, and to authorize him to expend it as he may deem most expedient for the accomplishment of the work sought by the appropriation. Then we are brought to a pretty certain knowledge that the appropriation will not do the work; but we authorize it to be expended nevertheless. When this, then, is expended, more, of course, will be demanded. What that amount may be, we cannot now foresee. We are now establishing, however, the theory that whatever it may be, it shall be appropriated.

I make these remarks simply that the attention of the Senate may be called to it. I do not intend to make any opposition to the passage of the resolution, if that be the course which the Senate see fit to adopt in reference to this work. I think, however, that if, at the time the appropriation was made, it had been proposed to make it towards the improvement simply, Congress perhaps would not have voted it. But it was with the idea, and in fact, under the assurance given at the time that the amount would remove the raft, and make the navigation of the Red river practical, that it was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON. My honorable friend from Wisconsin, I am sorry to say, knew nothing about this thing whatever in the beginning, and I do not think he knows anything about it in any part of it. In the first place, at the beginning, there never was heard such a thing on the face of the earth as that this amount would remove the raft. The clause making the appropriation was a part of the river and harbor bill. It was made by a mere little item which was stuck into the bill, and the gentleman never heard of it, or if he did, it floated across his mind like some dream, and he knew nothing about the subject. Afterwards the members of this, and the other branch of Congress, from Arkansas, came forward and alleged in regard to this work—and we believed, too, from representations made to us—that the whole raft could be removed if we would put a restriction upon the appropriation, that we would get men bound by contract and compelled to remove the whole raft for the sum of $100,000, by giving the contract to the lowest bidder who would keep it open for the longest time. This came up long after the appropriation was made; and the proposition of the Senator from Wisconsin, that the sum was originally appropriated in view of the fact that it would remove the whole raft is all a sheer error. That is the fact in regard to that.

Now, the alarm which the Senator expresses, lest any appropriation should hereafter be made upon this or a kindred subject, may be extended to every other appropriation which has been made. If he will so extend it, I am satisfied that he shall oppose this proposition. This has been a feature engrafted upon every bill from the beginning, which has had connection with the western waters. Sir, it is a fact demonstrated by the Bureau of Subsistence and another bureau, the name of which I forget, that the yearly expenses under our War Department have been greater, far greater, than would have been removed that raft years ago, if the money had been appropriated. Those great expenses have been produced entirely in consequence of that single obstruction there. I allude to the expenses for the supplies of the troops and forts in the West, and along upon the northern boundaries of Texas.

Now, sir, I see nothing in the world here that supports the view of this matter presented by the Senator from Wisconsin, with the solitary exception that the Senators from Arkansas during the last session of Congress, and the member of the other House, equally believed and represented that the whole raft could be removed for the amount, and upon their representations had a restriction put upon the appropriation. All the good which the restriction has done—we believed it would do much good—has been simply to prevent any expenditure or effort to make the improvement. It is necessary that the money which has been appropriated should be used for the object for which it was originally designed. Perhaps this is the only item in the river and harbor bill, which, in consequence of that restriction having been put upon it, lies within the power of Congress to control, and some compunction may act upon the minds of gentlemen, and lead them to say that they will prevent the appropriation of this item; but I beg them not to begin and seize this small item, the want of which will fall hard upon that portion of the country for which the improvement was to be made. Begin the war upon the whole bill, and do not ask me and the people there to insure the fact that this appropriation shall remove the whole raft forever. We cannot do that. We can give you no actual assurance that you would accept, which was not demanded, or executed, or deemed necessary at the time the original appropriation was made; and I think it is late now to come forward and attempt to put upon it any restriction of that sort.

I am sorry to see my friend from Wisconsin take ground like that which he has taken, when it is entirely unauthorized by the fact. It falls hardly upon some of us, when we ask simply that the money which was long since appropriated by Congress may be used for the object for which it was appropriated. It seems to me it is but reasonable that we should ask this. It is out of my power entirely to see why it is that the Senator should feel so great an interest in this matter just at this moment, when the amount is lying in the Treasury, and must very shortly revert to the Treasury, and so be of no benefit at all, unless this proposition be agreed to. It is late to cut us off from it, sir; and I hope my friend from Wisconsin will not insist upon his objection.

Mr. WALKER. It is the misfortune of the whole of us, or at least of a large portion of us, that we can never say anything in the Senate but we must be replied to in a manner that would indicate that the persons replying had no sense of politeness themselves.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. Foot in the chair.) Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield the floor?

Mr. JOHNSON. I do not like to reply to that, sir. I have been pleased to me at all. Lectures from him I certainly do not like. Lectures upon politeness from him, I think, are but little called for, and I shall make no reply to them.

Mr. WALKER. I was going to remark, sir, that I have been charged with having interfered in a matter about which I was ignorant, and about which—if the terms were not used they were implied—I ought to have kept my mouth shut. I do not know, sir, but I hope not, that the language was applied intentionally in an offensive sense; but such remarks between gentlemen entertaining the cordial relations that are entertained, as I had supposed, between the Senator from Arkansas and myself, certainly sound unpleasant. However, I will endeavor to satisfy him that I am not so ignorant of this matter as he supposes.

I remember this transaction perfectly, and I remember when the bill came from the House of Representatives, and no one cooperated with the colleague of the Senator more cordially than I did in accomplishing what was finally done. The appropriation, as it came from the House of Representatives, was for a less amount than we appropriated; and upon the motion of an honorable Senator from Arkansas—I think of one who is not now a member of this body, Major Borland—it was increased, and he brought this argument to bear upon the Senate, that the amount included in the bill would be insufficient to complete the work, that it was useless to make an appropriation of that kind which would but commence the work, without any certainty of completing it; for, said he, it is a work of such a character as will, if it is not carried on to completion, immediately fall back to its original condition, and the whole amount expended will be lost. That was the argument used. It struck me forcibly. I concurred with the Senator from Arkansas when he proposed to increase the appropriation. I voted for it, and I believe there was no question entertained but that the appropriation would be sufficient to do the work. I believe bids were made, but were not complied with, to do it. I think Allanson Sweet, of Wisconsin, a man who is known well to myself and my colleagues, was a bidder for it, but for some reason, because he failed to give security, or something of that kind, the bid fell through, and he has not prosecuted the work. This is my recollection of the matter, and I will venture to say that it is the recollection and remembrance of most of the members of the Senate. In this way the appropriation was made.

It is true, as has been remarked by the Senator from Arkansas, that subsequently, for fear this matter might go, as matters of a kindred nature usually do, without limitation—that is, fearing that the contract might be let indefinitely, under which the fund would be expended, and the work not completed, the members from Arkansas did feel some solicitude, and manifested it here to put a restriction upon it. But the restriction that was put upon it, at a future day, limiting the letting of the contract to the person who would keep the river open the greatest length of time, was made, as was then expressed, because it was supposed that the fund was more than sufficient to merely remove the raft and open the river, and that a portion of it might with propriety be assigned to the business of keeping the river open and the navigation clear. Hence it was that that restriction was put upon the appropriation.

But I am replied to as if I not only knew nothing about this matter, but was making opposition to it. Sir, I concluded my remarks by saying that I made them simply to turn the attention of the Senate to the fact of what I thought was the understanding at the time the appropriation was made, and I stated that I should not make opposition to it. With that remark, I concluded what I said. I think it is well in all these instances, to call the attention of the Senate to such a fact, and for this reason, if this limitation is taken off with a full acknowledgment of the fact, who hereafter, with propriety, can rise to his feet and resist a further appropriation to complete the work? Now, it is brought to the knowledge of the Senate that we are taking off all limitation, that we are entering upon the execution of this work, let it cost what it may; and for one, I shall stand by it, and I shall demand that the Senate hereafter shall stand by it, and that they shall make an appropriation sufficient—if I can enforce it—to complete the work. The Senator from Arkansas misunderstands me entirely, if he supposes that I am opposing it; for there are similar works in that section of the country in which I reside, where, after a small appropriation has been made, and before it has been renewed, the works have been subjected to dilapidation, loss, and decay. But I want the Senate to understand what they are doing when they make an appropriation, so that, if we now pass this appropriation, no one may hereafter rise and say that he was ignorant of what was the tendency of removing the limitation. Let it be removed, I say, with the understanding that we are going to complete the work; and let not Senators charge me further, not only with knowing nothing about it, but with opposing the appropriation, for I am doing no such thing.

Mr. RUSK. This appropriation, when it was originally made in the river and harbor bill, did not contain the restriction requiring the river to be kept open any length of time, but subsequently the resolution which has been read by the Senator from Arkansas, required not only that the raft should be taken out, but that the river should be kept open for navigation for a certain length of time. It was a matter somewhat uncertain, and under the uncertainty no one has been found to risk making the contract for $100,000. With the exception of those mentioned by the honorable Senator from Louisiana, [Mr. SIDELL], this is the only appropriation, I believe, in the river and harbor bill, in which any such restriction as this was made.

I hope the Senate will, therefore, agree to this resolution, and I am glad to hear the Senator from Wisconsin say that he will vote for it. I hope the Senate will take off this restriction. It is a matter of very considerable importance to the Government, as has already been remarked, with reference to the transportation of troops and supplies, and more would be saved in a very short time, if the raft were removed than it would cost to remove it, because it would create a water transportation which would be several hundred miles nearer than it can now be made by land. Besides this, there is a treaty obligation with the Choctaw Indians, requiring the United States to keep open the navigation of the Red river. Under these circumstances, I hope this restriction, which has worked badly, and has not carried out the original intention of the appropriation, will be taken off, and that this object will be put upon the same footing as other objects.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read a third time, and passed.

LEUTENANT MAURY.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution giving the consent of Congress to the acceptance by Lieutenant M. F. Maury, of the Navy, of a gold medal from his Majesty the King of Sweden.

Mr. PEARCE. I desire to submit an amendment in the form of a substitute for the resolution, which the Senator from California will perhaps accept.

Be it resolved, &c., That Lieutenant M. F. Maury, of the United States Navy, be, and he is hereby, authorized to accept a gold medal recently presented to him by his Majesty the King of Sweden.

Mr. GWIN. I will accept that.

The amendment was agreed to. The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, the amendment was concurred in, the joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read a third time, and passed.

INDIGENT INSANE BILL VETO.

On motion by Mr. WALKER, the Senate resumed the consideration of the bill making a grant of public lands to the several States of the Union for the benefit of the indigent insane persons, which had been returned by the President of the United States, with his objections.

Mr. CLAYTON addressed the Senate in favor of the bill. [See Appendix for his speech.]

Mr. SEWARD obtained the floor, and yielded to a motion to adjourn, which being agreed to, The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, June 15, 1854.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. WILLIAM H. MILBURN.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

Mr. FULLER. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to allow me to have disposed of bill No. 242, "authorizing the purchase or construction of four additional revenue cutters, and for other purposes," which was reported by the Committee on Commerce early in the session, and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. I ask that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of that bill, in order to bring it before the House.

Mr. OLDS. I object.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. I call for the regular order of business.

RATES OF POSTAGE.

The SPEAKER. The business first in order is the consideration of a bill, reported by the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, further to amend the act entitled "An act to reduce and modify the rates of postage in the United States, and for other purposes, passed March 3, 1851, and the act amendatory thereto, passed August 30, 1852."

Mr. OLDS. If there be no gentleman here desirous to address the House on the subject of that bill, I will withdraw my motion to commit it, and move the previous question, that the bill may be disposed of.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. I request the gentleman from Ohio to withdraw his call for the previous question, as I wish to offer an amendment to the bill.

Mr. OLDS. I willingly yield the floor for that purpose to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. SMITH. I offer the following amendment:

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That this act shall continue in force two years; and that, at the expiration of that time, the Post Office Department shall be abolished, and individuals and associations shall thereafter be as free to carry letters as to carry anything else.

Mr. S. addressed the House at some length in favor of his amendment, and against the bill as reported by the committee, and the proposed substitute therefor.

Mr. CHANDLER. Not knowing that I should have an opportunity of expressing my opinions upon the subject of this bill when it came properly before the House, I availed myself of the opportunity to make some remarks upon the subject the other day in Committee of the Whole. I do not, therefore, propose to trouble the House with any extended remarks now. I desire, however, to ask the attention of the House for a very brief period, while I reply in two or three words to some remarks which have fallen from the gentleman who has just taken his seat, [Mr. SMITH.]

I remarked, some days since, that letters could be carried along the sea-coast from one city of the Atlantic coast to another, for a penny apiece, and money made at it. That remark I made in reply to what had been said by the chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, [Mr. OLDS,] charging the present postal system as ministering to the cupidity of the East. But, if I am to be taken at my word, and the mail carried by express, I shall ask that the arrangement shall be limited to the fat of the land; and that they shall not have to be called upon to carry letters and newspapers into the sparsely settled portions of the country, where it seems a rate of two cents, or of ten cents a letter, will not pay the expenses of carrying. These letters which pay the cost of transportation so well have nothing to do with that commerce of affection upon which the gentleman from New York so eloquently descants and so beautifully illustrates. There is nothing in them but a commerce of affection for business, and the results of that business. And if you deprive the West of the protecting care of the Government in the transmission of their letters, you throw upon them the burden of a taxation much larger than they are now subjected to, and in reference to which the honorable gentleman from Ohio [Mr. OLDS] complains.

But the gentleman speaks disparagingly of these things, because he says in some instances the Government does not accomplish as much as individuals could have accomplished. He also refers to the slowness with which the Government completes its works of improvement, such as railroads, canals, ships, &c., and then he brings up the mail, as if it belonged to the same category. Why, Mr. Speaker, individuals will construct their own railroads, and they will build their own ships for their own convenience, and just as fast as they are able to convey their own merchandise by railroads and ships, just so fast will the Government convey its mails by the same conveyance. The Government, therefore, will have all the advantages of private enterprise, so far as the rapidity of the transmission of the mail is concerned, and this, therefore, no argument in favor of turning the matter over to individuals.

But the honorable gentleman from New York takes the case of one brother in Massachusetts, and another in Nebraska, and asserts that the brother in Nebraska must pay more for his correspondence than the one in Massachusetts, forgetting that our whole system here is one of compromises, and that those who do most and have most, must make sacrifices to those who do least and have least. And again, if the work of carrying letters is to be abandoned as a public enterprise, and left to private enterprise, and the brother in Nebraska should ascertain that slaveholders were coming in there with their slaves, and desired to write to the other brother to send on Free-Soil emigrants, sir, there would be time enough to people the territory with blacks before a letter would reach the brother in Massachusetts. That would be one effect of adopting a system of carrying the mail by private enterprise.

But, sir, this system of postage did not, as the gentleman supposes, spring up from the intention of somebody to carry letters and newspapers. The very word itself shows that it did not. Everybody knows that it came from the habit of conveying persons by post-horses, and private ways and means; and the Government took the matter into its own hands, for the purpose of insuring safety, as well as expedition, in carrying persons, letters, and papers. Gentlemen who travel, at the present moment, in the mountainous parts of Europe, know that Government provides, at the foot of every mountain post, means of getting over—not exactly snorting horses of iron, or horses themselves—but good stout yokes of oxen, to take persons, papers, trunks, and all public documents up the hill. They will go down, fortunately, themselves there as well as here. [Laughter.]

The management of the post office and the postage belongs to the sovereignty of the country, because it is a way and means by which the Government itself directs its sovereignty to the uses and conveniences of those who cannot derive all the advantages that the thickly settled portion of our country has. While they do that, they impress upon it the sanctity of sovereignty. They give it safety, and secure all of rapidity and regularity that they can. These are considerations of which we should never lose sight. As for abolishing the Post Office Department, I am not astonished at the proposition, since I have seen the attempts to make it a means of national profit. Let it alone. Let it be just as it is now. Do not let us ask for this or that condition. Do not let us talk anything about the franking privilege. I know how popular it is for members to get up and move its abolition. I saw yesterday how every man was ready to cry out that if we were to take a recess no member should be allowed per diem during it. Nobody wanted, nobody expected per diem; but every man wanted to say that it should not be granted. [Laughter.] So now every man who spends his hours in scratching his name on documents, is ready to say that we shall not have the right of franking.

I do not object to seeing my name on the corners of letters and documents, and in that way going down to posterity. [Laughter.] It may as well go in that way as any other. Every gentleman knows that that privilege is a tax upon our time and a larger tax upon our purses, while it is a great convenience to those who receive books and letters from us. And while we lay before the world the results of our labors and the multitude of our talking, while we people the atmosphere with our words, and fill the pigeon holes of our correspondents with the records of those words, we are perhaps letting fall something for the good of those who sent us here. I trust, therefore, that after the honorable chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads has excused the bills which he has laid upon the table as far as he can, he will join with me and the rest of the House in efforts to postpone their consideration to a day when we can or shall not be here to deliberate action upon them. I have occupied more time than I intended and now take my seat.

Mr. HAVEN. Has any proposition been made for the disposition of this matter other than by considering the bill and substitute upon their merits?

Mr. OLDS. I desire that the House should take a vote on the bill.

Mr. HAVEN. I do not propose to occupy more than two or three minutes of the time of the House, unless some gentleman shall desire to make an explanation in reference to what I am about to say, whilst I retain the floor. From what I said the other day the House is aware that, in my judgment, the rates of postage ought not to be increased; on the contrary, if a change is to be made, it would better comport with the spirit of proper legislation to reduce the rates. That would be more acceptable to me. As I understand the bill and substitute now before us, and if I am wrong, my friend, the chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, will correct me, the original bill proposes an increase of the rates of postage, while the substitute provides for prepayment in all cases, and the abolition of the franking privilege. My friend nods assent, so I shall assume that as the main difference between the two propositions.

That being so, Mr. Speaker, I am under the impression that the House had better refuse to pass either of these bills. No great good will come of the passage of either. From everything I have seen and heard upon the subject, I think it will be quite as well to leave the subject precisely where it is. I am of the opinion that it would be better to adopt the substitute than pass the original bill, as the substitute does not propose to increase the rates of postage. It steers entirely clear of the question of compensation of postmasters, about which my friend from Ohio [Mr. OLDS] and myself had a discussion the other day, but the original bill would open up that question again. In reference to the franking privilege raised by the substitute, I think the substitute does not change the existing state of things. Let me say to the House, in this regard, that the substitute proposes simply, that an account shall be kept, and when members shall send their documents and letters free, that they shall be charged over to the contingent expenses of the House, and paid in that way. They go free now, without any charge or any account being kept, and the proposed new system will only create the necessity of new machinery and new clerks, for the purpose of keeping the accounts. The same documents and letters will continue to be transmitted, and the expense paid out of the Treasury, as if the charge were not made. The keeping of accounts will not decrease the expense of transportation, and the new clerks required will therefore be a dead loss. Sir, if we meddle with the franking privilege at all, I submit we had better abolish it altogether, and leave every member, as well as constituent, to pay their own postage. I am, however, contented to leave that subject where it now is.

One word further upon the subject of increase of postage provided for in this original bill. I find, by looking at table D. in the documents accompanying the President's message for this year, volume three, at page 820, that the revenues of the Post Office Department are deficient about two millions of dollars. I wish to call the attention of the House to this table, not for any sectional purpose, but for the purpose of placing myself and some of my friends from the State of New York right with gentlemen from the South, in voting against an increase of postage. Sir, it appears from this table, carefully prepared by the Postmaster General, that that deficiency arises altogether from the condition of things in the States and Territories south of Pennsylvania and Ohio, excluding the State of Louisiana. There is collected in the State of Louisiana postages to the amount of $128,170 18; and there is paid out for transportation of the mails in that State $92,885 29. The General Government collects more money for postages in that State than it pays out for transportation of mails and in conducting all its postal operations there, by $37,749 45.

Take my own State, the State of New York. According to this table, the General Government collects in that State, for postages, $1,175,516 06; whilst she pays out for transportation of mails and all her other postal operations there, only $455,019 76; so that this Government collected out of my own State, for postages last year, $720,496 30 more than she expended in the whole mail and post office service there.

I ask the House to look at that, Mr. Speaker—$720,496 30! Nearly three quarters of a million of dollars of postage is collected in New York beyond what is expended there, and yet there is a deficiency in the revenues of the Post Office Department of over $2,000,000. Where does that deficiency occur? What part of the Union fails to pay its post office expenses? That is a pertinent question now, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. HOUSTON. The statements in the table read by the gentleman from New York will not be controverted, but I desire to remind him, that a great deal of the revenue collected from postage is derived from Alabama, Mississippi, South Carolina, and other States, through which the through mails pass. A large portion of the expense for the transportation of the mail from New York to New Orleans is charged to the States of Alabama, Georgia, and South Carolina, while the revenues are collected at the extreme end of the line in New York, Massachusetts, and Louisiana. These trunks of mail transportation, these great through lines, which cost the large amounts of money. The transportation of the mails by these lines is charged to the States through which they pass, while the revenue derived from their service shows itself as collected in other States. And, therefore, it is desirable that the House should look into this, and do justice to those States in which the expenditure is larger than the revenue received.

Mr. HAVEN. Mr. Speaker, the suggestion of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOUSTON] is a very proper one, and seems to have been taken notice of, to some extent, by the Postmaster General in arriving at the results which I have been stating. Sir, the Postmaster General made up the table from which I have been reading. It is not an estimate of my own. He charges the amount paid for transportation within the limits of each State, and sets down here the amount of postage received within the limits of each State. Now, the gentleman from Alabama suggests that the postage is collected at the ends of the large lines. Well, sir, these lines, of course, have two ends. Those he speaks of have a southern end as well as a northern one. How does it happen in his hypothesis, that the southern end does not pay as well as the northern one? Sir, it is at the northern end that you collect these large revenues; but let me tell the gentleman that the stream of revenue is quite as large, nay, larger, upon the lines that run west and northwest, as it is upon those that run north and south.

The gentleman complains that we make a better show of revenue at the North, because we there pay, and this Government there receives the postages charged upon the letters written in the South, in his State and in his section of country. Why, Mr. Speaker, the very thing I am contending for, the very point of my objection to increasing the rate of postage is, that the men, or the section which pays the postage, ought not to be charged with increased rates. What I say is, that we pay the great bulk of the postages; and the gentleman contends it is a perfect answer to that for him to reply; true, you pay it, but we of the South write and send you the letters, on which you pay it. Now, sir, I grant you that is so; but still it is the money of the men at the north end of the line that pays it. If the gentleman's hypothesis is correct, let him and his constituents pay their own postage on their own letters, and if they do as much business as we, the next table will show a much better state of revenue at the south end.

Mr. HOUSTON. Will the gentleman from New York permit me to make a remark here?

Mr. HAVEN. Certainly.

Mr. HOUSTON. The gentleman from New York has just shown, by his own statement, that the State of Louisiana collects a large excess of revenue from postage beyond her expenditure for the mail service in that State. And so his reply to me is not correctly to the point, taking his own text for it. The two ends yield a larger amount of revenue than the cost of expenditure, even looking at that statement. I do not know what amount may be taken off by the way passage. And that statement does not show that New York pays the postage at both ends of transportation.

Mr. HAVEN. Mr. Speaker, I cannot knowingly be led to do injustice to my friend from Alabama. This is a business matter, and I am striving only for what I deem to be right; but if I had any inclination to do my friend injustice, I should fail in it; for he is one of that class of men who always takes care to demand his rights as we go along.

What he asserts in reference to Louisiana will not save him. Sir, the whole amount of post office revenues in Louisiana forms too light a foundation to sustain so heavy a superstructure of argument as he seeks to load upon it. The entire post office revenues of that State amount to only $128,170 18. True, as my friend says, this is $37,749 45 more than is paid out in that State for the mail and post office service there; but, sir, this is the only exception. It is a solitary case, standing amidst all the southern States, and the amount of excess, it will be noticed, is quite inconsiderable. Why, sir, contrast it with New York—the north end of the line where men pay postage on letters which they send as well as on those they receive—where, in other words, they pay their own postage. There alone, sir, three quarters of a million of excess is paid, which goes to give mail facilities to the South; and after that is exhausted, the gentleman's end of the line demands $2,000,000 more from the Treasury to extinguish the deficiencies accruing there.

I beg to repeat, sir, that I do not refer to this in any unkind spirit, or to excite any sectional feeling. I mention it as a fact disclosed by this table before me, and from which I have read. Now, Mr. Speaker, if the rates of postage be increased so as to make the revenues of the Post Office Department pay the expenses of the transportation of the mails, it will be a tax simply of over $2,000,000 upon the northern and New England States. Yes, sir, much more than $2,000,000, because, under the provisions of the bill to regulate the pay of deputy postmasters, which the gentleman from Ohio and I were talking about a day or two since, from thirty to seventy per cent. of the money collected will go into the pockets of the deputy postmasters. Supposing you put the average compensation of the deputy postmasters at fifty per cent. on the increased rates, you will see that, to raise $2,000,000 to pay the deficiency, you will have to add $1,000,000 more to pay the deputy postmasters their commissions.

Sir, this is a bad business in whatever light it is viewed, and I hope this increase of the rate of postage will be avoided. The proper way, in my judgment, is to pay whatever deficiency there may be in the revenues of the Post Office Department out of the general Treasury. There is no reason why gentlemen should insist upon making this Department a self-sustaining one which would not apply with equal force to the Army, the Navy, the Judiciary, or to our foreign relations. The moneys in the general Treasury belong equally to the whole country. If, after a faithful and economical administration of the Post Office Department, there is a deficiency of $2,000,000, no matter whether that deficiency arises in one section or another, is it not fair to pay it from the general fund? But where it is obvious that deficiencies occur in the South, is it not fair in the North to consent to pay out of the general Treasury, and not ask to make it a sectional charge, or to withhold from the South those facilities for which her revenues are insufficient to pay? By raising the rate of postage, you charge it, to a great, and a very unfair extent, upon the North—the postage paying end of the line of my friend from Alabama.

I appeal to gentlemen of the South, I ask them if it is right? I believe they will not impose it upon us. I am sure, if the case was reversed, I would not think of imposing it upon them.

The North does not ask that her surplus postage revenues shall be paid into the general Treasury, or that she shall be relieved from paying them, and the South be taxed to make up its own deficiencies. No, sir; the North is willing to continue to pay these large surpluses, over and above the cost of her own facilities, and apply such surplus to the deficiencies of the South, and then the North only requires that the balance of southern deficiencies shall be paid out of the general Treasury, and not by a further increase of postage, which the table before me shows so clearly that the North must pay.

Why, Mr. Speaker, I observe by this table, that northern Territories, as well as northern States, yield more revenue to the Post Office Department than the transportation of her mail costs. The States which do not pay, that is, whose postage receipts do not pay, the cost of mail transportation, are Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, Texas, Kentucky, Arkansas, California, Tennessee, and Missouri; and Michigan and Illinois are exceptions amongst the northern and western States which pay.

There is collected in Michigan, of postages, $96,757 19, and paid out in her limits, $136,260 14. And in Illinois there is collected, $175,346 83, and paid out $181,611 19.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Ohio. How is it with Ohio?

Mr. HAVEN. Ohio yields $375,759 72, and there is paid out in her limits $363,182 37. The Territories of New Mexico, Utah, and Oregon, are deficient according to this table.

In strict justice, Mr. Speaker, to my friends of the South, and gentlemen from other sections, who were in favor of the passage of the Nebraska and Kansas bill, I ought to state, that it appears from this table, that the Territory of Nebraska yields $520 18 postage, and it does not appear that there is any charge for transportation there whatever. She, therefore, is to be classed with the States which pay. [Laughter.]

Mr. VANSANT. The honorable gentleman is right in his statements, except upon one point, and that is this: that the State in which the number of the route is located is charged with the expenses of transportation. For instance, Maryland is set down in that table as one in which there is a deficiency. Well, now, Maryland is charged for the transportation of the mail from Baltimore to Wheeling, while more than one half of the route is in Virginia. She is charged for transporting the mail from Baltimore to Philadelphia, while but one half of that route is in the State of Maryland. She is charged, also, with the transportation of the mail from Baltimore to Harrisburg, while but one half of that route is in the State of Maryland. She is also charged with the transportation of the mail from Baltimore to Washington, while five miles of that route is within this District of Columbia. I cite this merely for the purpose of showing that the statements are not unerring.

Mr. HAVEN. I do not doubt that the gentleman from Maryland states the case as he understands it, and, for ought I know, he has stated it according to the facts. But this statement is not warranted by the table before me, and it is not sustained by the allegations of the Postmaster General; besides, sir, if he be correct, it would leave Virginia in a plight still worse than the table shows her; for the gentleman claims that Maryland is now charged, in the table, with a portion of what Virginia ought to bear. I have looked at this table carefully, and I would not speak upon the subject without the documents before me; because, upon a subject which looks to different sections of the country, or to different States, and contrasts them with other sections and other States, I never speak in this House, except very reluctantly, and upon the authority of official documents or good vouchers. The table which I have before me shows the amount actually paid, for carrying the mails, by States and Territories, and the amount of postage collected in the same; and it may be true that in some instances routes which run into other States are charged to one State. Yet that thing regulates itself, for the converse of that proposition is equally true to about the same degree; and if it would not balance itself, it would be only a small disturbing force in the table, in that particular.

That part of the table which relates to the statements I have been making, reads as follows:

D.

The following table shows the amounts actually credited for the transportation of mails by States and Territories, and the amount of postages collected in the same:

I have read, Mr. Chairman, so much only of the table as bears upon the question I have been considering. I may add, that from the preceding part of the Postmaster General's report, it appears that the accurate and entire deficiency in the revenues of the Department for the last fiscal year, including the operations of the Department in this city, is $2,042,031 89.

I have made these suggestions, sir, to give a glance only of this view of the case, and to prevent any one from understanding from what took place the other day between the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. OLDS] and myself, that I am in favor of either of these bills. What was said then was in kindness on his part, I believe, and certainly it was in perfect kindness on mine.

We had best not sanction either of these bills; it is unnecessary and dangerous legislation. I cannot give it the sanction of my judgment. I am very clear in my convictions against the original bill; as to the substitute, I regard it as a much less evil. The gentleman may explain it, so that it may receive my approval. If the abolition of the franking privilege is its only advantage, the new mode it proposes does not show benefits enough to pay for the trouble of considering it.

It seems to me that to allow mail matters sent by members of Congress still to go free through the mail so far as they are concerned, but to charge the postage to the contingent funds of the two Houses, would be but making the whole matter more complex, require more clerks to attend to it without accomplishing any practical result. For this reason and for others which have been urged by other gentlemen, and which I will not trouble the House by repeating, I think it will not be worth while to disturb the existing laws upon the subject. I shall, therefore, as at present advised, withhold my support both from the bill and the substitute, and at a proper time I shall move to lay both upon the table, unless discussion shall show me some virtue in them that I have so far failed to perceive.

Mr. OLDS. I hope the gentleman will not make that motion until I have had an opportunity to reply to the objections which have been urged to the bill.

Mr. HAVEN. Very well, I will not make the motion now.

Mr. COBB. I think the House are very well satisfied with the discussion that has taken place upon this bill, and I therefore move the previous question upon it.

Mr. HOUSTON. Has the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER. It has expired.

Mr. OLDS. I hope the gentleman will allow the question to be taken upon seconding the demand for the previous question.

Mr. HOUSTON. I will, certainly.

Mr. OLDS. I demand tellers on the second. Tellers were ordered; and Messrs CAMPBELL and ORR were appointed.

The question was taken; and the call for the previous question received a second, the tellers having reported—ayes seventy-five, noes not counted.

The main question was then ordered to be put.

[Mr. HENN, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported, as correctly enrolled, bills of the following titles; which thereupon received the signature of the Speaker:

H. R. No. 57. An act regulating the pay of deputy postmasters.

H. R. No. 311. An act for the relief of the widow and heirs of Elijah Beebe.]

Mr. HOUSTON. The morning hour has expired, and as the bill now under consideration is in a condition that it will come up for action as the first business in order to-morrow, during the morning hour, I would like the House to resolve itself now into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, to consider the civil and diplomatic appropriation bill.

Mr. HAVEN. We may as well yield to the suggestion of the gentleman from Alabama, as the chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads desires to reply to what has been said on the bill.

Mr. HOUSTON. Then I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. SKELTON. I move that the bill be laid upon the table.

Mr. OLDS. Let me have my hour first.

The SPEAKER. The motion of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Houston] takes precedence of the motion of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. Skelton.]

The question was taken on Mr. Houston's motion; and it was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. Orr in the chair.)

CIVIL AND DIPLOMATIC BILL.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee at its last session had under consideration the civil and diplomatic appropriation bill. The time has arrived for the termination of general debate, under the order of the House. The gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. Houston,] who reported the bill, is entitled under the rule to address the committee for an hour.

Mr. HOUSTON. It would be impossible, Mr. Chairman, to explain, within the space of an hour, the very large number of propositions of appropriations embraced in the bill. Even were it possible, I do not conceive that it is necessary I should do so. The bill provides for usual appropriations authorized and required by law to carry on the civil departments of the Government. There is nothing unusual in it. I shall explain the amendments which I am instructed by the Committee of Ways and Means to submit as I present them. Waiving my right to address the committee, with a view to save time, I now call for the reading of the bill for amendments.

The Clerk then proceeded to read the bill by paragraphs, for amendment.

Mr. HOUSTON. A typographical error occurs in line sixteen, page two. In order to correct it, I move to strike out of the clause which reads as follows:

For compensation of the officers and clerks of both Houses of Congress, $56,130,

"one," and insert in lieu thereof "seven."

The amendment was agreed to.

The following clause was then read:

For binding documents, $70,000.

Mr. HOUSTON. I am instructed by the Committee of Ways and Means to move the following amendment: to strike out "$70,000," and insert in lieu thereof "$39,375."

This is a reduction made necessary by the fact that the House appropriated a part of this sum in the deficiency bill.

The amendment was agreed to.

The following clause was then read:

For furniture and repairs, $3,000.

Mr. HOUSTON. I am instructed by the committee to offer the following amendment: after "$3,000" insert "$875."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOUSTON. I am instructed by the Committee of Ways and Means to propose an amendment, to come in at the thirty-ninth line of the bill.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Page three, after word "carriages," in the thirty-ninth line, strike out "$2,920," and insert in lieu thereof, "$4,745."

The clause, as amended, will read as follows:

For horses and carriages, $4,745.

Mr. HOUSTON. This is an additional estimate which the Clerk of the House has recently sent to the Committee of Ways and Means. It is explained in a brief paragraph, which I have here, and which I will read, if the House desire it.

Several MEMBERS. Oh, no; agreed to.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOUSTON. I am instructed by the Committee of Ways and Means to propose an amendment to the forty-second line of the bill.

The amendment was read, as follows:

On page three, after the word "members," in the forty-second line, strike out "$10,000," and insert in lieu thereof "$12,500."

So as to make the clause read:

For newspapers for members, $12,500.

Mr. HOUSTON. This amendment is made necessary by the fact that we have increased our newspapers this session.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOUSTON. I hold in my hand an amendment which has come to me informally from the Committee on Engraving. I am satisfied that it ought to be presented, although the Committee of Ways and Means have not acted on it previously. I submit it to the House as an amendment which ought to be agreed to. It is made necessary by our large amount of engraving this session.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Page three, after the word "lithographing," in the forty-third line, strike out "$25,000," and insert in lieu thereof "$70,000."

So as to make the clause read:

For engraving and lithographing, $70,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOUSTON. I am instructed by the Committee of Ways and Means to move to amend the following clause:

For compensation of the First Auditor and the clerks, messenger, and assistant messenger in his office, $29,700—

—by striking out "$29,700," and inserting in lieu thereof "$3,900."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOUSTON. I am also instructed by the same committee to move to amend the following clause:

For compensation of the Fifth Auditor and the clerks and messenger in his office, $14,100—

—by striking out "$14,100," and inserting in lieu thereof "$13,300."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOUSTON. I now move to amend the following clause:

For compensation of the Auditor of the Post Office Department, and the clerks, messenger, and assistant messenger in his office, $132,400——by striking out "$2,000," and also by striking out "$400," and inserting in lieu thereof "$600."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOUSTON. I move to amend the following clause:

For compensation of the Solicitor of the Treasury, and the clerks and messenger in his office, $13,400—

—by striking out "$13,400," and inserting in lieu thereof "$12,500."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOUSTON. I am instructed by the Committee of Ways and Means to offer the following amendment. It is merely the transfer of an appropriation from one head to another, at the request of the Department: In four hundred and sixteenth line strike out "five," and insert in lieu thereof "four;" and in the four hundred and nineteenth line strike out "four," and insert in its stead "five;" so that the paragraphs will read:

For blank books, binding, and stationery, $300.

For miscellaneous items, including subscription to two daily Washington newspapers, $400.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McDougall. I offer the following amendment:

For surveying from Fort Laramie, by Noble's Pass, in the Sierra Nevada, into California and Oregon, and for completing the surveys for railroads between the Mississippi river and the Pacific, $50,000, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I submit to the Chair whether that amendment is in order? There is no law authorizing that survey, I believe.

The CHAIRMAN. The first branch of the amendment is not in order. There is no law authorizing such a survey; and the gentleman from California, by referring to the rules, will at once understand the reason for the decision of the Chair.

Mr. McDougall. I will modify my amendment, so as to make it read "for completing the surveys for railroads between the Mississippi river and the Pacific, $50,000; to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War."

The CHAIRMAN. It is within the recollection of the Chair that there was a law passed at the last session authorizing those surveys.

Mr. McDougall. The House has just postponed the consideration of the bill for the construction of a railroad to the Pacific until the next session. The surveys already made are, in many respects, incomplete. The law authorizing the exploration of various routes to California is a general one. One of the most important routes has not yet been surveyed. The object I had in view in offering the amendment was to secure an examination of the Noble's Pass route, so that a report of the preliminary surveys could be presented here by December next, giving us valuable information as to a great central route. I suppose it is the disposition of the House seriously to enter upon the consideration of this subject for the purpose of action at the next session. The amount named in the amendment, according to the estimates of the Secretary of War, will be sufficient for that purpose, and sufficient, also, for the purpose of completing the surveys already commenced. For the purpose of bringing before the House at the next session, full information upon this subject, I ask that the amendment may be adopted, and upon it I call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. VAIL and BUGG were appointed.

The question was taken; and the tellers reported—ayes forty-five; not a sufficient number.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. CHANDLER. Before we leave the War Department, I have an amendment to offer.

The amendment was reported, as follows:

For completing the works of the Harbor of Refuge on Reedy Island, in the river Delaware, $30,000.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. Chairman, this work was undertaken—

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I submit that this is not the place for an appropriation for harbor improvements. This bill is for providing appropriations for a totally different class of cases, and the amendment is altogether out of place in it.

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

33D CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

FRIDAY, JUNE 16, 1854.

NEW SERIES.....No. 89.

Mr. HOUSTON. Certainly, the amendment is not in order here.

Mr. CHANDLER. The bill is as much for cases of this kind as anything else.

I beg leave to say, that this work was commenced last year, and it would be an immense advantage to have it completed.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would inquire from the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means if there is not a section of the bill under which this amendment would appropriately come in?

Mr. HOUSTON. That amendment belongs entirely to another bill, and is not applicable to this.

Mr. CHANDLER. To a bill into which we are not likely to get it.

Mr. WENTWORTH, of Massachusetts. I believe that provision is made in the river and harbor bill for this very work.

Mr. HOUSTON. There is no such appropriation as that in this bill, according to my recollection. I believe I may say, further, that no such appropriation has ever been made in the civil and diplomatic bill. If that appropriation were allowed to go into this bill, what would be the use of a river and harbor improvement bill, or a fortification bill?

Mr. CHANDLER. I believe we could dispense with those bills.

Mr. HOUSTON. The amendment in question can be proposed when bills of that kind are under consideration.

Mr. CHANDLER. Certainly it could; but if this work be not completed now—

The CHAIRMAN, (interrupting.) The Chair rules the amendment out of order, on the ground that the committee is considering the civil and diplomatic appropriation bill. This item is in order, to a general appropriation bill, but it is not to the civil and diplomatic bill.

Mr. CHANDLER. The decision of the Chair, I suppose, is right, according to the letter of the rule; but I only say that we are losing more than $30,000 for the want of an early appropriation.

The CHAIRMAN. That may be.

Mr. FLORENCE. I suppose that if unanimous consent is given, it can come in. I ask that it may be received by general consent.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. The gentleman is not in earnest about that, and I object.

Mr. HOUSTON. I am instructed by the Committee of Ways and Means to add to the clause under consideration, after the word "streets," the words "or such other buildings as the Secretary of War may select;" so that it shall read:

For rent of house on northwest corner of F and Seventeenth streets, or such other buildings as the Secretary of War may select, and warming all the rooms in it, $21,875.

The object of the amendment is to authorize the Secretary of War, in the event that notice shall be given by Mr. Winder that he will require his building to be delivered up at the end of the fiscal year, to rent other buildings.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOUSTON. I am instructed by the Committee of Ways and Means to offer an amendment, to come in after the first clause of the bill, under the head of "Post Office Department." The amendment is rendered necessary by the recent lettings, which accumulated so much labor that temporary clerks had to be employed.

The amendment was reported, as follows:

For compensation to temporary clerks, necessarily employed from the 9th of May, 1853, to the 30th of June, 1854, $1,450 98.

The amendment was agreed to.

When the following paragraph was read:

For contingent expenses of said Territory [Oregon] $1,500.

Mr. LANE, of Oregon, moved to amend by adding the words:

That George L. Carry, Secretary of Oregon, be allowed and paid the salary of Governor for and during the time he discharged the duties of Governor in the year 1853.

Mr. L. said: In order that the committee may understand the amendment which I propose, I will say that the Secretary of Oregon is, by law, allowed a salary of $1,500 per annum for his services. That is the only compensation which he receives. But the law makes it his duty, upon the death or absence of the Governor, to perform the duties of that officer. Such happened to be the case in Oregon last year. I went out there as Governor, and entered upon the duties of my office; but after two days I resigned. The duties of Governor then devolved upon the Secretary of the Territory. He continued to discharge those duties for six months, at which time the gentleman who had been appointed to fill the vacancy occasioned by my resignation arrived. Now, sir, as the salary of the Secretary is very small, I hope he will be allowed to receive the salary of Governor during the time that he discharged the duties of that office.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PHELPS. I am instructed by the Committee of Ways and Means to move the insertion of the following, after the appropriations for Washington Territory:

TERRITORY OF KANSAS.
For salaries of Governor, three judges, and secretary, $10,000.

For contingent expenses of said Territory, $1,500.
For compensation and mileage of the members of the Legislative Assembly, officers, clerks, and contingent expenses of the Assembly, $20,000.

TERRITORY OF NEBRASKA.
For salaries of Governor, three judges, and secretary, $10,500.

For contingent expenses of said Territory, $1,500.
For compensation and mileage of members of the Legislative Assembly, officers, clerks, and contingent expenses of the Assembly, $20,000.

I have but a word to say in explanation of the amendment. The sum proposed to be appropriated is the gross amount of the salaries provided for by the Nebraska-Kansas bill passed recently. The committee presumed that it was the wish of members to make the same appropriations for the contingent expenses of the Executive and Legislative Departments of these Territories as have been made for our other Territories.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Ohio. At the request of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. RICHARDSON,] the chairman of the Committee on Territories, who is now absent, I move to insert after the amendments just adopted what follows:

That $500 be, and the same is hereby appropriated, to be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purchase of books for the territorial libraries for each of the Territories of Minnesota, Oregon, Utah, New Mexico, and Washington, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. PHELPS. I hope the gentleman will also provide for Kansas and Nebraska.

Mr. TAYLOR. I have no objection, and so modify my amendment. Without detaining the committee, I will only say, that the amendment is recommended by the Committee on Territories.

Mr. HAVEN. I submit whether the amount is not too large for Kansas and Nebraska, until their population shall have increased beyond what it now is?

Mr. TAYLOR. The money is to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, and he will judge whether it be too much.

Mr. ENGLISH. As the amendment now reads, gentlemen will find that it only provides $500 for all these libraries, when the intention is to appropriate $500 for each of them.

Mr. TAYLOR. I intended it to provide $500 for each of the Territories.

Mr. HUGHES. I trust my colleague [Mr. HAVEN] will withdraw any objection to this appropriation; for although the inhabitants of those Territories are rather sparse, he will remember that all the laws of the United States have been made applicable there, and they will require this law library in order to understand them.

The question was then taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LANE, of Oregon. I offer the following amendment:

Disbursements having been made from the appropriations for compensations and salaries of the members of the Legislative Assembly, officers, and officers' clerks, and the contingent expenses by the Secretaries of Oregon, Minnesota, and Utah, under the authority of territorial laws or resolutions, and the accounting officers of the Treasury having disallowed several payments, in settling the accounts with said Territories, because they were not authorized by the act of August 29, 1842, the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby empowered to cause credits to be given to said Secretaries for such disbursements so disallowed, as he shall find to be equitable and just.

Mr. HOUSTON. I do not know anything about this matter, more than I gather from the statement of facts here presented. I take it for granted that they are true; but I think that they ought not to form a part of the law. If an appropriation is to be made for the purpose asked by the gentleman from Oregon, would it not be better to make it directly, without stating the facts, in the law?

Mr. LANE. I am willing to strike out the things indicated by the gentleman from Alabama; but there are very good reasons why the amendment should be adopted. If it is not in the proper form, I will thank any gentleman to put it in shape. The secretaries of the Territory of Oregon have had some difficulty in getting their accounts settled. I have consulted the officers at the Treasury Department, and have received their advice in regard to this matter. I will say, further, that we ask no appropriation of money, for we have a surplus now, and have never used the appropriations heretofore made. There is an amount now due Oregon of some $15,000 or $20,000. Many of the accounts of the late secretaries of the Territory that ought to be allowed have been suspended. They have expended money which was not authorized, as the Secretary of the Treasury believes, by the law of 1842; but unless the law is made more plain that authorizes their accounts to be settled and allowed, they will be losers to a large amount that they have paid and honestly disbursed.

Now, no gentleman of this committee, I am sure, wants that to be the case. We want them to have credit for all the money which they have disbursed, and nothing more. An amendment like this is necessary for the settlement of their accounts, and I ask that it may be agreed to in some shape.

I have a communication here in relation to this matter from the Comptroller. I have been very careful in regard to it. I will send it up to the Clerk's desk, and let him read it for the information of the committee.

Portion of the communication was read; and is as follows:

"The amendment, if adopted, will not take any money from the Treasury.

"None of these Territories have expended all the money Congress has appropriated, from time to time, 'for compensation and mileage of the members of the Legislative Assembly, officers, clerks, and contingent expenses.'

"The following balances stand to their credit on the books of the Treasury Department, to wit:

Oregon.....	$31,467 39
Minnesota.....	2,950 51
Utah.....	45,568 40

"The accounts of the different secretaries of the Territory of New Mexico have been satisfactorily settled.

"No account from the secretary of Washington Territory has been received, and therefore no relief is necessary for them.

"The balances are given to show that the Territories have not exceeded the appropriations made by Congress, if all the disallowances were credited.

"Most sincerely yours, "ELISHA WHITTLESEY."

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Ohio. I am requested by the Delegate from Utah, [Mr. BERNHISEL,] whom I do not now see in his seat, to offer an amendment to the bill under consideration. It is a joint resolution reported by the chairman of the Committee on Territories some time since, to pay the expenses of a board of commissioners, appointed under a legislative act of the Territory of Utah, to prepare a code of laws for the Territory. I think this is a proper place, and the only place, in the bill for its introduction.

The amendment was reported, as follows:

That the accounting officers of the Treasury be authorized to adjust the expense of a board of commissioners appointed under an act of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Utah, approved by the Governor thereof January 16, 1852, to prepare a code of laws and of practice for said Territory; and the just and proper compensation and expense found to have been necessarily incurred before the passage of this resolution, the evidence of which, with the laws drawn by said commissioners, shall be submitted in detail to said accounting officers, and the amounts so found, shall be paid from the balance of appropriations "for compensation and mileage of the members of the Legislative Assembly, officers clerks, and contingent expenses of the Territory of Utah," now standing on the books of the Treasury unexpended: Provided, That the authority to charge the expense on said balance is not an approval by Congress of the act of the Territorial Legislature of Utah creating a board for a term of years to report laws, from time to time, for the action of the Legislature of said Territory.

Mr. HOUSTON. We have passed that point in the bill where this amendment is in order; and as the amount is entirely indefinite, I ask the gentleman from Ohio to withhold it for the present, and see if he cannot ascertain the amount which it will be necessary for us to appropriate for this purpose. If the committee has observed the reading of the amendment, it has seen that it is wholly indefinite. We do not know whether under it we are appropriating fifty dollars or $50,000. We simply authorize the settlement of expenses about which we know nothing, which were unauthorized when contracted for. As we have passed that part of the bill where it would be in order, I ask the gentleman from Ohio to hold it up, and get it introduced in the Senate, if it is just.

Mr. TAYLOR. I would have explained the amendment, so far as I could, to the committee, if I had supposed there would have been any objection to it. I had previously submitted to my honorable friend from Alabama [Mr. HOUSTON] the statement of the gentleman from Illinois, the chairman of the Committee on Territories, [Mr. RICARDSON,] who is now absent, when he reported, by order of that committee, this joint resolution.

I will say that it requires no appropriation of money. There is already appropriated and unexpended, as just stated in the letter of the Comptroller of the Treasury, which was sent to the Clerk's desk by the Delegate from Oregon, [Mr. LANE,] a large amount of money in the Treasury of Utah Territory. But the object of this amendment is to enable the Secretary of the Treasury, or his subordinates, to pay the board of commissioners who have prepared, under the direction of the Territorial Legislature of Utah, a code of laws enacted by that body. Those expenses had been heretofore paid in other Territories, and it is usual to do so in such cases.

I was informed by the Delegate from Utah this morning [Mr. BERNHUSEN] that this resolution was drawn up under the direction of Comptroller Whittlesey. I addressed a note to him as to the propriety of this resolution, and asking him to specify the amount necessary. I received from him the reply I hold in my hand, which I will send to the Clerk to read.

The letter was read, as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
COMPTROLLER'S OFFICE, June 15, 1854. }

DEAR SIR: I return to you a copy of the joint resolution "authorizing the accounting officers of the Treasury to adjust the expenses of a board of commissioners appointed by the Territorial Assembly of Utah to prepare a code of laws." And, in reply to your inquiries, I say: First. The like power has been granted to the accounting officers to settle the like expenses in other Territories, and unless it should be granted in this case, no allowance can be made. Second. As to the amount of the expenses when Mr. Babbitt, the present Secretary of Utah came here, he presented the claim of the code commissioners for their services, amounting to $2,428 10. He had paid on this claim $2,000. On being informed that an allowance could not be made to him for this payment without authority from Congress, he withdrew the account.

It is proper to state, that the sum of $2,428 10 included the compensation of the commissioners and clerk.

Most sincerely yours,

ELISHA WHITTLESEY.

Hon. JOHN L. TAYLOR, Chairman ad interim of the Committee on Territories.

The question was then taken on the amendment; and it was agreed to.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. I desire to offer an amendment, to come in after line six hundred and forty-five.
